Amid broken interjections by Mollie, who was now sitting up beside her, she told her husband how the storm had caught them and how little Nan was outside when it broke on them in all its violence. Tom Kendall groaned aloud. He had had enough experience with Western tornadoes to know how hopeless it was, for even a strong man, to do battle with them, much less a child. A great, heart-rending sob shook him as he thought of the fate of his little darling, caught up in the arms of the monster.

There was a knock at the door and a neighbor—Mr. Mallett, who lived down the road half a mile or so—came in, stepping softly. He, too, had heard the roar and the rush of the giant winds as they tore past his dwelling; but, fortunately for his household, the building was just outside the track of the tornado. Scarce two hundred yards distant, however, he could trace its devastating path. It led straight for the Kendall's and, with a neighborly solicitude, he had come to see whether they needed assistance.

Tom turned a despairing face to his visitor. "Baby's gone!" he exclaimed, in a husky whisper.

"What! Little Nan?" cried Mallett, horror-stricken, as he started up. "Friend Kendall, I'll rouse the Hill and we'll search till daylight for little Nan. God save her, poor dear!"

"Heaven bless ye, Mallett," was all Kendall could answer, as he turned again to his prostrate ones.

True to his promise, in less than half an hour, Will Mallett had organized a search party and, with lanterns, they scattered and began a thorough hunt in the neighboring woods and fields for the missing one. They were joined by Kendall himself, who seemed almost insane with grief at the affliction that had befallen his home. For miles along the track of the storm they searched, but unavailingly.

One by one, the searchers abandoned hope. Doubtless the child was dead, they urged; even if found, it was impossible that she could have lived through it. And with averted faces they spoke to each other in whispers, lest Kendall should hear them. They could not bear to see the father's set lips and white despairing face, as he urged the search forward.

demolished porch, sat his wife, white and weak, but happy with a smiling face and beside her stood Mollie. And by Mollie's side was tall Mart Blake with Nan in his arms.

It was all made clear in a twinkling. Mart had come over an hour ago, and was about to start off to join the search party, having first called at the farm-house, when his attention was attracted by hearing the faint cry of a child among a clump of bushes that overhung the dry bed of a stream at the foot of the lawn, scarce twenty yards from the Kendall's door. He went over and, after a few minutes search, found Nan snugly tucked away in a nook no one would ever have dreamed of exploring, for it was off the line of search.

And there lay Nan, all scratched and blistered by being tossed unceremoniously into such strange quarters, so different from the snowy cot into which she had been tucked every night of her life. No gentle hand had thrown her there, either. Still grasping Bunny, her playmate, she had been caught up by one of those swirling gusts that preceded the awful blasts of the tornado, and had by it been tossed aside. There she had lain for hours. And now, when Mart Blake found her, she was trying in vain to sit up and coax Bunny to wiggle his ears. Alas! They would wiggle for his little mistress no more.

When Mart finished, Tom Kendall kissed little Nan and then knelt down feebly by his wife's knee.

"Neighbors," he said, with strong emotion, "let's thank the good God for his providence. Nan's come back by a miracle—no less! 'Pears to me I can't thank you all enough for your kindness to us, and as for you, Mart Blake," he added, rising, "next to God we owe you little Nan's life."

"No more o' that, Tom," said Mart, putting his big brown hand on the kneeling man's shoulder. "T'was

"ANY NEWS OVER TO RUSHVILLE, MARTIN?" ASKED THE GIRL.

Daylight had tinged the trees and the stars were beginning to fade above Rock Hill, when the weary searchers heard a commotion far behind them. There were women with arms waving, their forms outlined against the dim sky, and their voices faintly heard on the wind. It was clear that something had happened and the search party turned back.

"They've found her!" cried the foremost of the group of women as they came up.

Kendall's heart stood still. Hope for a moment revived in his breast; but no—it was all over!

But he was hurried along by the strong arms of Mallett and other neighbors, and soon they reached the door of his own home. What strange sight was this? There, in front of the the 'Almighty took care o' Nan. His hand put her out of the way o' the storm where we found her."

At the next Sunday forenoon service at the white church in Rock Hill, there was a special thanksgiving, for everybody in the village knew and loved little Nan. The Kendall's were all there, smiling and happy, and alongside of Mollie sat Mart Blake, probably the happiest man in all Rock Hill.

At the foot of Kendall's lawn in Rock Hill, there is a little white wooden slab, placed there by Nan's playmates, the children of the village, who love to come and sport about there in the summer afternoons. Beneath the wooden slabs lies Bunny, and every year, in the season of blossoms, it is strewn with flowers.

"COME AND SEE."

THE Christian Endeavor Topic for the week beginning July 12, is fraught with a double suggestion. The woman of Samaria urging her people to "come and see" Jesus, (John: 4: 28-38,) suggests the kind of message and the character of the testimony every Christian ought to proclaim. The fact that the priests, perplexed by the conduct of Peter and John and at a loss to account for the boldness and fidelity of "unlearned and ignorant men," found a clue to the mystery in their association with Jesus (Acts 4: 13) suggests the kind of life every Christian ought to live.

The woman's cry is the one effective appeal to an indifferent and captious world. "Come, and see;" they who see Jesus in all his beauty of life, and character believe on him, love him, obey him. Come and see him! in him dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily; a man of infinite tenderness, kind to the unthankful and the evil; a man meek under affront and contumely, patient in suffering, strong under temptation, victorious in conflict; triumphant over death. Come and see him! Why do we hold his dearest name on earth? Why is he more to us than father or mother? Why have men laid down their lives rather than deny him? Why do men quit home and native land to live lives of hardship and privation with no other reward than his approval? Why do the learned and the ignorant, the rich and the poor enroll themselves under his banner? To all questions about him we have but one answer—"Come and see." To the sinful he gives pardon; to the despairing, hope; to the weary, rest; to the weak, strength; to the dying, the assurance of endless life. Theologians dispute over abstruse doctrines, churches quarrel over creeds, conflicts are endless over ordinances and ceremonies, and the perplexity grows. Then come and see Jesus. The living Lord is what the world needs to-day. Personal love of him, personal consecration in his service, personal fealty to his rule would heal the wounds, relieve the burdens of humanity.

Then, "Come and see" what he has done in the lives of his people. We have less confidence in giving that invitation. We are poor material to work with. That he has done so much with such unpromising subjects is a marvellous evidence of his power. It is a poor spectacle, but still, "come and see." Here is a drunkard relieved of the bondage of appetite and he ascribes his rescue to the keeping power of Jesus. Here is an impure man cleansed of his pollution, a criminal leading an honest life, a passionate man with his temper subdued, a quarrelsome pugnacious man manifesting forbearance and magnanimity. All imperfect still, but ever striving after higher attainments and all praising him for past victories and relying on his help for the future. There has been a revolution in the man. If he yields to his besetting sin now it is after a struggle, or when taken unawares, and he mourns over his fall. Before, he was a willing victim and had no remorse. He has ceased to grow worse, and however slowly, he is growing better. Seeing him after an interval we recognize progress. He is not what we might wish him to be, but he is not the more degraded being that at one time he appeared likely to be. The trend is upward, as before it was downward. There is a new influence at work—"the power that makes for righteousness." We take knowledge of him that he has been with Jesus.

A CHRIST-LIKE WORK.

In Louisville, Ky., the King's Daughters have for some time past been doing a work of the most Christ-like kind, which now promises to grow into an important institution. Miss Jennie Cassidy, who has been for twenty-seven years a helpless invalid, has the honor of suggesting it. She persuaded the order in her city to hire a trained nurse for the sick, who should visit any home she knew of where there was some poor person sick and in need of help. She was supplied with clean linen, surgical instruments, bandages, etc. A small supply of money was given to her to be used in buying suitable food for persons needing food more than medicine, and she began her work. The lady—Miss Eva Buxton, has her time fully occupied. She is welcomed in many homes where invalids are necessarily left alone all day, owing to those who love them and would gladly stay home and nurse them, being compelled by hard fortune to labor away from home all day, toiling for themselves and the invalid at home. She is able to give advice to poor people who have to act as nurses to members of their families, and are without experience. The adjustment of a bandage, the arrangement of a mechanical support is beyond their power, and Miss Buxton shows them how to give the relief, or does it with her own hands. So great is the good accomplished, and so successful are the King's Daughters in collecting stores for the use of the nurse that it is now proposed to open an infirmary and extend the movement in all directions. May God speed the effort. These King's Daughters have the spirit of their King, and a day will come when they will hear him say, "I was sick and ye ministered unto me. Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

THE USE OF THE BADGE.

SOME timely words to King's Daughters, on the significance of the badge, are uttered by Mrs. Bottome in The Silver Cross. "This is an age," she says, "when too much reverence is not our failing, and through all our ranks the cross we wear—the Holy Name by which we are called—should mean more and more to us as the solemn significance of our relationship sinks more and more into our souls." It appears that Mrs. Bottome has noticed some members of the order wearing the little silver cross with the letters "I. H. N." upon it, on their bangles. This was some time ago and Mrs. Bottome by a look and a word showed them their mistake. She now reminds all the members that the Cross or the purple ribbon is to be worn distinctly as a badge. "If you tie your collar with purple ribbon," she adds, "or put on purple ribbon as a convenience, it will hardly be considered by those who see it, as a token of membership in any society whatever." There is good reason for such words. The Order is so popular, and its members are so highly esteemed in Christian circles that no one need be ashamed of having it known that they belong to it. Let them show their colors and not attempt to compromise by wearing something that in some company will be considered a token of membership and in other company an ornament of no religious significance.

THE EPWORTH LEAGUE IN ITALY.

BISHOP WALDEN gives a cheering report to the Epworth Herald of the introduction of the Epworth League into Italy. He attended one of the first meetings during his recent visit, at the house of Rev. Dr. Burt, the Superintendent of the Italian Mission in Rome. He says: "The programme consisted of literary and musical exercises. It being in Italy I was not surprised that music had the prominent part. I was surprised at the talent that the young people had enlisted, and at the creditable part they took themselves in the varied exercises. About fifty persons were seated and a number more were present. During an intermission after half the programme had been rendered, some refreshments were served, which gave the whole ceremony a very pleasant social occasion. A number present were not members of the Methodist Church, but were thus brought into pleasant relations with the young members, a bright and happy company; and these young members became all the more interested in the spiritual well-being of their guests. This public meeting of the league may differ from those in America, but the purpose is the same, and I am satisfied the results will honor the Saviour. This busy and enthusiastic band of young workers presents one of the most hopeful features of the mission work in Rome. Its success will no doubt lead to similar organizations at other points as fast as they can be made."

The Captains Bargain

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

"Mr. Murray Makes an Offer."

WHEN Mr. Murray was informed by the schoolmaster that Robert was only the adopted child of Captain Ezekiel Allen, the desire of the Superintendent to possess him was stimulated. The day might come when the Allens could be persuaded to give him up. Or, some day the boy might be brought to realize the advantages he could receive as the adopted son of the rich man, and so elect to forsake his foster-parents. Mr. Murray was a man of long ideas; he could plan far off toward an end. He continued his kindness to Robert, saw him whenever he could, and carefully acquainted himself with Captain Allen's affairs.

The six weeks each summer when the Allens were away on the barge Fair-Weather were long and tedious weeks to Mr. Murray; he pined for a sight of Robert's handsome face.

His presents continued. Robert had the best knife of any boy in the school. He had a nice little pocket-book, though in truth it was seldom that he had more than a cent in it—for Mr. Murray never gave him money. Money was to be the culminating bribe to the growing lad, who had been taught by want to know its worth. Robert had a box of pens and pencils; he had a book-strap; he might have had a handsome suit of clothes.

"If you will come with me to Lacy, my lad," said the Superintendent, "I'll buy you a new suit, all blue cloth and gilt buttons."

But Robert shook his head resolutely. "What's the matter? Don't you want new clothes?"

"No, sir. I don't want to be dressed better than the rest of them. I don't want blue clothes and brass buttons, when my father and mother and Pink don't have new things."

Mr. Murray could not but admire the feeling, but wanted to see Robert dressed according to his ideal. "I'll give Pink a new suit too," he said slowly.

"I must ask mother before I say," said Robert. "But you know father wouldn't take clothes, only what he earned and paid for; and I don't think I ought to be dressed better than my father."

He told his mother about the proffered clothes for himself and Pink.

"You shall do as you please, Robert," said Mrs. Liza, who was washing, and she rubbed the suds from her arms, and leaned on her wash-board, as she spoke; "only you must think of this: Mr. Murray may give you and Pink nicer clothes than you ever had before, or could get again. They would make your other clothes seem very poor and shabby to you, and when the new ones were gone, you might never feel contented in such poorer things as we can give you. The new clothes might just make you both vain, and spoil your notions. But do as you like, child."

"I like not to have any clothes but what you get me; don't you, Pink?" said Robert, promptly.

The little maid, who was now eight, and who saw a very pretty face reflected when she gazed into the square foot of looking-glass, or into a pool or tub of water, assented, much more reluctantly than Robert, to Eliza's reasonings.

"Ye-es—only—I would like a blue dress, with trimming on it, so much," she said.

"Never mind, Pink, dear," said Robert, patting her cheek. "We don't care! Our things are good enough, and then mother made 'em! That makes them good enough, don't it, Pink? And when I'm big, Pink, I'm going to earn a whole load of money, as much as all Mr. Murray has, and I'll buy you ten new dresses, of all colors, and I shall buy mother a dress and a hat just like Mrs. Britt's best one, only with a much bigger feather; and I'll pay the mortgages and build a new mill, and a white house, with a porch in front, and carpets all over the floors, and a buggy for mother to ride in. Yes, I will!"

"Bless the child," said Eliza, tears coming into her eyes; "whatever put all that into your head?"

"Oh, I think of it often, when I'm playing, or go to bed at night, or sometimes when I'm learning my lessons, and I go to the foot, and the Master says, 'Robert, you've been dreaming away your time.'"

"You musn't do that," said Eliza, "you'll never get a deal of money, and be rich, unless you are wise and learn all your lessons. What are you going to buy for yourself, when you are rich?"

"Something," said Robert, carelessly; "I hadn't thought about that yet."

Robert was ten. His long curls had at last fallen under Eliza's reluctant shears; but now his hair was lying in great soft rings all about his well-made head, and his erect figure was strong and well-developed. Not a child of his years in the district was so large and well-built as Robert. He was well on in his lessons too, full of life and enterprise, a leader among his playmates, a ruler, but not a tyrant. He could fight, and fought when he saw occasion. There was one day when as he and Pink reached school they fell into trouble.

Pink had a blue calico dress. It had seen a summer's wear, and had faded. Then, unhappily, a hole had come in it, and Eliza had patched it; and, alas! the new was bright against the old. Poor little Pink, that patch grieved her all the way to school. In vain Robert, putting his arm around her, strove to comfort her: "The patch did not look ugly." "The dress was clean." "Pink was pretty, anyhow." "No one would notice it." "Everyone had patches sometimes."

But Pink was still downcast, as by Robert's side she trudged to school; Bop prancing along, now behind, now before them, and the twins pursuing an erratic course in the rear. But when the door of the school-house was reached, Jim Long bawled out: "Halloo! Pink Allen, you've got a window in your frock!"

Pink simply dropped into a forlorn heap on the grass, and hiding her crimson face on her arms began to cry heart-brokenly. Beside her dropped the strap of books and the dinner-basket. Jim Long was twelve and sturdy, but Robert was upon him like a young tiger; he whirled him from the school-house steps out upon the grass; he dealt him a furious blow on his cheek, grappled him, flung him over, and kneeling upon him, began to strike him here and there, with little regard to consequences. The twins shrieked in chorus. Bop shouted for the master; some of the girls burst into tears; some of the boys roared: "Serves him right." Others sang out, "Let him up, Rob!" "Quit, Rob." "The master's coming!" The master came. He pulled one boy off, and the other boy up; he took them each by the collar to the water-pail and washed both their hot, furious faces. Then he led them to the platform, rang the bell for school and order, and inquired into the rights of the case. Tom Britt stood up to testify, as a disinterested witness.

"Jim, I'm ashamed of you," said the schoolmaster, "but no doubt you spoke without thinking, and are sorry for it now. No boy with the least spark of a gentleman in him would insult a girl! Robert, is it not written, 'Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath?'"

"Yes, Schoolmaster," said Robert, "but I was not avenging myself, but Pink. He may say what he likes to me, but no one shall make Pink cry."

"It is dangerous to be so uncommonly handy with your fists, Robert," said the master, "hereafter will you let Jim alone?"

"Yes, master—if he behaves himself," said

Robert calmly fixing his steadfast, brown eyes on his preceptor.

The schoolmaster repressed a bounteous smile. "I want no fighting in my school. Refer ill-behavior to me."

"And be a sneak and a tell-tale, master? I'd rather settle him myself, please, sir."

"But I don't please," said the master. "I cannot have fighting. If I found you boys fighting, and was obliged to take a hand and thrash you, it would be unfortunate."

"Yes, master, so it would," said Robert; "but—I should have thrashed Jim first."

"Take your seats," said the master. "It is time to open school."

Mr. Murray glowered in this encounter. He met Robert one evening on the bridge-path to the chalet. The boy had been looking after the Allen cow, which was given to straying, "Robert," said Mr. Murray, taking his hand, "you are now about ten years old, and I hear you are at the head of your class."

"Yes, sir; but it's easy, you know; it is not a hard class."

"And you can thrash any boy of your size, and more than your size, too, I understand."

"So I can," said Robert, with modest gratification; "but I don't do it often. I don't love to fight."

"You will soon be a large boy, and then a young man. What are you going to do in life?"

"I shall go to work at something as soon as I can, and make money. I want to make a lot of money."

"Yes. What do you wish to do with money?"

"I want to give it to father. The mill needs a lot of money to repair it. We need a house. Father wants the mortgage paid. Oh, we need so much money."

"And you'd be willing to do—anything for all this money, would you?"

"Anything I could, sir; anything right. Father says there's a lot of very dirty money in the world, made in bad ways. I wouldn't want that money."

"Perhaps I can put you in a good way to have a deal of money, as much as I have—and I am a rich man, Robert. Would you like that?"

"Oh, sir! Oh, yes, sir!" cried Robert, his face aglow.

The dusk was falling an evening or two after, and Captain Ezekiel Allen, in a moody frame of mind, was standing on the bank, where he could dimly see his mill-wheel. The children were all in the house peeling and cutting apples to dry for winter. Captain Ezekiel was unhappy. The mortgage was long overdue, and he was at the mercy of his creditor, who could at any time refuse the hard-earned interest and foreclose. The old mill was so out of repair that it would scarcely hold together. The voyages to Philadelphia were yearly less remunerative, the barge was very old, and like the mill, needed refitting. There was little demand for sawing or grinding. The outlook was very dark for Ezekiel and Liza and the five children.

Some one came behind him.

"Captain Allen, are you there? I wish to talk with you. Can we sit down somewhere alone?"

It was Mr. Murray. Captain Allen silently led the way under the mill, to that very place of cobwebs and rubbish where he had sacrificed his bottle, long ago, to Robert, and laid his hand in unuttered covenant on that curly head. There were two empty nail-kegs there, and the men sat down. Captain Allen's heart misgave him. He had long feared mischief from Mr. Murray.

"Allen," said Mr. Murray, "I want to talk with you, and I am going first to tell you what I have never told hereabouts to any one, my story. I was left an orphan with some money. When I was a lad I had typhoid fever, and in the long prostration that came after, I was freely given brandy and whiskey. It created a taste for liquor. Mine was not a constant thirst, a tipping, a daily sipping. But at times a strong craving came upon me, and I drank. I married. My wife was an orphan like myself, and lovelier than words can tell, a gentle creature, all heart. We had a child—a son—we were very happy. The child was about a year old, when, one evening, in New York, I wanted to take him out with me on my arm, to carry him around after the shops were lit. My wife had a sprained ankle and could not go out. She objected to my taking the child. I had been having some liquor; she knew I might at any moment yield to my madness, and take more, and lose all knowledge. But I was proud of my handsome boy, and I would go out with him, to show him to those whom I knew. I went out. At one in the morning I came in with-

"Where was he?" cried the Captain.

"I do not know. I was too stupefied to miss him or to answer questions. My frantic wife sent for the neighbors and for the police. It was noon next day before I came to my senses. Then I could tell nothing, for I could recall nothing. Search has never developed anything. My watch and a wallet with a hundred dollars were gone. I had a vague fancy that the child cried, and I had given him these articles to play with. We bent every energy to the search, but never found any trace of him. My poor wife was prostrated. She lay on her bed, wasting to a shadow. She had but one word, 'My baby, get me my baby.' Hour after hour she moaned that plaintive plea. When too weak to utter the words, her big, sunken, sorrowful eyes turned in an agony of entreaty to every one who entered. I spared no pains. Even now the case is in the hands of the New York police, as it has been for ten years. At the end of a year my poor heart-broken wife died. I was an old man. My hair was white, my face was wrinkled, my shoulders bent, as you see. I gave up hope. To fly the face of all whom I had known, I came up here. By some strange fatality, when all my home had fallen into ruins, my fortunes thrived. I make more and more money, but by no outlay of it can I find my child. Now, I have a large fortune, and I am prematurely old and broken, and where shall I leave my money when I die? I have seen only one heir whom I want—your Robert."

"Robert! You want to leave your money to Robert?"

"Yes; but I want you to give Robert to me. I can do for him more than you can. I can make him a gentleman, a rich man, a scholar—everything. It is not fair for you, is it, to stand in the way of his prosperity? He is not really yours; you have four; compassionate my loneliness, give the boy to me!—Give him to me!"

"Give up our Robert! Not mine! Yes; but I love him as well as any of the rest. Give you my boy, Mr. Murray?"

"I will do so well for him," pleaded the Superintendent.

"I'm bringing him up to be an honest man, and that's enough," said Captain Ezekiel.

"When the boy is older—when he finds himself at a disadvantage, when he is wanting what he cannot have, and is hard pressed by poverty, he may wish you had done better for him by not rejecting my offer, Allen."

"It would break Liza's heart. She's as set on Robert as I am. And there's Pink; yes, and the rest of 'em, Jerry and all, they'd never cease mourning if I let him go. To say nothing of what I'd feel."

"Yes, yes, I know. But here you are, times are hard, the mill is mortgaged for all it's worth, or more. Old Mr. Wick, who holds the mortgage, is past seventy; when he dies the heirs will wind up the property, and where will you be, Allen?"

"In the street, no doubt," groaned the Captain. He had been thinking those very thoughts by his wheel as the evening gathered before the Superintendent came.

"And you will have in Robert only one more to share your troubles. You can set him well out of them by giving him to me. I'll send him to college. I'll leave him all my property unless I find my own boy Paul: If I find him—though I fear, yes, I am sure I never shall—I'll give Robert ten thousand dollars, and take care of him, until he is twenty-one."

"I don't believe the boy would be willing—no, not for all that money," said Captain Allen.

"You should be willing for him, seeing it is for his good."

"To give up our Robert!" cried the poor foster-father.

"Come, Allen. See, now, I'll pay off the mortgage, and give you a thousand dollars, to repair the mill and build a house."

"You are trading on my poverty, and trying to buy my boy!" cried Allen angrily.

"No, I am not. You have cared for him five years and over. I offer you compensation for his education and maintenance. If I had picked him up when you did, no doubt by this time I should have spent a deal of money on him."

"He is not for sale," said the Captain crossly.

"Don't look at it in that way, man, pleaded the Superintendent. "You are rich in four children of your own blood—I am childless. Think what a terrible history I have told you. Think of my daily agony. Think how wretchedly I lost my poor wife. Your wife is with you. It is a charity I beg of you. Give me the boy."

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

W. R. C., Corinth, N. Y.—How should a man vote, who wants to honor God and his cause? Since conversion, I have had many doubts.

You must make your vote a matter of conscience and prayer; beyond this, we are unable to advise.

Student, Norwich, Conn.—Can you tell me accurately how many chapters, verses, words and letters there are in the Old and New Testaments?

In the Old Testament there are 929 chapters and 23,214 verses; in the New, 260 chapters and 7,959 verses.

Friend, Adams, Mo.—Is card playing consistent with a Christian life?

It is condemned by all sections of the Christian Church, not because of any intrinsic evil in the cards themselves, or in the games played, but because it tends to the display of temper and excites passion; wastes valuable time and leads to evil associations and habits. These reasons are sufficient to put card-playing beyond the pale of proper amusements.

F. F. D., Cincinnati, O.—(1) Which of the Israelitish tribes was it that owned no land? (2) When, according to prophecy, are the Jews to return to Jerusalem?

(1) The tribe of Levi (See Deut 17: 8-13.) (2) According to the latest prophetic calculations the restoration of Israel will take place about the year 1894. They will probably be restored in unbelief. There has lately been a large emigration of Jews from Russia to Palestine and many are finding their way thither from other countries. Every indication points to the early and literal fulfilment of prophecy.

B. A., Waterbury, Conn.—Who first discovered the telescope?

In 1608 while Hans Lippersheim, a poor optician of the Netherlands, was at work in his shop, his little daughter who was playing about, took up two glasses and looking through them called out to her father that the "steeple was coming." Hans saw the child holding one lens to her eye and the other at arms' length. He followed her example and profiting by the discovery, made three telescopes that year. He gave them the name of "instruments for seeing at a distance." A child's play thus led to a great discovery.

Mrs. P. B., Scranton, Pa.—Is there any evidence that the art of printing was known in Biblical times?

Printing is first mentioned in the Bible in the book of Job, chapter 19: 23, where he says, "O! That my words were now written! O! That they were printed in a book!" Although this has been taken by some as indicating the existence of the printer's art in the earliest times, the general belief is that Job intended to refer to manuscript or writing on papyrus rolls. Engraving on stone and wood and metal was done in very ancient times, but the honor of discovering the "art preservative" as we now interpret it, seems to belong to China, where printing long ante-dated Gutenberg's discovery.

C. F. R., Wichita, Kan.—(1) Of what is Incense composed? (2) I wish to know something more about Cassia.

(1) Incense used in Christian churches is either the resinous gum of the Olive Tree from Arabia, or the East Indies, or an imitation of it manufactured by chemists—the latter being very common. It is only used in the Roman Catholic and Oriental Churches. The incense used in the Hebrew service is stated in Exodus 30: 34-35, to be composed of sweet spices "stacte, onycha, galbanum, and frankincense; of each there shall be a like weight and thou shalt make of it a perfume." All incense not made of these ingredients was called "strange incense." (2) Cassia is an aromatic bark obtained from a tree or shrub growing in India, Austria, Italy, Arabia and a few other parts of the world. The Cassia of the ancients is difficult to describe; that of the moderns is simply a variety of cinnamon. The Arabian cassia, a species of aromatic shrub, closely resembles cinnamon.

Reader, Middletown, N. Y.—My little daughter would like to know when dolls were first mentioned in history.

The oldest dolls known are those found in the tombs of ancient Egypt. The Romans, Moors and Chinese had dolls long before Europe emerged from barbarism. Among Greek antiquities, dolls are found made of wax and clay, and dolls' houses with lead furniture. In Siberia and other arctic regions, remains of ivory dolls, dressed in rich furs have been found and also beautifully carved dolls in the oldest graves in Peru, supposed to date back to the days of the Incas, the famous rulers who governed before the conquests of Cortez and Pizarro.

Mrs. T. N., Leavenworth, Kan.—Who founded the Order of King's Daughters?

Mrs. Margaret Bottome, in conjunction with Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, founded the Order. Mrs. Bottome for many years has given Bible readings, or Bible talks in parlors in New York, Brooklyn and other cities, which were largely attended by women of all ages, and out of these gatherings came the idea of organizing the Order.

Inquirer, Nashville, Tenn.—What evidence is there, outside of the Bible, of the existence of Jesus Christ?

A number of the most eminent historians, both Jewish and Roman, mention Jesus in their writings. Tacitus, who lived in the first century, wrote "this sect (of Christians) came from Judea and was founded by Jesus Christ, who was put to the death of the Cross." Suetonius, a Roman historian, who wrote the lives of the Cesars, mentions the sect "under one Christus." This writer, although an enemy to Christianity, still recognized it. Lucan, who lived near the close of the first century mentions the Christians and describes their belief. He tells us "of all the great men Judea has brought forth, their crucified Master exceeds in his philosophy and teaching all before him." A magnificent tribute from a heathen! Josephus, the greatest of Jewish historians, writing about the middle of the first century, says: "Now, there was about this time Jesus, a wise man—if it be lawful to call him a man—for he was a doer of many wonderful works, a teacher of such men as received the truth." He further relates his preaching, trial, condemnation, crucifixion and resurrection, and refers to the prophecies concerning him as having been fulfilled in all these matters. Thus is established, outside of Sacred Writ, the existence of Jesus on earth.

Subscriber, Morristown, N. J.—What currency is used for purposes of trade among the natives of Africa?

Although gold is plentiful in many parts of Africa, it does not seem to have been used for the purpose of coinage, but rather for ornament, except in the communities where the whites preponderate. The most universal currency among the Africans is the cowry shell—the price of almost every article of trade being regularly quoted in these shells, which are imported from the coasts and the Persian Gulf. Narrow strips of cotton-cloth were largely used as currency in the interior, and are still met with. Pieces of iron, shaped like small horseshoes and pieces of rock salt are also used for money. In the civilized communities, the money of Europe is gradually making its way and also the rupee of the East. The Congo State has now a silver and copper currency.

Moscow, probably. The ancient Russian City founded over a thousand years ago, has from time to time added to its church buildings until now there are over five hundred places of worship within sight of the dome of the Church of the Saviour, which was erected to commemorate the overthrow of Napoleon. Almost all the churches or chapels have domes, which give the City a peculiarly Asiatic aspect. Every language is spoken and almost every sect is represented.

"Young Lady," Campbell, Arizona.—Can you advise me how best to spend my evenings?

Some course of study might be suggested. The Chautauqua and other Circles furnish lists of books to be read, and give diplomas for successful examinations. You might form a reading circle in your village, to which members could contribute their own books for circulation and perusal. These, and other social and intellectual recreations are desirable, when not otherwise engaged. Above all, do not fail in your church duties; the meetings should be regularly attended.

AN EX-PREMIER IN THE PULPIT.

FAMILIAR as we are with the pictured features of the famous English statesman, there is something new to us in Mr. Gladstone's face as it appears in the accompanying illustration. The portraits taken of him listening to a debate, or speaking in the House of Commons, show a keen, eager, alert man; that picture taken of him in his library represents the busy, studious man of letters, and the picture of him, of his octogenarian manhood. The estate is in Wales, and is one of the most beautiful in the three kingdoms. It belonged to his wife's father, Sir Stephen Glynne, and Mr. Gladstone made his home there during his father-in-law's life. The arrangement was a very happy one, for Sir Stephen was proud of his famous son-in-law, and Mr. Gladstone, even when Premier of Great Britain, always yielded the place of head of the household to his wife's father. Since Sir Stephen's death, Mr. Gladstone has continued to make it his home dur-axe in hand, felling a tree on his country estate, depicts a vigorous determined man. Here we have a look of calm reverence, befitting the Christian engaged in public worship. It is the face of a man profoundly impressed with the sanctity of his occupation, and deeply conscious of the majesty of the Being in whose service he is engaged. This aspect of the man is the one most familiar to the people of the village of Hawarden. When Parliament is not in session, and Mr. Gladstone is taking what he calls rest, at Hawarden Castle, the people who attend the village church, of which his son, Rev. Stephen E. Gladstone, is rector, frequently see him engaged as depicted in the illustration. It is his habit to attend the daily morning service which is held at eight o'clock. Then, and often on Sundays, he assists his son in the service by reading certain portions of the liturgy, thus availing himself of the privilege which the Church of England concedes to lay-readers. Visitors who have been at these services say that these readings are perfect. The clear intonation, and the impressive manner of the reader indicate a man who loves and reverences the Bible, and who wishes that its words should have their full effect on those who hear it. His recent book, in defence of the Word of God against the assaults of the critics, proves that Mr. Gladstone is precisely that kind of man. Though he is now in his eighty-second year, and is at the head of a great political party, with a multitude of calls on his time and attention, there is no day so overcrowded with work that he does not make time for reading the Bible and private devotion. The fact that a man, whose commanding ability and profound learning are acknowledged even by his most inveterate political antagonists, should so reverence the Bible, is a fact full of significance.

MR. GLADSTONE READING THE SERVICE IN THE CHURCH AT HAWARDEN.

The days of privacy at Hawarden are probably to Mr. Gladstone the happiest of the year, and doubtless help to explain the vigor ing the Parliamentary recess. His manner of life is very simple. He rises about seven, attends morning service in the church, spends the morning in the library dealing with his enormous correspondence, working on some new book or magazine article which he generally has on hand, or studying some question of national moment. After a light luncheon, he takes a brisk walk in the park, dines at eight o'clock, and retires to rest soon after ten.

A SAILOR'S NEW TACK.

AT a recent service in the Berachah Mission in New York a sailor rose and told in quaint language the story of his life. He said he was born of Christian parents, and in his early years had been a veritable child of promise. He was attentive to his household duties and punctual in his attendance at Church and at Sunday school. At the age of sixteen he shipped on board a frigate, and found the life there very different indeed from what he had been accustomed to. Cursing, and swearing and blaspheming seemed to be universal. Ere long he could do his own share in the work of blasphemy and as one sin leads to another he soon found unlimited pleasure in drinking bouts and infamous carousals every time he had a chance to put his foot on shore. He was frequently punished for his disorderly conduct; and at last, after fourteen years' service, he was ignominiously discharged from the navy, as a hopeless case, a man of no character. When he landed in New York he lost no time in squandering the little money he had; and one morning found himself penniless and friendless. In the evening of that day he wandered into one of the Missions, and heard some of the old hymns with which he had been familiar in his boyhood. His heart was touched, his face was bathed in tears, and then and there he returned as the prodigal of old to the arms of his Father.

LOVE FOUND A WAY.

1. Out in the world, while dead in sin, With black de-..... reigning with-in,..... I heard a voice..... at my heart's spair reigning within, I heard a voice at my heart's door,..... I'll give thee life..... for ev - er - more.

door, at my heart's door, I'll give thee life for ev - er - more.

Refrain.

O! Sav-iour mine, Thy love di-vine, Has reach'd this sin-ful heart of mine, Henceforth I'll live a-lone for Thee, So others may Thy beauty see, Thy beauty see.

- 2 A friendly voice it seemed to be,
I raised the latch, that I might see,
His face was mild, the door swung wide,
The Stranger entered at my side.
- 3 Love found a way into my heart,
And bade its sin and grief depart;
- Jesus is Love, and it is he Who now abides each day with me.
- 4 So now I work the live-long day,
Since Jesus washed my sins away,
To rescue other lives from sin,
That they may have this Friend within.

For this new Hymn in sheet form, Address: G. TABOR THOMPSON, 318 West 44th St., New York.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC'S TESTIMONY.

HERE is a notable witness to the goodness of God. He spoke some time ago in Jane Street Church, and this was his testimony. "I was living in a new settlement in North Western Dakota, with a great deal of leisure time on my hands. I had been born and brought up in the Roman Catholic Church. Many a time the Presbyterian minister had spoken to me about indifferent subjects; but one evening in June, 1888, we drifted into the subject of religion. I tried to defend the invocation of saints and of angels, and for sole reply the good minister repeated the inspired words, 'We have no other mediator between God and man, but the man Christ Jesus.' For three days these words kept ringing in my ears, and at the end of the third day my mind was made up. I must yield to the call of God, cost what it may. I resigned the position I held in the Catholic Church, made my way straight to New York, and after mature deliberation became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and am at this moment a member of Jane Street Church.

A REPROBATE JEWESS RECLAIMED.

At the Florence Mission, New York, not many nights ago, a young woman rose to give her testimony. There was in her face a look of perfect peace, and her words evidently came from a heart filled with love and gratitude to God. The substance of her testimony was as follows: Some three years ago she was passing the Mission Hall on a stormy winter's night. She had already, although very young, entered upon a career of sin and shame. On this particular night she was benumbed with cold, and more for the sake of obtaining shelter than for any other purpose, she entered the room. She listened to the witnessing of the reclaimed sinners, and she began to feel a very unusual sensation, a feeling of being troubled within her heart. The hymn "Jesus, lover of my soul," was started, and before its conclusion, the poor young woman was bathed in tears, and cried aloud for mercy and pardon. From that night forward she has been leading a life of holiness. Her conversion is all the more remarkable, that previous to her entering the room of the Florence Mission, she knew absolutely nothing about the Christian religion, having been born and brought up in the Jewish faith.

HOUSEHOLD ANGELS.

O H, the blessed household angels, we hear their gentle tones,
We look into their tender, loving eyes,
And like a benediction their gracious presence seems,
God's holy ones, his angels in disguise.

They bear earth's weary burdens and lighten every care,
They tread with smiles the thorny path of life,
A fount of joy is springing forever in their souls,
Dear angels! 'mid earth's conflict and its strife.

We hear their gentle footsteps where pain and sorrow dwell,
And their hands are white with serving Christ our King,
The low rustle of their robes as they journey to and fro,
Is like the stirring of an angel's wing.

Is there anyone a-weary? Are there tears on any cheek?
They come with words of holy, loving cheer.
Is there any awful sorrow where 'tis mockery to speak?
They will pray and drop the sympathizing tear.

O precious household angels! O saintly ones and blest!
O souls grown beautiful with glory from above,
The little ones and aged ones they comfort and they bless,
And lift our poor earth nearer to God's throne of love. C. E. FISHER.

THE GOOD MOTHER.

A LADY at North Melbourne, Victoria, Australia, writes us presenting a beautiful picture of Christian life in the home. "I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the last ten years. When rocking my babes in that little town away among the hills of Pennsylvania, where I lived—sometimes discouraged with my inconsistency—God sent messages by you to me. At times something about your own dear, good mother, and the old homestead. O! I was touched and looked up to God and then down to my little babe in the cradle, it made me long to be a good mother too, a small, still voice comforted me that the good mother's God would be my God. Now, I can say from my heart, it is so. Sometimes the message was 'train the children in the love of Jesus.' I thank God for impressing on my mind the safety of their little souls, to teach them to shun evil and do good. When telling my oldest boy, that he should seek first the kingdom of heaven and its righteousness and all things would be added unto him, I shall never forget when I first implored him to do it; and a few months afterward how he said to his mother 'I will do it.' Praise God he did it, and to-day he is singing in the home, where sin and sorrow cannot enter."

A SELF-SUPPORTING MISSION.

In Angola, Africa, Bishop Taylor established in 1885, five stations on the self-supporting principle. The following account of one of them—that at Nhangua-a-Pepe—is given by Mr. Chatelain went out with Bishop Taylor's first party and as United States Consul at Loanda:

Nhangua-a-Pepe, the third station, derives its name from a bird that always follows the cattle, and all its importance and value from the rich pastures extending far to the right and left of the trade-path to and from the interior. The native population, living under native chieftains, is rather scattered, and two neighboring traders make up the white population. Little support is to be expected from them by schooling. In spite of appearances, the thing was tried, by requiring boys to work on the farm for their instruction, and so up to the present a farm-school has been maintained under many vicissitudes. It may be expected to be transformed into a free-school. A farm on modifications, but as yet, without satisfactory results. The cattle herd, on the contrary, is thriving. Two new houses have recently been built, one for the farm-school, the other for a tannery and shop. The independent tribes on the opposite side of the river are in the habit of selling all their produce at incredibly low prices as they gather it in, and when the season of want comes, other natives will buy it at a relatively high price. At their own suggestion, the mission intends to open a little shop to trade with them, and store their provisions, of course, not without profit. This may become a valuable help to support the missionaries and to establish regular relations with those tribes. A Sunday school has been started, but the attendance is not large. Medicine is regularly dispensed to the sick. At this altitude the climate is less weakening than at Loanda and Dondo, but not fever-free.

A CAPTAIN BECOMES A PRINTER.

BISHOP J. M. THOBURN, whose portrait, with a sketch of his work in India, appeared in this journal on July 30, 1890, mentions incidentally in a letter to the Indian Witness of Calcutta, the self-sacrificing life of one of his workers. He says: "Entering the building occupied by our new missionary press, I found a number of men at work and signs of activity, which showed that the little press even in this its day of small things has ample work to do. Two rooms are occupied below and two above. In one of the latter I found a man with his sleeves rolled up, hard at work with a Chinese assistant in manipulating a printing press. He proved to be none other than the Captain W. G. Shellabear, of the Royal Engineers, who was occupying a coveted position in the English military service in this city, when I first made his acquaintance two years ago. The readers of the Indian Witness have heard before of the noble manner in which this good brother, when convinced that God called him to missionary work among the Malay people, promptly turned his back upon prospects which almost any young man would regard as peculiarly brilliant, resigned his commission, and threw himself heart and soul into what he accepted as the work of his life. Mr. Shellabear is laying the foundations of a very important literary work, and while for the immediate present his printing press will not seem to be accomplishing great things, I am persuaded that it has a future before it which will make every little incident connected with the present day of small things historical in the next generation."

A PERSIAN CHILD HOUSEKEEPER.

ONE of the most difficult and unpromising spheres of mission work is that for the evangelizing of the women of Oriental lands. It is gratifying, therefore, to receive cheering news of the progress and bright prospects of one effort of the kind. It comes in a letter read at a recent meeting of the Presbyterian Woman's Mission Board in Chicago from Mrs. Van Hook. She has charge of a girls' school at Tabriz, Persia, and writes: "The domestic department of the school has never been so little of a burden. We have been absent in the mountains six weeks, and during our absence one of the girls—who came to us from the plain of Sooldorz five years ago utterly ignorant and uncouth—took entire charge of the family left at home, provided for them with as good economy as I could have used myself, and when I returned presented carefully kept accounts of each day's expenditure, and the whole perfectly balanced. In looking over them I thought I detected a mistake of one kran (fifteen cents), over which she cried most bitterly. I tried to comfort her because the amount was so small, but she said, 'It isn't the amount. I wanted it to be without a mistake.' To her great joy, it turned out to be a clerical error, made in copying. She now has charge of the domestic work and manages it most satisfactorily. Another new feature is a class, composed of twelve of the most advanced pupils, and the two young ladies who assist Mrs. Wilson, Miss Holliday and myself, who are having weekly lessons in nursing with Dr. Bradford, and have no other lesson over which they display so much enthusiasm. The spirit of the school is good. Happiness and contentment reign."

OPIUM RELINQUISHED.

OPIUM in a large number of cases marks "the parting of the ways" in China. If a convert addicted to the use of the drug is enabled to abandon it there is not much doubt of the sincerity of his conversion. One such case is reported by Mr. Hager of Hong Kong, in The Missionary Herald, as follows: "One of my colporteurs reported to me that a teacher in the high school was interested in Christianity, so I invited him to visit me. He had been a teacher for some twenty years, going now and then to the public examinations in order to secure the coveted degree. Though a devout Confucianist, he had contracted the habit of opium-smoking.

"Some months ago my colporteur gave him a number of books on Christianity, and he immediately became interested in the truth. But as he read he found that he must give up opium and other sins. At first it seemed difficult for him to accept such revolutionary doctrines, but one by one he gave up opium-smoking, the belief in necromancy and geomancy, the worship of idols and ancestors, and then, like a little child, he seemingly accepted the truth as it is in Jesus. He not only went to church himself, but tried to induce others to go. In his own way and without any particular teaching he learned to pray. When asked if he were ready to give up opium forever, he replied, 'I have not smoked for a month, and shall never smoke again.'"

"In his own village he is already known as one who has entered the 'Jesus Church,' but he seems to bear the ridicule with meekness and in a cheerful spirit. His position in the literary world gives him an influence over the people which I trust may be salutary in leading many souls to Christ. I was very severe in my examination, but every answer revealed the fact that he was ready to suffer all things for Christ."

A JAPANESE LADY'S REQUEST.

How the Bible alone, unexplained, operated on the soul of a Japanese lady moving her to seek the enlightenment of the Spirit was related by Rev. J. F. Gulick in the course of one of his missionary talks. He said: "A medical missionary at Osaka, Japan, had among his patients a lady of some intelligence and culture. He gave her a Testament, which she received politely, as a Japanese lady would surely do; but after looking at it carelessly, she laid it aside. Some weeks later she took the book and began reading the first page of Matthew. The more she read, the more deeply interested she became, and could scarcely leave the book until it was finished. Then she said, 'I must read it again, for I cannot take it all in at one reading,' so she read it right through a second time. Then she said, 'I must go to the man who gave me this book. Perhaps he can tell me about these great words of life.' So she started off to find the physician. When she reached his house he was not at home, but his wife was there. The first thing she said to the wife was, 'May I not receive the gift of the Holy Ghost?' Falling on her knees she said, 'Give me the gift of the Holy Ghost, that I may understand these things.' The good woman explained to her that this gift must be received from the Lord. So they read and prayed together until the physician himself returned; then the three talked and prayed together.

"Meanwhile the husband missed his wife, and as she had said something about going to the physician, he sought and found her there, and they all remained into the morning hours before they returned home. That woman is now an earnest Christian.

Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, the world missionary of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, has returned from her world tour. She has been absent from the country for eight years, during which time she has visited forty-four lands in the interest of temperance work.

"My dear fellow, Nature has given us bald heads but Cincinnati has given us Ivory Soap. Rub one blessing with the other blessing, and like the quality of Mercy, you are 'twice blessed.' Take my word for it, Ivory tempers the discomfort to the shorn man. It makes the hair and skin soft and pleasant to the touch. Just try it once!"

Here we have the delightfully fresh perfume of lavender, mingled with something which is strong and powerful, but not in the least degree unpleasant. These Lavender Salts will be found a delightful addition to every lady's toilet table, for they are beyond doubt the most agreeable deodorizer that exists. By leaving the stopper out of the bottle for a few minutes the air of any room will become purified, and the atmosphere rendered refreshing and invigorating.—Lady's Pictorial, London.

Encouragements to Faith.

207 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

The Rev. ANDREW MURRAY, in his popular work "Abide in Christ," has mentioned this book as one specially to be recommended for young, weak, or doubting Christians.

Here is a warm hand and a loving heart tendered you, in the name of the Lord, from one who harbors no doubts, and would gladly help you to break away from them. This book has greatly helped many Christians to a stronger faith in the blessed Lord Jesus; we earnestly hope that many more may be benefited by it.—Freemantle.

"This volume by J. W. Kimball, seems to be precisely such a one as a Christian would desire to put into the hands of any young man or woman troubled with doubts concerning the religious life. It has reference to the experience of the soul rather than the mind, and is in fact, a tender, confidential exhortation having its motive in love to cultivate faith in God."—Boston Advertiser.

AS GOD LEADS.

JUST as God leads me I would go;
I would not ask to choose my way,
Content with what he will bestow,
Assured he will not let me stray.
So as he leads, my path I make,
And step by step I gladly take,
A child in him confiding.

Just as God leads I am content;
I rest me calmly in his hands;
That which he has decreed and sent,
That which his will for me commands,
I would that he should all fulfill;
That I should do his gracious will,
In living or in dying.

Just as God leads, I all resign;
I trust me to my father's will;
When reason's rays deceptive shine,
His counsel would I yet fulfill;
That which his love ordained as right,
Before he brought me to the light,
My all to him resigning.

A JAPANESE CLERGYMAN.

IN a recent letter to the Independent, the Rev. Julius Soper, a missionary in Tokio, Japan, gives the following interesting details of a native clergyman. Mr. Soper heard him speak at a conference, and being astonished at his intelligence and eloquence made inquiries about him and learned the facts here given:

Mr. Honda was one of the first baptized Christians in Japan. He was baptized in Yokohama about twenty years ago, while a student, by the Rev. J. H. Ballagh (I think) of the Dutch Reformed Mission. Afterward, when the Rev. John Ing, of the Methodist Mission, organized a Methodist Episcopal Church in Hirosaki, Mr. Honda, joined that church. In 1878, Mr. Honda was ordained to the ministry, in Hakodate. For several years he worked as a regular preacher; he then located and gave himself to politics. For a while he was a member of the Ken-kwai (the Prefectural Assembly of his district), and became a prominent man in that section of the country; he also gained considerable national notoriety. He still continued to work as a local preacher in his own province, and helped to build up the Christian cause. When it was decided to establish the Imperial Diet, Mr. Honda was spoken of as the candidate for election from his province. He went to the United States in 1887, actually sent by his admirers, to study the political system of the country, with a view of being selected as their representative. There is no doubt that he would have been elected, had he not changed his mind after reaching the United States. He there decided to give up politics and devote himself to religion and education. His adherents, by his advice, then elected a Mr. Kikuchi, a warm personal friend of Mr. Honda, to the Imperial Diet.

After Mr. Honda reached the United States he had a wonderful escape from impending death. He was visiting Scranton, Penn., in company with two Japanese friends. One day they were out sight-seeing in the neighborhood. While out he got a little separated from his two friends; and, when halfway across a railroad bridge, he saw approaching an express train, just turning a bend in the road and about to cross the bridge. Death stared him in the face. Going in either direction was instant death! With great presence of mind, he lay down on the boards that rested on the cross-ties that supported the rails, and the train passed over him—he unharmed! His coat was torn a little. He had already been seriously thinking of giving up politics, and devoting himself to the moral and religious welfare of his people. This wonderful preservation determined the question; he felt God had spared him for some great purpose. He spent two years at Drew Theological Seminary, and returned to Japan last summer. He is now the President of the Anglo-Japanese College in Tokio, doing noble and faithful work for the Master.

AMONG COREAN WOMEN.

IN Corea as in China and other Oriental lands the women are secluded and treated as inferiors. In Corea, however, they are better off than in China, inasmuch as their feet are not crippled and distorted by the cruel bandages. But her world centres in a dirty kitchen which she has not ambition to clean, and as she is very seldom taught to read she becomes a dull, weary drudge. Mrs. M. F. Scranton, the wife of a missionary in Corea, has been making an effort to reach these poor creatures, and has met with much success. Other ladies have joined in the work and they have now regularly organized classes, well-attended. The Rev. H. G. Appenzeller, in writing to a contemporary from Seoul, Corea, gives the following report of the movement: Mrs. Scranton says that the chief difficulty consists in the fact that the women think so little and their ideas are very narrow. But the work of educating them was begun, then medical work, and finally direct evangelical work. This is the order in which they were introduced, and the labors are continued along these lines. Results are not to be looked for before the seed has had time to take root. Yet there are a few things that cheer us even while breaking the fallow ground. Corea has two girls' schools with an attendance of about forty; one hospital, where nearly 2,400 patients were treated the last year, and religious services are held regularly on the Sabbath with an attendance of upward of two hundred.

One of the ladies of the Presbyterian Mission has a weekly sewing-class at her own house where women of all ranks and conditions come, and while engaged in needle-work the Gospel story is read to them and explained. Another lady of the same mission has a class in the city away from her home. The hospital, in charge of a Methodist lady, is the centre of a very interesting and efficient Christian work. Sometimes women come, not because they are sick, but because they want to hear about "the new doctrine." A week or so ago a whole party asked admission at the gate, saying they had come to be taught. They entered the compound and made straight for the teacher, listened most attentively to the story told them, and when leaving said they would come again, and they did.

Last Sunday afternoon two ladies were walking on the city wall. They were followed by a number of children who sang in their own tongue, not only one stanza but the whole of "There is a happy land." Who these children were and where they learned it, these ladies did not know. The children may not be converted, but they carried a Christian song into more than one dark home. I heard parts of the same tune sung, and on looking around me found two little girls singing such parts as they had picked up when visiting their two older sisters, who are in a Christian school.

Several of the Christian girls in one of the schools mentioned above declined to go home on the native New Year. They felt they would be under obligation to take part in offering the annual sacrifice to the dead, and they therefore preferred to stay away.

DR. PIERSON'S LATEST WORK.

Stumbling Stones Removed from the Word of God

By REV. ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D.D.

18mo. Cloth, 50 cts.

In this little book many supposed difficulties of the Bible are shown not to be such in fact, and such simple rules of interpretation of a general character are laid down, as to make clear the literal truth of many passages which to some minds have previously been doubtful or only capable of the explanation that they were used metaphorically. The book is especially timely, now that general interest is turned toward the interpretation of the Scriptures.

SACRED MOUNT OLIVET.

The Hill of all Hills that Lies Closest to the Christian's Heart—Its Wondrous History.

On the eastern or sunniest side of Jerusalem, and separated from the city by the beautiful Valley of Jehoshaphat, lies a hilly ridge, dotted with trees. Some of the gravest scenes in the world's history, scenes of dramatic import to the whole human race, have been enacted upon its sloping heights. Over its crest David fled from his enemies; down its flowered pathways a greater than David came in triumphal progress to the Holy City. In its groves Solomon worshipped his idols. The garden at its foot, now resplendent in sunshine, now shadowed by passing clouds, witnessed Christ's agony and betrayal.

Comparatively little mention is made of the Mount of Olives in the Old Testament. David is described as going "up by the ascent of Olives," presumably on the western side of the hill, when he escaped during Absalom's rebellion and dwelt in the wilderness for a time. The heathen temples erected by Solomon, when he built a "high place for Chemosh on the hill that is before Jerusalem," are supposed to have given to the eminence the name of "The Mount of Corruption" by which it was known for a time after the wise but weak monarch had passed away, and the idolatrous evil had been effaced. Luke gives it the name of "Mount Elaion," which was probably the common appellation, but the other Evangelists simply describe it as Olivet, or the Mount of Olives, referring to the oil-producing trees that have grown there from time immemorial. The rabbins denominated it "The Mount of Anointing" probably from the same cause. The Mohammedan residents of Jerusalem at the present day call it "Jebel-el-Zeitun."

By whatever name the sacred mount is known matters little to the Christian, who associates it more closely with the life and times of the Saviour than any other hill in Palestine. Zion, Moriah, Scopus, Gibeah, Ramah, Mizpeh, Lebanon, and Carmel are nearly all greater in height and some of them are giants by comparison with Olivet, but none is so

Dear to the Christian Heart.

Around Olivet's gentle slopes hang the memories of the happiest and the saddest days in the human life of the Man of Sorrows. Viewed from St. Stephen's Gate, at the City Wall, it rises gradually in grey terraced slopes, interspersed with white limestone rocks, to a height of about six hundred feet. At its foot runs the Brook Kidron, winding in and out in picturesque fashion, and marking the dividing line between Olivet and Mount Moriah. Many roads cross it. At its central height is the Church of the Ascension. At its base and between it and Jerusalem, lies the Garden of Gethsemane. Its eastern declivity shades gradually off into the wilderness of Judea. From its wooded height can be seen Bethany, the Mount of Defence, and an eminence called by the monks the Viri Galilæi.

Save for the soft grey tint of the olive leaves the general aspect of the Mount is bleak and uninviting. Fig trees, too, abound and their dark green foliage somewhat relieves the picture, but as in the days of our Saviour, olive trees are the most abundant, dotting it everywhere in small clumps and in places set so thickly together as to form cool and inviting groves. Many of these trees are old and gnarled, and some of the more ancient date far back into forgotten generations. It may even be that a few of those trees that now look down on the Holy City were there in the days when

and that he stood at times under the shadow of their spreading branches, as he wandered on the slopes of the Mount, teaching his disciples.

When the Rev. Dr. Talmage, the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the publisher of this paper, visited the Holy Land last year, he was struck with the beauty of these olive trees which are regarded by all travellers as the most famous in the world. It was observed that in some places, where the trees grow so thickly together as to retard development, they were trimmed by lopping off large branches, and arrangements were subsequently made to secure a number of the limbs. These were taken to Jerusalem and placed in the hands of skilful workers in wood, who cut them into slabs and polished each section to a degree that brought out in the rarest perfection the beauties of the grain, with its rich, dark veinings and fine peculiar traceries, totally unlike the heart of any other tree. These slabs of olive wood thus prepared with consummate skill, were then ready for shipment to this country for purposes with which many readers of this journal will in due time be made acquainted. It may readily be imagined that it was no small task to arrange such an undertaking, and for several months almost every native worker in wood within the limits of the Sacred City was busily engaged on these slabs and it was even found necessary to hire workmen from Bethlehem.

In Prophecy

the Mount of Olives holds a prominent place. It is mentioned by Ezekiel in his wondrous an ancient caravan-road across it, from almost any point of which the buildings of Zion may be seen. On this road and presumably on the eastern slope of the Mount, the Saviour and his disciples walked when he said to them: "Go ye into the village which is opposite you and immediately ye shall find an ass tied and a colt with her. Having found them, bring them to me." And when they had brought them and the Saviour, mounting, had turned his face toward Jerusalem, the people of the village saw the procession advancing along the eastern ridge and the people from the city also. During the whole of the city and the temple were in full view. It was from the slope of Olivet that Jesus predicted the destruction of the temple. And it was to the foot of the Mount, to the beautiful Garden of Gethsemane, that he went with his disciples after the Last Supper, "and when they had sung a hymn."

That Ride of Triumph,

Concerning the most wondrous of all the events that took place on the Mount of Olives—the Ascension—there has been among eminent writers some difference of opinion as to the exact locality. Eusebius, Dr. Porter, Elliott, Williams, and other authorities, however, all agree that it took place there. Guides also indicate to visitors many other places of interest, including the tomb of Mary the mother of Christ, the spot where Jesus first said the Lord's Prayer, the tombs of the Prophets, the place where the Apostles composed the Creed (a sort of cavern,) and the knoll from which the disciples viewed the Ascension. On the eastern side of the hill are still pointed out the site of the blasted fig-tree, the tomb of Lazarus and the stone upon which the Saviour sat, when Mary and Martha came to him.

The Church of the Ascension.

originally erected by the Empress Helena, about three hundred and thirty-three years after Christ. Some three hundred and seventy years later, this modest edifice gave way to a more imposing one which was built about the year 700 A.D. That building, too disappeared in the course of centuries, and a mosque took its place. In the centre of an open court beside it, is a little domed building on a rock, and on the latter according to tradition, is the supposed impress of the foot of the Saviour, where he last touched the earth. The minaret and domes of the Church of the Ascension are the most conspicuous marks on the summit of Olivet. The Church is surrounded by a number of very poor buildings—mere hovels, in fact—called by the Arabs the Kefr-el-Tur.

Doubtless, the Roman soldiers did much toward denuding Olivet of trees, for the sappers and miners of Titus' army stripped the countryside of wood to use in the siege and for fuel. But there was a time when the trees on the hill-side grew thick as a forest. The illustration on this page shows the summit of Olivet as it is at the present day, and is reproduced from a photograph secured by Rev. Dr. Talmage during his recent visit. Whatever changes take place elsewhere in the world, Olivet will continue to the end of time to be a central spot of interest and attraction to Christian pilgrims from all lands.

O. Garden of Olives, thou dear honored spot,
The fame of thy glory shall ne'er be forgot;
The theme most transporting to seraphs above,
The triumph of sorrow, the triumph of love.

The "Mountain of Light" as the Arabs call Olivet, is not quite a mile from the village of Bethany. A favorite route for pilgrims is the road leading from Bethany across the Mount, supposed to be identical with that chosen by Christ. The descent to Gethsemane is steep and somewhat rocky. In the Garden, three trees are still shown, which are said to have been there in the Saviour's time—the Tree of Agony, beneath which he prayed so bitterly; vision of the Lord's departure from Jerusalem. The glory of the Lord first left the sanctuary and stood on the threshold; then it removed to a position over the East Gate of the Lord's house; then it went up and "stood upon the mountain which is upon the east side of the city" (Olivet). For three and a half years the Shekinah remained on Mount Olivet, calling to the Jews: "Return to me and I will return to you." In Nehemiah's time the Mount was studded with olive trees for he says: "Go forth unto the Mount and fetch olive branches and pine branches . . . to make booths." Most important of all is Zechariah's prophecy of our Lord's second coming, wherein he says: "His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east." (14: 4.)

ON MOUNT OLIVET'S SUMMIT.

During Christ's ministry on earth, this sacred Mount was practically his home, for he passed his days and nights amid its groves. There is which forms one of the group of fundamental facts in the Christian religion. It is built on the central point of the Mount, on a ridge that runs due north for about a mile and then sweeps westward, encircling a curve of the brook Kedron. From the Garden of Gethsemane up the slope of Olivet to the Church of the Ascension, there runs a slight depression which serves to make the Church stand out all the more prominent. The structure was the Tree where Judas betrayed his Master with a kiss and the Tree beneath which the disciples slept. Orientals declare that the Olive tree lives a thousand years, and that even after the branches fade, the roots still live and give forth new shoots. It is, therefore, not improbable that these trees are, at the roots, identical with those that flourished there during Jesus' life on earth.

THE GOSPEL OF THE WEATHER.

Dr. Talmage takes for his text: "Hath the rain a Father." Job 38 : 28.

THIS Book of Job has been the subject of unbounded theological wrangle. Men have made it the ring in which to display their ecclesiastical pugilism. Some say that the Book of Job is a true history; others, that it is an allegory; others, that it is an epic poem; others, that it is a drama. Some say that Job lived eighteen hundred years before Christ, others say that he never lived at all. Some say that the author of this book was Job; others, David; others, Solomon. The discussion has landed some in blank infidelity. Now, I have no trouble with the Books of Job or Revelation—the two most mysterious books in the Bible—because of a rule I adopted some years ago. I wade down into a Scripture passage as long as I can touch bottom, and when I cannot, then I wade out. I used to wade in until it was over my head, and then I got drowned. I study a passage of Scripture so long as it is a comfort and help to my soul; but when it becomes a perplexity and a spiritual upturning, I quit. In other words, we ought to wade in up to our heart, but never wade in until it is over our head. No man should ever expect to swim across this great ocean of divine truth. I go down into that ocean as I go down into the Atlantic Ocean at East Hampton, Long Island, just far enough to bathe; then I come out. I never had any idea that with my weak hand and foot I could strike my way clear over to Liverpool.

I suppose you understand your family genealogy. You know something about your parents, your grandparents, your great-grandparents. Perhaps you know where they were born, or where they died. Have you ever studied the parentage of the shower: "Hath the rain a father?" This question is not asked by a poetaster or a scientist, but by the head of the universe. To humble and to save Job, God asks him fourteen questions; about the world's architecture, about the refraction of the sun's rays, about the tides, about the snow crystal, about the lightnings, and then he arraigns him with the interrogation of the text: "Hath the rain a father?" With the scientific wonders of the rain I have nothing to do. A minister gets through with that kind of sermons within the first three years, and if he has piety enough he gets through with it in the first three months. A sermon has come to me to mean one word of four letters: "help!" You all know that the rain is not an orphan. You know it is not cast out of the gates of heaven a foundling. You would answer the question of my text in the affirmative. Safely housed during the storm, you hear the rain beating against the window pane, and you find it searching all the crevices of the window sill. It first comes down in solitary drops, pattering the dust, and then it deluges the fields and angers the mountain torrents, and makes the traveller implore shelter. You know that the rain is not an accident of the world's economy. You know it was born of the cloud. You know it was rocked in the cradle of the wind. You know it was sung to sleep by the storm.

You know that it is a flying evangel from heaven to earth. You know it is the Gospel of the weather. You know that God is its father.

If this be true, then, how wicked is our murmuring about climatic changes. The first eleven Sabbaths after I entered the ministry it stormed. Through the week it was clear weather, but on the Sabbaths the old country meeting-house looked like Noah's Ark before it landed. A few drenched people sat before a drenched pastor; but most of the farmers stayed at home and thanked God that what was bad for the church was good for the crops. I committed a good deal of sin in those days in denouncing the weather. Ministers of the Gospel sometimes fret about stormy Sabbaths, or hot Sabbaths, or inclement Sabbaths. They forget the fact that the same God who ordained the Sabbath and sent forth his ministers to announce salvation, also ordained the weather. "Hath the rain a father?"

Merchants, also, with their stores filled with new goods, and their clerks hanging idly around the counters, commit the same transgression. There have been seasons when the whole spring and fall trade has been ruined by protracted wet weather. The merchants then examined the "weather probabilities" with more interest than they read their Bibles. They watched for a patch of blue sky. They went complaining to the store, and came complaining home again. In all that season of wet feet, and dripping garments, and impassable streets, they never once asked the question: "Hath the rain a father?"

So agriculturists commit this sin. There is nothing more annoying than to have planted corn rot in the ground because of too much moisture, or hay all ready for the mow dashed of a shower, or wheat almost ready for the sickle spoiled with the rust. How hard it is to bear the agricultural disappointments. God has infinite resources, but I do not think he has capacity to make weather to please all the farmers. Sometimes it is too hot, or it is too cold; it is too wet, or it is too dry; it is too early, or it is too late. They forget that the God who promised seed time and harvest, summer and winter, cold and heat, also ordained all the climatic changes. There is one question that ought to be written on every barn, on every fence, on every haystack, on every farmhouse. "Hath the rain a father?"

If we only knew what a vast enterprise it is to provide appropriate weather for this world, we would not be so critical of the Lord. Isaac Watts, at ten years of age, complained that he did not like the hymns that were sung in the English Chapel. "Well," said his father, "Isaac, instead of your complaining about the hymns, go and make hymns that are better." And he did go and make hymns that were better. Now, I say to you, if you do not like the weather, get up a weather company, and have a president, and a secretary, and a treasurer, and a board of directors, and ten million dollars of stock, and then provide weather that will suit all of us. There is a man who has a weak head, and he cannot stand the glare of the sun. You must have a cloud always hovering over him. I like the sunshine; I cannot live without plenty of sunlight, so you must always have enough light for me. Two ships meet in mid-Atlantic. The one is going to Southampton, and the other is coming to New York. Provide weather that, while it is abast for one ship, it is not a head wind for the other. There is a farm that is dried up for the lack of rain, and here is a pleasure-party going out for a field-excursion. Provide weather that will suit the dry farm and the pleasure-excursion. No, sirs, I will not take one dollar of stock in your weather company. There is only one Being in the universe who knows enough to provide the right kind of weather for this world. "Hath the rain a father?"

My text also suggests God's minute supervisal. You see the Divine Sonship in every drop of rain. The jewels of the shower are not flung away by a spendthrift who knows not how many he throws or where they fall. They are all shining princes of heaven. They all have an eternal lineage. They are all the children of a King. "Hath the rain a father?" Well, then, I say if God takes notice of every minute raindrop, he will take notice of the most insignificant affair of my life. It is the astronomical view of things that bothers me. We look up into the night-heavens, and we say: "Worlds! worlds!" and how insignificant we feel! We stand at the foot of Mount Washington or Mont Blanc, and we feel that we are only insects, and then we say to ourselves: "Though the world is so large, the sun is one million four hundred thousand times larger." "O!" we say, "it is no use, if God wheels that great machinery through immensity, he will not take the trouble to look down at me." Infidel conclusion. Saturn, Mercury, and Jupiter are no more rounded, and weighed, and swung by the hand of God than are the globules on a lilac-bush the morning after a shower. God is no more in magnitudes than he is in minutiae. If he has scales to weigh the mountains, he has balances delicate enough to weigh the infinitesimal. You can no more see Him through the telescope than you can see him through the microscope; no more when you look up than when you look down. Are not the hairs of your head all numbered? and if Himalaya has a God, "hath not the rain a father?" I take this doctrine of a particular Providence, and I thrust it into the very midst of your every day life. If God fathers a rain-drop, is there anything so insignificant in your affairs that God will not father that? When Druyse, the gunsmith, invented the needle-gun, which decided the battle of Sadowa, was it a mere accident? When a farmer's boy showed Blucher a short cut by which he could bring his army up soon enough to decide Waterloo for England, was it a mere accident? When Lord Byron took a piece of money and tossed it up to decide whether or not he should be affianced to Miss Millbank, was it a mere accident which side of the money was up and which was down? When the Christian army were besieged at Beziers, and a drunken drummer came in at midnight and rang the alarm bell, not knowing what he was doing, but waking up the host in time to fight their enemies that moment arriving, was it an accident? When, in one of the Irish wars, a starving mother, flying with her starving child, sank down and fainted on the rocks in the night and her hand fell on a warm bottle of milk, did that just happen so? God is either in the affairs of men, or our religion is worth nothing at all, and you had better take it away from us, and instead of this Bible, which teaches the doctrine, give us a secular book, and let us, as the famous Mr. Fox, the member of Parliament, in his last hour, cry out: "Read me the eighth book of Virgil." O! my friends, let us rouse up to an appreciation of the fact that all the affairs of our life are under a King's command, and under a Father's watch. Alexander's war horse, Bucephalus, would allow anybody to mount him when he was unharnessed; but as soon as they put on that war horse, Bucephalus, the saddle, and the trappings of the conqueror, he would allow no one but Alexander to touch him. And if a soulless horse could have so much pride in his owner, shall not we immortals exult in the fact that we are owned by a King? "Hath the rain a father?"

Again, my subject teaches me that God's dealings with us are inexplicable. That was the original force of my text. The rain was a great mystery to the ancients. They could not understand how the water should get into the cloud, and getting there, how it should be suspended, or falling, why it should come down in drops. Modern science comes along and says there are two portions of air of different temperature, and they are charged with moisture, and the one portion of air decreases in temperature so the water may no longer be held in vapor, and it falls. And they tell us that some of the clouds that look to be only as large as a man's hand, and to be almost quiet in the heavens, are great mountains of mist four thousand feet from base to top, and that they rush miles a minute. But after all the brilliant experiments of Dr. James Hutton, and Saussure, and other scientists, there is an infinite mystery about the rain. There is an ocean of the unfathomable in every rain-drop, and God says to-day as he said in the time of Job: "If you cannot understand one drop of rain, do not be surprised if my dealings with you are inexplicable." Why does that aged man, decrepit, beggared, vicious, sick of the world, and the world sick of him, live on, while here is a man in mid-life, consecrated to God, hard-working, useful in every respect, who dies? Why does that old gossip, gadding along the street about everybody's business but her own, have such good health, while the Christian mother, with a flock of little ones about her whom she is preparing for usefulness and for heaven—the mother who you think could not be spared an hour from that household—why does she lie down and die with a cancer? Why does that man, selfish to the core, go on adding fortune to fortune, consuming everything on himself, continue to prosper, while that man, who has been giving ten per cent. of all his income to God and the Church, goes into bankruptcy? Before we make stark fools of ourselves, let us stop pressing this everlasting “why.” Let us worship where we cannot understand. Let a man take that one question “Why?” and follow it far enough, and push it, and he will land in wretchedness and perdition. We want in our theology fewer interrogation marks and more exclamation points. Heaven is the place for explanation. Earth is the place for trust. If you cannot understand so minute a thing as a rain-drop, how can you expect to understand God’s dealings? “Hath the rain a father?”

“O,” you say, a tear is nothing but a drop of limpid fluid secreted by the lachrymal gland—is only a sign of weak eyes.” Great mistake. It is one of the Lord’s richest benedictions to the world. There are people in Blackwell’s Island insane asylum, and at Utica, and at all the asylums of this land, who were demented by the fact that they could not cry at the right time. There are a great many in the grave who could not stand any longer under the glacier of trouble. If that glacier had only melted into weeping, they could have endured it. There have been times in your life when you would have given the world, if you had possessed it, for one tear. You could shriek, you could blaspheme, but you could not cry. Have you never seen a man holding the hand of a dead wife, who had been all the world to him? The temples livid with excitement, the eye dry and frantic, no moisture on the upper or lower lid. You saw there were bolts of anger in the cloud, but no rain. “To your Christian comfort, he said: “Don’t talk to me about God, there is no God; or if there is I hate him; don’t talk to me about God; would he have left me and these motherless children?” But a few hours or days after, coming across some lead pencil that she owned in life, or some letters which she wrote when he was away from home, with an outcry that appalls, there bursts the fountain of tears, and as the sunlight of God’s consolation strikes that fountain of tears, you find out that it is a tender-hearted merciful, pitiful, and all-compassionate God who was the father of that rain.

“O,” you say, “it is absurd to think that God watches over tears.” No, my friends. There are three or four kinds of them that God counts, bottles, and eternizes. First, there are all parental tears, and there are more of these than of any other kind, because the most of the race die in infancy, and that keeps parents mourning all around the world. They never get over it. They may live to shout and sing afterwards, but there is always a corridor in the soul that is silent, though it once resounded.

Then there are the filial tears. Little children soon get over the loss of parents. They are easily diverted with a new toy. But where is the man that has come to thirty, or forty, or fifty years of age, who can think of the old people without having all the fountains of his soul stirred up? You may have had to take care of her a good many years, but you never can forget how she used to take care of you. There have been many sea-captains converted in our church, and the peculiarity of them was that they were nearly all prayed ashore by their mothers, though the mothers went into the dust soon after they went to sea. Have you never heard an old man in delirium of some sickness, call for his mother? The fact is we get so used to calling for her the first ten years of our life we never get over it, and when she goes away from us it makes deep sorrow. Yes, and God also is Father of the rain of repentance. Did you ever see a rain of repentance? Do you know what it is that makes a man repent? I see people going around trying to repent. They cannot repent. Do you know, no man can repent until God helps him to repent? How do I know? By this passage: “Him hath God exalted to be a prince and a Saviour to give repentance.” O! it is a tremendous hour when one wakes up and says: “I am a bad man, I have not sinned against the laws of the land, but I have wasted my life; God asked me for my services, and I haven’t given those services. O! my sins, oh Lord, God forgive me.” In a religious assemblage, a man arose and said: “I have been a very wicked man; I broke my mother’s heart; I became an infidel; but I have seen my evil way, and I have surrendered my heart to God; but it is a grief I never can get over that my parents should never have heard of my salvation; I don’t know whether they are living or dead.” While yet he was standing in the audience, a voice from the gallery said: “Oh! my son, my son!” He looked up, and he recognized her. It was his old mother. She had been praying for him for a great many years, and when, at the foot of the cross, the prodigal son and the praying mother embraced each other, there was a rain, a tremendous rain, of tears, and God was the Father of those tears. O! that God would break us down with a sense of our sin, and then lift us with an appreciation of his mercy.

The king of Carthage was dethroned. His people rebelled against him. He was driven into banishment. His wife and children were outrageously abused. Years went by, and the king of Carthage made many friends. He gathered up a great army. He marched again toward Carthage. Reaching the gates of Carthage, the best men of the place came out bare-footed and bare-headed, and with ropes around their necks, crying for mercy. They said: “We abused you and we abused your family, but we cry for mercy.” The king of Carthage looked down upon the people from his chariot and said: “I came to bless, I didn’t come to destroy. You drove me out, but this day I pronounce pardon for all the people. Open the gate and let the army come in.” The king marched in and took the throne, and the people all shouted: “Long live the king!” My friends, you have driven the Lord Jesus Christ, the King of the Church, away from your heart; you have been maltreating him all these years; but he comes back today. He stands in front of the gates of your soul. If you will only pray for his pardon, he will meet you with his gracious spirit and he will say: “Thy sins and thine iniquities I will remember no more. Open wide the gate; I will take the throne. My peace I give unto you.” And then, all through this audience, from the young and from the old, there will be a rain of tears, and God will be the Father of that rain!

A N ACT OF CRUELTY was perpetrated at Jacksonville, Fla., by a number of mischievous boys recently. The Metropolis of that city says that as a fisherman was returning to his home on a moonlight night he saw a large turtle leisurely moving seaward. It was larger than he could carry, so he turned it over on its back beyond high-water mark and went home for a cart to secure it. During his absence some boys saw the turtle and the fisherman’s dog watching it. They tied the dog securely to the turtle and turned the latter over, to see which would prove the stronger. Once on its feet the turtle made for the water and in spite of the dog’s struggles dragged it after it. The boys ran after the pair meaning to separate them, but it was too late. The turtle was in the sea and the dog’s howls were soon silenced. It was a fatal bond that held the two together, for the dog could not live in the element which was natural to the turtle. The fate of the dog has a lesson in it for young Christians who propose entering into the marriage bond with a worldling. Many a child of God has been dragged down into the mire by such an alliance, with a result fatal to spiritual life. (Deuter. 7:3, 4.)

THE LAST CRUISE of a famous old ship commenced a few days ago. The frigate Constellation, now almost a hundred years old, has been once more repaired and taken to the Naval Academy preparatory to her summer cruise with three classes of naval cadets. This is to be her last cruise, for a new practice-ship is being built which is expected to be ready next year. The Constellation will then be struck off the naval list. She was built in 1795. Three years after being launched, she fought and captured the French ship L’Insurgente; the next year she was engaged with another French ship—La Vengeance, and again the victory was with the Constellation; and her commander, Commodore Truxton received a gold medal from Congress. Her next and greatest fight was in 1803, when she was surrounded off the coast of Tripoli by a fleet of gunboats. It seemed a hopeless case, but she fought her way clear with flying colors. She is still a staunch vessel, but is now unfit for modern warfare, and would be no match for an ironclad carrying heavy guns. She has therefore been condemned as too antiquated for service, in spite of her illustrious record. An effort is being made in our day to have the Bible and the Church condemned on the same ground; but there is no justification for the effort, as both are impregnable, and have never ceased to win victories for God over his enemies. (Numbers 35:29.)

A MARRIAGE DELAYED twenty years by a misdirected letter was celebrated last week, at Rochester, Minn. Twenty-three years ago, says a Chicago dispatch, a young man commenced business in Rochester, and worked hard to make a home and income for a bride. The bride’s father had objected to him as a husband for his daughter on the ground of his youth and his poverty. He had promised, however, to consent to the union if at the end of three years, he was prosperous in business, if in the meantime, there was no communication between the young people. At the end of the three years, the condition was fulfilled, and the young man wrote to renew his offer. The young lady did not receive the letter and after waiting four years, concluded he had forgotten her or had changed his mind and she married another suitor. The lover wondered that no answer came to his letter and considered the silence a sign that his offer was rejected. It was more than a year before the matter was explained. The girl’s family had removed from Chicago to Milwaukee, Wis. He knew their new address, but as most of his letters were to correspondents in Chicago he thoughtlessly wrote the name of that city on the envelope instead of Milwaukee, though he wrote the street and number of the new address correctly. After many delays, while the post-office people were vainly trying to deliver the letter, it was returned to him through the dead letter office. It was then too late. A few months ago, however, hearing that the girl he loved had become a widow, he renewed his offer and on June 30th, they were married. It has often happened that union with Christ, has been delayed by an error, but never by an error of that kind. The seeker cannot believe the invitations and promises of the Gospel are for him, although they are for “whosoever will.” (Rev. 22:17.)

A TIMELY WARNING saved many lives in the recent Cherokee inundation. A press dispatch from Fort Dodge, Iowa, says that a member of the Fire Department, who was on duty on the night of the storm, became alarmed at the continuous downpour and about three o’clock in the morning ventured out into the valley to see what mischief was likely to ensue. He found the entire bottom flooded, and, hurrying back to the station, sounded the fire bell continuously. The citizens were awakened and realized their danger only just in time to dress and fly to the hills. Many of them had to wade through a foot of water before they could reach the bridge, which was their only way of escape. Every house was flooded and most of them were swept away and dashed to pieces against the bridge. Some people who were not awakened or did not realize their danger were dragged out of their homes by their wiser friends. The mules and live stock were swept down the stream and drowned. Ministers of the Gospel are engaged in a work like that which the fireman did, although the people, whom they warn of their danger do not realize it, and sometimes the preachers themselves do not preach with the earnestness the occasion demands. (Ezek. 33:3-6.)

A VIGOROUS and importunate prayer was made in New York on Sunday, June 21. A number of Chinamen visited the Joss’ house and prayed. Then they went away and brought in a small roast pig which they laid on the altar. More prayers were offered by one of their number, and the company fervently joined in them. Again they quitted the temple and spent some time in collecting tin horns and other musical instruments with which to produce the melodies they love. All the neighborhood echoed with the thrilling sounds when they again surrounded the Joss, and every Chinaman within hearing distance was aware that some of his countrymen were supplicating for some favor on which their hearts were very earnestly set. The favor they were seeking was that their Joss would soften the heart of the Chinaman who, about a month ago, was appointed by the Mayor of New York a mandarin or policeman of the Chinese colony in the Sixth Precinct. Immediately on his entering on the duties of his office he had closed all the fan-tan or gambling houses, and resolutely kept them closed. Large bribes were offered him by the gambling-house-keepers; he had been coaxed and threatened, but all in vain. They then resorted to the Joss, and they pledged themselves that if the mandarin’s heart was softened, they would bring the first hundred dollars that they could cheat their countrymen out of and present it to the Joss as an offering of thanksgiving. Their reason seems to have been dulled by the process which blunted their conscience, or they would have perceived that a being who would accept such a bargain was not worthy of worship. The same mistake is often made by men who call themselves Christians. They ask God’s blessing and give liberally to his cause while living on ill-gotten gain, and while conducting their business on selfish principles which are his abhorrence. To all such God says: “Thou thoughtest I was altogether such an one as thyself; but I will reprove thee.” (Ps. 50:21, 23.)

CHRIST'S FIRST MIRACLE

S. S. Lesson for July 19. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 2 : 1-11. Golden Text, John 2 : 11.

THREE days had passed by since the wonderful revelation of Jesus to John the Baptist as "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." This revelation was a new era in John's life; it was more, he saw it as the central point of all history, it was the beginning of days to him, for John saw, as those in heaven see, all else centering in "the Lamb as it had been slain." (Rev. 5:6.) John did not see all that the Spirit of God through the Word has given us to see: he never saw that slain Lamb "in the midst of the throne." He who was as a Lamb dumb before her shearers, which openeth not her mouth, is now in the very place of power! John did not fully understand what life would flow out of his death, what power out of his weakness, what dominion out of his submission, what glory out of his humiliation. Paul learned and taught that, because he emptied himself, and "became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross,"

Therefore,

"God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name." It was like a little rehearsal in miniature, first, the revelation of the Lamb of God; then, the next day and the day after, the call to discipleship; and then, on the third day, the marriage. Are our lives so lived that our dates and reckonings, our reasons and our motives all have their sources from above? Is Jesus to us the beginning and the ending of all things? This is the privilege of the child of God, "born from above," seated with Christ in "heavenly places," "called with a heavenly calling," having his citizenship in heaven. Christ's vocation upon earth was not simply to save us from eternal death, but to bring heaven's light and heaven's life down to earth. He was God "manifest in the flesh." He took on him the likeness of sinful flesh, to make it, in his own person, a practically transparent thing, which God could shine through. All of earth, all of man had become defiled, but he took the defiled thing through death, that it might have a new life through his indwelling, and so make all things new; and his presence brings heaven into all the relations of life where he is fully recognized.

"The third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee. It was doubtless in Joseph's family, for 'the mother of Jesus was there; and both Jesus was called, and his disciples to the marriage.'"

Marriage is no Light Thing;

it was instituted before man fell, and is spoken of as the type of the very closest relationship of Christ with his church. (Eph. 5:23-33.) Perhaps the most complete and perfect opportunity to live out the true Christ life, the living not unto ourselves, but in the name, in the interests, in the very life of another is given in married life. There must be the yielding of the will, the considering another before ourselves, the daily taking up of crosses which others may never dream of,—all have ample scope in the married life of almost all who are true followers of the Lamb. Praise God for such a precious school, when the Holy Spirit makes conscience of every detail of life as an exercise of unselfish love, and self-renouncing unity. It is a blessed thing when Jesus is called, not only to the marriage feast, but to preside over the whole of the married life.

The presence of Jesus at the humble marriage feast was perhaps the very means of a discovering need. Wine failed, it was the common drink of the country, and there was not sufficient for the supply of the company. To the mother of Jesus this was an important matter, and she turned naturally to Jesus and said, "They have no wine." Of how many a marriage, of how many a family it may be said, "There is a great lack; they have no wine, none of the new wine of the kingdom, none of the grace which is in Christ Jesus." Mary knew from whence help would come, and yet it was not for her to dictate. Jesus answered next: "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come." Master of all the universe as he is, Jesus would not work a miracle, nor do anything,

Until His Hour was Come.

He trusted his Father's wisdom for times and seasons in the smallest details of life. It is such a trust which alone can take the hurry out of a busy life. We are "God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works which God hath prepared beforehand that we should walk in them." It is dangerous to go forward into any duty without the distinct preparation of the Master. He alone knows how much time such and such a duty may take, and if he permits an interruption or a delay, he is responsible for it; and it is an exercise of faith whether we will take it from his hand or not. Mary now found another service; she said unto the servants, " whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." This was the essential thing, that every spirit and every person should be subject to him. He can only turn water into wine when and where all is yielded to him: his hour is not come until this is done. How much there is in the family life of many which he could change and regulate, and bring the light of heaven into, but his hour is not come, because some member or members of the family are not yet decided to do whatsoever he says! All is ripe where all bows before Jesus, then he can work. "Fill the water pots with water." Why fill them now in the end of the feast?

"Whatsoever

he saith unto you, do it." True obedience can go forward without waiting for explanation. "They filled them up to the brim." "Draw out now and bear unto the governor of the feast. And they bare it." Not a touch, not a word, and yet the thing was done; the presence of Jesus was power. When all is subject to him in a heart, in a home, in a church, or anywhere else, he can give command without words, he can work miracles without touch, his very presence has transforming power.

"When the ruler of the feast had tasted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was (but the servants which drew the water knew,) the governor of the feast called the bridegroom, and saith unto him, Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine, and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse, but thou hast left the good wine until now." Man's best is always first, man seeks to show all he has, all his little resources, and O, how little they are, and how soon exhausted. But God works upon the ruin of the flesh. "All flesh is grass," (Isa. 40:6,) and just where the flesh fails, there God can create. Just as soon as we come to know we have nothing we can count upon, he can take our little all, and make something out of nothing, wine out of water, food for five thousand men out of five loaves and two small fishes, men who turn the world upside down out of unlearned men.

"This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and ### Manifested Forth His Glory."

These words are spoken of no other miracle that he wrought. Many might think it was hardly worth while to work a miracle in order to provide wine for a humble marriage feast. But God's ways are not as our ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts. Many a wondrous miracle of God is wrought by the fireside in a humble home, many a drunkard's wife, many an unconverted parent's child, many an unconverted child's father or mother, has experienced the wonder-working power of God in exigencies of which no man has ever known. But Jesus has counted it worth his while, and those who have seen his glory in the victories of a humble life may one day reign with him in his glory.

HERNDON'S COMPACT.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for July 19 :
"This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth his glory."—John 2 : 11.

SOME thirty or forty boys were gathered in the quadrangle of a large school ready to set out on a paper-chase through a richly wooded country. They had got through their lessons early, and would have nearly four hours of daylight for their fun. And there would be good fun, too; every one knew that. These paper-chases were the best times of the term.

"Where is Herndon?" asked one of the leaders. "Don't start without him. Go and find him, Brown."

"Come along, Herndon," Brown said, meeting the missing boy at the door of his room. "We are all waiting for you."

"I am not going to-day," said the boy. "I have promised to stay with Hardale. He is terribly sick, you know."

"Oh, don't be silly. He has the nurse with him, and if she wants any help she can call Thomas. We shall have no end of fun."

"I know, but Hardale is expecting me, and he has enough pain to bear without having to suffer more through disappointment. You can get along without me better than he can."

"It's too bad; I think you're silly," said Brown, and he went off to join the party while Herndon went to the sick ward.

If he felt any regret at missing the fun, as he probably did, being a healthy, energetic lad, naturally fond of outdoor games, it vanished as he saw the glad smiles of welcome on Hardale's wan face at his entrance. "I was afraid you would not come," the sick boy said. "Thomas said there was to be a paper-chase, and I expected you would want to go. It is awfully good of you to stay with me. I have been counting the hours till you could come. Are you very sorry not to go?"

"I am glad to be here, as you wanted me. We'll have plenty more paper-chases yet. I can spare one. Now, what can I do for you?"

"Well, most of all, I want a letter written to my folks at home. Nurse and Thomas are very good to me, but neither of them can manage that like you can. I have to dictate it and tell them how to spell the words. It is almost as much of a bore as writing. I am so terribly weak now."

Herndon found the writing materials, and, sitting down by the bed, wrote the letter on the basis of the disjointed hints the sick boy gave him. It was read over when it was finished, and pronounced very good.

"Now tell me about the boys and how the classes are, and what has been going on in school while I have been lying here."

All the news was given and talked over.

"Now, would you mind reading to me a little?" was the next request.

"Just what I expected," Herndon said. "I thought you would want that, so I brought a book with me that my sister sent me. It is one of Kingsley's stories. I never read it, and I don't think you have."

"That's good," said the sick boy, his eyes brightening. "Go ahead. It will be the greatest treat you can give me. I can't read myself; it hurts my eyes since I have been so weak and nurse cannot spare the time, and if she could, it would not be like your reading."

"Ah! that has been enjoyable," said Hardale, when an hour later the nurse appeared and insisted on the book being closed and her patient settling down for a good night's sleep. "I have almost forgotten," the sick boy continued, "how full of pain I was. The hours don't go so fast as this at other times. I declare I am better. You're better than medicine, Herndon. What makes you so different from the other boys? I don't believe there is one beside you who would have given up the fun to spend the evening with a sick chum."

"Oh, don't make so much of it, Hardale. I've enjoyed it, too. Now hurry up and get well. Good night."

The boy was honest. He had enjoyed the evening for, somehow, the pleasure the invalid showed in his company more than balanced his regret for the pleasure he had missed. And then, too, there was a secret joy in having carried out a compact he and that sister of his at home had made together. She was three years older than he, but they had been close companions and had talked much together about the way to make the best of their lives. "I believe," his sister had said one day, "we cannot find any better way than in trying to make other people happy. It is Christ-like. You remember that when Jesus worked his first miracle to relieve the embarrassment of some friends it was said that in doing so he manifested forth his glory. We cannot work miracles, but we can often do something to help others and that will manifest glory, the glory of the Saviour's spirit within us."

Herndon thought his sister was right and they had promised each other that they would try to live that kind of life. It seemed to him as he went home from his friend's room to his own, that night, from what Hardale had said, that the glory must have been manifested. Not his own glory but that of the Spirit of his Lord which prompted him to do as he had.

LESSON POINTS

Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

AND both Jesus was called, and his disciples, to the marriage. It is said that many years ago a young man, who had conceived a bright business project, being anxious to secure the funds necessary to put it into active operation, called on one of the Rothschilds, the most famous bankers of the age, with a view to securing the pecuniary assistance required. Baron Rothschild after due investigation, being convinced that the scheme was a meritorious one and likely to prove profitable, without responding to the young man's solicitation, directly invited him to join him in a visit to the Exchange.

After walking arm in arm for a little while, he turned to the young man and said: "my friend you will now have no difficulty in securing all the assistance you require the only difficulty will be to choose among those, who will be willing to stand by you" after which, he shook his hand and bade him good-by. And so, indeed, it was. Wherever the young man went to submit his proposition and invite co-operation, he found the most prompt and cordial response. He was recognized as a gentleman who had walked arm in arm with the great banker, and who therefore must be considered worthy of credit and confidence.

Much depends on the company we keep. In all probability, these disciples would not have been invited had they not been disciples of Jesus. And so at the end of life's journey only those who delight here below to walk with him and rejoice to be numbered among his disciples will be invited to the Marriage Feast of the Lamb and find the fine linen of the righteousness of the Saints and a royal welcome awaiting them on their entrance to the New Jerusalem.

Mine hour is not yet come. God in his own time will do what is best for us. We must not be impatient if our prayers are not immediately answered, or answered according to our ideas. When we come down to the end of life and look back upon the kindly leadings of Providence we will recognize the fact that Divine wisdom is superior to human wisdom and that having been led in God's way and by God's hand, all is well with our souls, whereas had our own desires been gratified in our way, temptations beyond our ability to bear might have wrecked our eternal happiness. Sometimes the followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene cannot understand why poverty should be their lot here below, while others less faithful and less consistent are blessed with an abundance of wealth, yet God knows what is best and happy are we if early in life we submit to him and learn to say from the depths of our heart:

Lord, I would clasp thy hand in mine,
Nor ever murmur or repine.
Content whatever lot I see,
Since 'tis my God that leadeth me.

Some eighteen months ago, the beautiful daughter of wealthy parents failed to put in an appearance one morning at breakfast. Rapping at the door, eliciting no response, the parents became alarmed and forcing the latch, they found their only daughter apparently dead, holding in her hands a bottle labeled "Poison." Almost frantic with grief, the father snatched the bottle and hastened to the druggist, whose name appeared on the label and excitedly demanded information as to what the bottle had contained. The druggist asked him if his daughter was a tall brunette with dark eyes, and upon receiving an affirmative reply, stated that there was no cause for alarm. The young lady had called last night and in great agitation asked for some poison to kill rats, but noticing that she was not in a condition to be safely entrusted with poison he had substituted some innocent mixture, fearing lest if he refused some other druggist, less careful might gratify her desire to her own hurt. A few hours rest, he continued, would bring her around all right. Greatly relieved, the father returned and to his unutterable joy found that his daughter, as the druggist, had stated had awakened from sleep. When she realized what she had escaped she thanked God that her desire was not gratified and that the druggist in his wisdom had not given her what she had asked for.

PROPHETIC PERIODS.

An Epitome of Professor Totten's Views on Prophetic Chronology.

PROPHETIC students throughout the country have been deeply interested in the letters and articles which have been published by the secular press recently, in reference to the mathematical and chronological calculations of Lieut. C.

A. L. Totten, who is professor of military tactics in Yale University. Their interest, however, is rather in the conclusion which Professor Totten has reached, than in the process by which he has reached it. That process is extremely difficult to follow, owing to the abstruse and complicated system which he adopts. Beside this difficulty, there is another, which arises from the fact that in the various books and journalistic articles which the Professor has written, he gives us only prominent facts and dates, the relevancy of which is not apparent to the ordinary reader. They evidently have served him as stepping-stones in his course over the river of time, past and future, but in what way they have done so, he has nowhere explained. An instance in point is the stress he lays on the precise date of Joshua's long day, (Joshua 10: 12, 15), which he appears to make a pivotal date in his calculations. In what way the identification of this date affects the chronology of prophetic periods is not obvious.

The Startling Conclusion

of the Professor's calculations, however, is not left doubtful. In a letter which he sent to the writer a short time ago, he says: "The Antichrist is about to be manifested, probably at the end of this year. The Advent (Parousia) is at hand. Three and a half years thereafter will see 666 in the temple. Three and a half years of Jacob's trouble will follow, ending with the three and a half days of the dead 'witnesses,' and then, thank God! the end. That will be 2520 years from Nabopolassar and six thousand years of the world's luni-solar existence." In his published works this date—that of the end of the dispensation and the beginning of the millennial reign of Christ—is fixed at a time not later than Passover Day, March, 1899. "This year," he says, "dating from April 9, 1891 to March 29, 1892, is the final year of grace."

The Seventieth Heptad.

This statement is easy to follow. If, as the Professor believes, the final end of the dispensation should be on or about Passover day 1899, then the years from 1892 to that date will be the seven years com; rehended in Daniel's seventieth week. (Daniel 9: 27.) Those seven years, whenever they commence will be marked by the events enumerated by Prof. Totten. There is no difference of opinion among students of prophecy on that point. The manifestation of Anti-Christ and his negotiation of a covenant with the Jews to restore their nationality will be a signal recognized by every watcher of the times. When that takes place, we shall know that we have entered upon the last seven years of the dispensation and shall know in outline the events that will characterize them. There will come the rapture of the waiting believers, the declaration of the blasphemous pretensions of the federal head of the decem-regal confederacy, the persecution of all who will not concede those claims, the violation "in the midst of the week" of the Covenant with the Jews and the final conflict at Armageddon when Christ will descend to take vengeance and take to himself his power and reign. All the events of those seven years are clearly mapped out. It is of the intervening years, the long period stretching from the day when "Messiah was cut off, but not for himself." (Daniel 9: 26), to the present time, that prophecy is silent. Seventy weeks were determined or set apart—Daniel was told—for certain definite purposes (Daniel 9: 24), and they were to be in three portions: seven weeks, three score and two weeks and one week. The sixty-nine weeks ended at Calvary and the parenthetic period, of which Daniel knew nothing, began. The final week of the seventy, the last seven years of this dispensation still remain to be fulfilled.

The Question to be Determined and to which Prof. Totten believes he has found the answer, is the length of this parenthetic dispensation under which we live and which has already lasted 1858 years. Several periods are mentioned in prophecy as guides by which to calculate. The most important are the 2,300 years (Daniel 8: 13-14), the 1335 years and the 1290 years. (Daniel 12: 11-12.)

There is besides these periods, another of six thousand years, which is a matter of inference not of specific statement. It has long been thought that in the counsels of him, with whom "one day is as a thousand years and a thousand years is as one day," there may have been a typical connection between the week of creation and the whole course of this world's history, and that as in that week six days of labor were followed by a seventh of rest, so the human race will have six thousand years of toil and trial, followed by a thousand years of millennial blessedness. Two questions have to be determined in reference to these periods. The first is the dates from which they start, and the second, the length of the prophetic year. Is it a solar-year as in our chronology, or a lunar year as Jews and Mohammedans use the term, or a calendar year which is an approximation of lunar and solar time? It is evident that in the solution of these problems, Professor Totten has undertaken a task in which his profound mathematical knowledge and rigorous scientific training are of great service.

To Verify Bible Chronology

is Professor Totten's first effort. He believes it possible to identify certain dates by the movements of the heavenly bodies. Using for this purpose the metonic system of a nineteen years' cycle, he calculated backward from a recent period to the time assigned for the creation. Reversing the process, and calculating forward, he declares that he discovered a discrepancy of one day. Chronology recorded one day more than astronomy. He regards this fact as an evidence of the literal veracity of the story of Joshua's miracle. (Joshua 10: 12, 15.) Astronomy would, he contends, show no trace of a day on which the motion of the earth and moon and probably the whole stellar universe was suspended, though the day would be accounted for in human records. It was not a whole day, however, he insists, that was lost or gained, but twenty-three hours and twenty minutes. Another forty minutes, completing the day of twenty-four hours was added to the account by another miracle—that of the reversal of the motion of the shadow on the sun-dial of Ahaz on the prayer of Hezekiah. (II. Kings 20: 8, 11.) The former day is further identified by the conjunction of the sun and moon, which evidently occurred when the motion of these bodies was resumed, because when their motion was stayed the sun was over Gibeon and the moon over Ajalon (two places eight miles apart), and both bodies being thus visible showed that they were going into conjunction. Professor Totten, using his metonic cycle, declares that the miracle must have occurred on the 24th day of the tenth month of the year 2555 from the creation.

Proceeding with this verification by the dates on which eclipses must have occurred, Professor Totten justifies the system by the records of the British Chronological Association. These show, he says, that of "the eclipses, and the continued accuracy of the length of the day are such that a particular solar eclipse of any team is always visible from the same part of the earth. The ancient records of eclipses in Nineveh show that the track of totality is precisely what it was three thousand years ago." Referring to the before mentioned period of "seven times" which Professor Totten, in common with students of prophecy, regards as representing 2520 years, he remarks that "it contains 132 Lunar or Metonic Cycles in which the exact amounts to seventy-seven lunar years, and over and above these cycles there is a remainder of twelve years, which raises the exact to seventy-five solar years. In the last chapter of Daniel the angel intimates to the prophet that while the scattering of the power of the holy people would terminate at the end of the second half of the 2520 years, yet there would be additions of thirty and forty-five years before the era of full blessedness should arrive. In other words, to the long period of 2520 years Scripture adds a brief period of seventy-five years and, as we have seen, astronomy does the same."

Another remarkable combination of figures is one found in the Book of Esdras in the Apocrypha. It is there stated that the world is divided into twelve parts, of which ten and the half of a tenth are gone. That is to say fifty-three sixtieths of time were past. Professor Totten claims to have discovered a scribe's date on this book, and by adding to it the remaining seven-sixtieths the date 1899 A. D. is obtained.

Professor Totten has expended an enormous amount of labor on these chronological computations, and he is still laboring on others which he believes promise even more remarkable results. Those already attained, however, convince him that it is his solemn duty to utter the warning cry, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh." (Luke 12: 35, 40.)

ANTI-SLAVERY QUAKERS.

The First Protest.*

THE first protest ever issued by any Christian church against slavery, came from the Friends of Germantown; and a copy of this protest may be seen to-day hanging in the Friend's Free Library in that place. To the same profound conviction of the equal rights of men so boldly put forth by the Society of Friends may be traced the beginning of the abolition movement. William Lloyd Garrison became interested in this cause through his friendship with Benj. Lunday, a pupil in the school of John Woolman, the Quaker. Stephen Grellet and William Allen influenced Alexander I. of Russia, to take measures for the abolition of serfs, an act which was accomplished peaceably in the reign of Alexander II. Frenchmen who were in America at the time of the revolution, were much interested in the views of the Society of Friends and carried their sentiments home with them. Especially was this the case with Jean Pierre Brissot, the statesman of the Girondists. To his efforts may be traced the Proclamation of Emancipation in Hayti by the Commissioners of the French Convention. Thomas Clarkson also gave good evidence in his labors in behalf of suffering humanity, of the influence the Quakers had over him.

A Prediction.

"We shall see something out of the established course of thing if you come out scot-free in the next battle. It will fix the fate of a lot of us. I wish you all success and safety in your faith, Mr. Haydock," said the slim officer to whose experience miracles were contrary, "it seems all foolishness to me."

"I know—to the Greek, foolishness; to the Jews a stumbling block—but unto them which are called, Christ the power of God. 'I know whom I have believed,' and as we are ambassadors for Christ as though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead be ye reconciled to God.'" In his earnestness, James Haydock had risen and was standing with bared head under the wide-spreading oak branches, whose leaves were slightly moved by the night wind; the numberless tents of the regiment lay quietly, dimly outlined by the uncertain light of the camp fires whose smoke curled up and disappeared in the cloudy darkness overhead; no stars were now visible; most of the soldiers had turned in for the night, and the group around the speaker remained silent as he continued with uplifted face.

"Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Neither death nor life, nor angels, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come. 'Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us.'"

He stopped, and as with one accord the listening group rose and stood a monument before him without speaking, the chaplain almost involuntarily raised both hands and pronounced a benediction over the uncovered heads, then turned and sought his tent, followed by the other men; the Colonel silently shook hands with James Haydock, and left him standing under the tree, where he lingered a moment listening to the strains of a negro hymn that floated to him from a far off corner of the camp.

My Lord, what a morning,
My Lord, what a morning,
My Lord, what a morning,
When the stars begin to fall.

Under Fire.

So absorbed was James Haydock's mind in thoughts of this kind that he was only awakened to a full sense of his surroundings when a shower of rifle balls fell about him, and through a sudden cloud of smoke he saw that the blue-coats were coming up the hill, the answering volley from the Confederates failing to check the onward rush. The man on his right hand loaded his revolver after this first fire, and his eyes gleamed fiercely at the foe, the one on his left hand had fallen and entered the next world with a curse on his lips. As Colonel Preston rode rapidly along the ranks, cheering his men on, his eye fell on James Haydock standing quietly with his hands loosely clasped behind him, looking out into the confusion.

"Haydock, for God's sake, go to the rear. I can't see a man standing that way; it is downright murder."

"In faith, it is all murder," muttered a smooth-faced lad as a shot struck him and he fell at the colonel's feet. "I wonder how mother will get along without me," was the faint whisper that James Haydock caught as he bent a moment over the young face so suddenly grown gray and rigid.

"He's gone. Go to the rear, I tell you; I command you."

Silently James Haydock turned to obey orders when a fresh and still closer hail of shots staggered him for an instant; almost blinded by the smoke, he could yet see that the colonel had fallen from his horse, and lay motionless, while the animal fled wildly over the field. Without a minute's hesitation, James Haydock lifted the rather slight form, and carrying it in his arms, walked quietly along the line and back to the tents in the rear.

"I thought you said that man was a coward," said a soldier to his comrade; "that don't look much like it."

"Coward or hero, sinner or saint, I don't know; but I wish I felt as calm as he looked. Look out, here they come, now for a close fight and may the Lord have mercy on our souls."

In the Field Hospital.

The hush that prevailed under the long white canvas canopy was very solemn, and contrasted strangely with the moans to which James Haydock had been listening when helping the wounded. Here all pain was over; peacefully lay the still forms on the bare boards that did not look uncomfortable as the entire repose of the faces was noted. No emaciation from illness, no sign even of suffering is found as a rule on the faces of those who make sudden exit from this world. A few attendants were gently going among the bodies, trying to find the address of distant relations to whom would soon come the heavy tidings, "Killed at Petersburg." Sometimes a photograph in a letter would be found, sometimes a pocket testament with the name of the giver in it, and from the breast pocket of one young man, James Haydock took a letter containing a dark brown lock of hair tied with a tiny silken curl of gold. The simple inscription, "Baby's hair," brought the tears to James Haydock's eyes as he replaced the envelope over the heart that could no longer beat for wife or child.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,

Bible House, New York City.

WE have received a number of letters referring to the changes in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. While all, without exception, speak very highly of these improvements, there are some of our readers who seem to think that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is now "too nice-looking for a religious paper." To these friends we would say: Can anything that is dedicated to God and his service be too good? Is he not entitled to the best? Why should secular papers be more attractive than those of a purely religious character, like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? We extend a cordial invitation to our readers to write to us, expressing their opinions on this matter.

HAD TO LEAVE IT.

I HAVE it as an authentic incident that an attorney was called to sit beside a dying man and to write his last will and testament. The attorney having taken pen, ink, and paper, and begun in the usual form of a last will and testament, said to the dying man: "Well, now, sir, what disposition do you propose to make of your property? In the first place, how much money have you?" "Well," the man replied, "I have thirty thousand dollars." "Thirty thousand dollars; and what will you do with it?" "Well," said he, "there is John; he has been a good boy. I'll give him five thousand dollars. Put down five thousand dollars. Ah! it is sad to give this money up. I worked very hard for it—very hard for it." "Well," inquired the attorney, "what disposition will you make of the rest of the property?" The dying man replied: "There is Sarah; she has been a good girl. I'll give her five thousand dollars." "Well, now, what disposition will you make of the rest?" inquired the attorney. "Ah!" said the dying man, "it is hard—it is hard, after working as I have to get this property, to have to give it up. But there is so-and-so; he has been a very good friend to me. He was a friend to me when I started in life, and has been a friend all through. I must do something for him. I'll give him five thousand dollars." "Well, now," said the attorney, "what else? what else?" "Well," replied the dying man, "I think I shall keep the rest myself!" In his stupidity only crying out what ten thousand have felt on their death-bed, while with a dying clutch they seized that which had been their ruin. Though we may have the deeds for the land and the certificates for the stock, who ever heard of a man being able to carry a private box of valuable papers with him into the grave? How much more of New York real estate to-day does John Jacob Astor own than the man who used to blacken his shoes? When Herod was dead, was his banquet any better than that of the worms that fed on his carcase? How many dollars is Croesus worth now? How much revenue tax does Stephen Girard pay? Was the dust of the valley any sweeter to the lips of Queen Elizabeth than to the needle-woman who on the imperial robes sewed her life away? When Maximilian went back dead from this continent to Europe, and the monarchies uncovered their heads as his dead body passed, and great honors were shown his remains, did the dead usurper see any more of the demonstration than his victims which strewed the Mexican plateau? No. However we may escape all other creditors, Death at last will execute upon us a writ which will take from us our last picture, our last building-lot, our last shelf of goods, our last bond, our last mortgage, our last book, our last coat, our last shoe, our last glove, our last penny; and empty-handed, you and I will go into the eternal world, not owning so much as the five or six feet of ground in which we may be buried. I ask you, is not that man a fool who builds on such a world, which he must, throughout and throughout, surrender even if he gets it?

CARE OF TRUST FUNDS.

EVERY man during the course of his life, on a larger or smaller scale, has the property of other committed to his keeping. He is so far a safety deposit, he is an administrator, and holds in his hand the interest of the family of a deceased friend. Or he is an attorney, and through his custody goes the payment from debtor to creditor, or he is the collector for a business house which compensates him for the responsibility; or he is a treasurer for a charitable institution and he holds alms contributed for the suffering; or he is an official of the city or the State or the nation, and taxes, and subsidies, and supplies, are in his keeping. It is as solemn a trust as God can make it. It is concentrated and multiplied confidences. On that man depends the support of a bereft household, or the morals of dependents, or the right movement of a thousand wheels of social mechanism. A man may do what he will with his own, but he who abuses trust funds, in that one act commits theft, falsehood, perjury, and becomes, in all the intensity of the word, a miscreant. How many widows and orphans there are with nothing between them and starvation but a sewing machine, or held up out of the vortex of destruction simply by the thread of a needle, red with their own heart's blood, who a little while ago had, by father and husband, left them a competency? What is the matter? The administrators or the executors have sacrificed it—running risks with it that they would not have dared to encounter in their own private affairs. How often it is that a man will earn a livelihood by the sweat of his brow, and then die, and within a few months all the estate goes into the stock-gambling rapids of Wall Street. How often is it that you have known the man to whom trust funds were committed taking them out of the savings bank and from trust companies, and administrators turning old homesteads into hard cash, and then putting the entire estate into the vortex of speculation. Embezzlement is an easy word to pronounce, but it has ten thousand ramifications of horror.

OLD NEW YORK.

MANAHACHTANIENKS was the name by which the Indians called this city. The translation of it is, "the place where they all get drunk." Most uncomplimentary title; we are glad that it has been changed; for though New York has several thousand unlicensed grog-shops, we consider the name inappropriate, although, if intemperance continues to increase as rapidly for the next hundred years, as during the last twenty years, the time will come when New York may appropriately take its old Indian nomenclature. Old-time New York is being rapidly forgotten, and it may be well to revive some historical facts. At an expense of three thousand dollars a year, men with guide-book in hand go through the Catacombs of Egypt and the picture galleries of Rome and the ruins of Pompeii, when they have never seen the strange and historic scenes at home. We advise the people who live in Brooklyn, Jersey city and up-town New York, to take this paper and go on an exploration. Go to No. 1 Broadway and remember that George Washington and Lord Cornwallis once lived there. Go to the United States Treasury, on Wall Street, and remember that in front of it used to stand a pillory and a whipping-post. In a building that stood where the United States Treasury stands, General Washington was installed as President. In the open balcony he stood with silver buckles and powdered hair, in dress of dark silk velvet. (People in those days dressed more than we moderns. Think of Grover Cleveland or Benjamin Harrison inaugurated with hair and shoes fixed like that). Go to the corner of Pearl and Broad Streets, and remember that that was the scene of Washington's farewell to the officers with whom he had been so long associated. Go to Canal street, and remember it was so called because it once was literally a canal.

HEARTY INVITATION.

THERE are a great multitude of people just outside the church railing who would like to come in. They are not quite certain whether we ecclesiastics want them inside. Let us drop our exquisite essays, and come down and give them a warm-hearted exhortation, and they will step in at the first call. The people have no idea that a sermon is intended to save them. It is a work of fine art that they come to look at on Sundays, as they look at Church's "Cotopaxi." They sit admiring the colors and the perspective. They want to know whether the sermon is according to the best rules; whether the introduction leads naturally into the main subject; whether the heads of discourse are rightly proportioned; whether the illustrations are classical; whether the sermon is over thirty-five minutes long. When will ministers and laymen find out that a sermon is good in proportion to the number of souls it saves? Let us next Sunday go to our people with a red-hot talk, and urge them to come in to the Gospel banquet. They are waiting for an invitation.

SELECT YOUR KNOWLEDGE.

LIFE is so short you cannot know everything. There are but few things we need to know, but let us know them well. People who know everything, do nothing. You cannot read all that comes out. Every book read without digestion is so much dyspepsia. Sixteen apple-dumplings at one meal are not healthy. In our age, when hundreds of books are launched every day from the press, do not be ashamed to confess ignorance of the majority of the volumes printed. If you have no artistic appreciation, spend neither your dollars nor your time on John Ruskin. Do not say that you are fond of Shakespeare if you are not interested in him, and after a year's study would not know Romeo from Sir John Falstaff. There is an amazing amount of lying about Shakespeare.

CORN FIELDS.

THERE is nothing more suggestive to me than a corn-field, whether it be in the deep grass of July, or when the husbandman puts his peg into the husk and rips out the golden ear. In the twelfth chapter of St. Matthew, we find our Lord Jesus Christ walking in the corn-field. It was on the Sabbath day. The disciples who went with him were hungered, and at his will they took the ears of corn and ate. The Lord Jesus not only then but always walks in the corn-field, in the wheat-field, and wherever men are trying to make a living; and he is interested in everything they gain, and interested in everything they lose.

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. C. H. Yatman has just closed a series of evangelistic meetings at Pine St. Methodist Church, in Portland, Me. Rev. John F. Clymer, pastor of the church says: "The Church has been greatly quickened and about one hundred have professed faith in Christ."

Mr. D. L. Moody is being urged to revisit Scotland. A requisition begging him to do so has been signed by the principals of Edinburgh University and the Free Church and United Presbyterian College, and by the Countess of Aberdeen and leading men of all the churches, and has been sent to him in care of Rev. John Smith of Edinburgh.

Three young men from Washburn College, under the leadership of Mr. Joel Harper, a licentiate of Oklahoma Association, are carrying the gospel into destitute localities in Oklahoma Territory by means of a gospel wagon, fitted up with all the accessories for house-keeping as well as the necessary outfit for conducting religious meetings.

Rev. W. T. Lambourne, of London, has been preaching on the last two Sundays at the King's Own Mission, Bayonne, N. J. The crowds were so large that the services were adjourned to the open air as the Mission would not hold the half of those who came. Last Sunday, there were over a thousand persons at each service and much good was done.

The New National Prohibition Party and Camp Ground on Staten Island, N. Y., was opened on July 4th with appropriate ceremonies. Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., who is President of the Association, presided, and Prof. Samuel Dickie, Chairman of the National Committee of the Prohibition Party and other eminent men took part in the proceedings. Meetings will be held on the grounds throughout this month.

Mr. H. C. Tronk, who is laboring in a mission at West Troy, N. Y., would be glad to receive back numbers of this journal from any of our readers who may have them to spare. The mission is an endeavor on the part of some Christian young men of the town to benefit canal men, very many of whom are discharged there and wait in the town until they can obtain work on another boat. They have found the distribution of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD very helpful in the work.

The Revival services in the Allen Street Memorial Church, New York, are a signal success. The pastor, Rev. William Hamilton informs us that the prospects are truly wonderful. People have come in night after night, and have been blessed with converting power. Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist, who is conducting the meetings, is being helped enthusiastically by the pastor, and Christian workers from that, and other churches. The meetings are still going on, and the interest increasing.

A house and lot worth over $50,000 has been given to Rev. A. B. Simpson, pastor of the Gospel Tabernacle, New York, for use as an Orphanage. The donor is Mr. Joseph Battin, ex-President of the New Jersey Water Company, who gave the magnificent High School Building recently to the city of Elizabeth, N. J. Mr. Simpson has for some time supported a number of orphans, but has been inconvenienced by the lack of a suitable building. The number of children under his care at present is thirty-six, but with the increased facilities that Mr. Battin's munificence will supply, many more children can be received.

Major George A. Hilton has, we regret to learn, been temporarily laid aside from active evangelistic labor by a serious accident. While on his way to conduct a revival service at Mount Vernon, Wash., the buggy in which he was riding was overturned, and he suffered several aggravated dislocations and was severely bruised. For three weeks he has been completely helpless and unable to continue the work which God was so wonderfully blessing. Happily he is now recovering and has undertaken to commence labor next week in the First Methodist Protestant Church of Seattle, though at present he has to use crutches to go around. Many of our readers who know Major Hilton and the valuable work he has been doing for many years past, will thank God for his merciful preservation, and will pray for his complete restoration to health.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Prince George's Visit—Haytian Troubles—The New Copyright Law—A Lake in the Desert—Earthquake Shocks, &c.

C MOST interesting contribution to autobiographical American literature will be made in the near future. Gen. Benj. F. Butler has now finished and is about to issue his long-anticipated book in which, so he asserts, he will tell the exact truth concerning the dead and living alike. Gen. Butler's sturdy, self-reliant and aggressive character is sure to give the book a positive interest for American readers. It will review his political experiences from Free-soil days, through all the varying phases of American politics up to the close of the war. Not the least interesting will be the resumé of his career during the war, his relations to Jeff. Davis and his explanations of the reason why he voted for Davis at the Charlestown Convention in 1860. He claims that Davis was not originally a Disunionist, but that he was compelled to follow his State. Gen. Butler's opinions very frankly expressed of American lawyers, statesmen and military leaders, couched in the trenchant phraseology of which he is a master, will doubtless evoke comment in many quarters.

... UNHAPPY HAYTI, not yet freed from the rule of the tyrannical Hyppolite, seems again destined to be the scene of war. It is reported that Legitime, the exiled President, and his followers are preparing for a descent upon Hayti, with the view of wresting the government from Hyppolite. A strong movement has set in against Hyppolite since the recent assassinations by his order, and it is now believed that the prospects of Legitime's return to power are promising. Hyppolite has continued the massacre of his supposed enemies for many weeks. Lately one hundred persons were ordered to leave Port-au-Prince and not return under penalty of death. The tyrant, on horseback and surrounded by a body-guard has attended so-called executions almost daily. On various occasions, he sat, unmoved by the frantic appeals of heart-broken women, whose husbands were about to be shot, and after their implorations, gave the brutal order of fire, apparently taking a delight in butchery. One case is related, where the mother of a young man so executed was dragged from the son's dead body, a raving lunatic!

... THE news comes from Ottawa that Lady Macdonald, the widow of Sir John Macdonald (whose portrait appears in this column), has been made a peeress by Queen Victoria, in honor of her illustrious husband. Lady Macdonald is herself a woman of rare accomplishments and many admirable qualities, and one who, in Canadian eyes at least, well deserves the honor. Had Sir John Macdonald lived, it is not improbable that his statesmanship would have been recognized by the conferring of a peerage, but his nature—which was rather democratic than otherwise—would probably have led him to decline it, although like D'Israeli, he might have been induced to accept it for his wife's sake.

... EMPEROR WILLIAM is a man of surprises. He let out a secret a few days ago, concerning which all Europe had been conjecturing for weeks past, viz., that the Dreibund or Triple Alliance of Germany, Italy and Austria, had been renewed for six years and the treaty signed. This will probably dispose of the war talk for some time to come, unless indeed, political and other changes should occasion a rupture of the alliance such as almost happened after the collapse of the Crispi ministry in Italy sometime ago. Now, that this important matter is settled, the young Kaiser feels at liberty to go on his long-projected travels. He is accompanied by the Empress and a very large and brilliant staff. Great preparation are being made in London for their reception, and one of the royal palaces will be practically surrendered to the visitors during their stay.

... PRINCE GEORGE of Greece, who is now visiting this country, arrived in New York last week. He speaks very modestly about the part he played in saving the Czarewitch of Russia from a Japanese assassin in the gardens near Otsu, some time ago, the facts concerning which were published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD shortly after the occurrence. "We were on one side of the path," he said, "with a line of police on the other side. On our side the Grand Duke walked behind two of the Japanese officials, who were showing us the sights. I followed behind the Grand Duke and back of me was the Japanese Minister. Suddenly a man ran past the police, raised a sword with both hands above his head and before his intention could be divined, brought it down with all his strength on the Czarewitch's head. Luckily the Czarewitch had time to step aside and so avoided the direct blow, although the point of the weapon cut his scalp from the crown of his head to a point above the right eye. The murderous blade swung again and the blow was repeated almost on the same spot. The Czarewitch started to run, with the assassin following. The latter had raised the sword for a crushing blow, when I struck him on the head with my stick and he fell to the ground. There is the entire incident." Prince George was feted and honored by the Greek colony in the metropolis, and has visited the navy yard and many other places of interest during his brief stay. He sailed for Europe on Saturday last.

... OUR new Copyright Law went into effect on July 1st. On several occasions lately, President Harrison and Mr. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress, held consultations with the view, it was understood, of the issuance of a proclamation, as prescribed by the International Copyright Law. The official proclamation was issued last week. In anticipation of the new law, the British, French, Belgian and Swiss governments have announced to our government, their willingness to avail themselves of the facilities afforded to their citizens for securing copyright here and to grant American authors equal privileges. Librarian Spofford believes that the new law will not be followed by a large immediate increase in the applications for copyright, since time will be required for new publishing arrangements and contracts to be entered into by foreign authors. He does not think the importation of foreign printed books now extant will be largely affected. The importation of all books written and published after July 1st, except such as claim no copyright here, is summarily cut off. The number of Americans, who have heretofore secured copyright abroad is extremely small. Some American authors, by temporarily residing in Canada or England, have secured copyright without trouble in these countries.

... A REMARKABLE phenomenon has occurred in the great desert known as the Colorado Sink, the lowest part of which is now a lake, twelve miles wide and thirty miles long, with an average depth of from twenty to forty inches. A few days ago, water began to percolate in large quantities through the arid sands, to the surprise of the salt-gatherers at Pilot Knob, San Pedro, and Salton. It was found that the water was twenty-five per cent. salt, and it was believed to have come a long distance before reaching the surface. It is still pouring into the sink at a rate that threatens to make a large part of the Colorado Desert an inland sea, without apparent feeder or outlet.

Scientific men regard this flooding of the desert with the greatest interest, and as the most peculiar phenomenon that has occurred on the coast since white men settled that part of the country. One theory is that the inundation is caused by the overflow of the Colorado River, the water coming through an underground passage beneath a low range of hills to the South of the Sink. The ground all through the entire section has peculiarities that have attracted the attention of prospectors and investigators. It has always been so shaky that it could not bear the weight of a locomotive, so light dummies have had to be used. A heavy piece of iron dropped, shard-pointed, on the ground, would sometimes cut through and disappear—an indication of the existence of some underground stream or lake or, at least, of a subterranean marsh, showing that a body of water had at one time been where the desert now stretches for many miles.

... MR. GLADSTONE'S illness, at one time considered serious, has left him very weak but convalescent. A striking illustration of the brief tenure a public man enjoys is found in the fact that during his few weeks' illness, the British politicians took to discussing the question of his successor in the Liberal leadership. The consensus of political opinion seems to be that Sir Wm. Harcourt rather than John Morley, would be the coming leader in the event of Gladstone's permanent incapacitation or death.

... AS THE Behring Sea fishery question is still a matter of vital interest, we give to-day a portrait of De. G. N. Dawson, who has been appointed one of the British Commissioners in the arbitration. Dr. Dawson is one of the best known geologists in this country. He is the son of Sir William Dawson, Principal of the McGill University, Montreal, and is now forty-three years of age. He was the geologist of the Boundary Commission to settle the line between Canada and the United States, and explored the region from the Lake of the Woods to the Rockies. In 1877 he commanded the Yukon River Expedition in Alaska, making a journey of 1300 miles in boats. He is a native of Nova Scotia.

... PIKE'S PEAK, in Colorado, is no longer an unapproachable pinnacle in the clouds. The railroad, which has been building for two years past, is now finished, and the first passenger train reached the summit of the mountain on the afternoon of July 1st, carrying sixty-five people. The lower terminus of the line is 6,400 feet above sea level and the upper 14,147, the entire distance being nine miles and the steepest grade twenty-five per cent. Going up, a snow squall was encountered and the passengers were glad to wear overcoats. The engine is propelled on cog wheels, the rear of the locomotive being elevated to give the forward portion a true level. The passenger cars are of the ordinary sort, except that they also are raised at one end, to enable the occupants to sit comfortably. The Pike's Peak Railroad is the highest in the world.

... MONTE CARLO, the most notorious gambling resort in Europe, where thousands of men and women have been ruined and many have ended their lives by suicide; where princes and plebeians, ladies of the highest rank and adventuresses, meet side by side at the gaming-tables; the saddest, wildest, wickedest place in all Europe—is to have its counterpart in Lower California. The scheme for the establishment of an American Monte Carlo is, strange to say, supported by several men who have been prominent in public affairs both here and in Mexico, including, it is said, President Diaz, Gen. Butler, Gen. Eli Murray, the President of a leading National Bank and a least one railroad millionaire. If it be the purpose of these men to deliberately encourage the gambling propensity on a scale of magnitude heretofore unknown here, all Christian people will pray that the scheme may fail. $50,000,000 are said to be ready to put into the scheme and all the necessary grants of land, etc., have been already arranged with Mexico.

... RAIN-MAKING machines are the latest invented wonders, but that they will actually produce rain has yet to be demonstrated. One western genius has constructed what he terms a "rain-maker," whose workings are as mysterious as the Keely motor. Others are in the field with rain-compelling devices. Gen. Greely, chief of the Signal Service (who has lately resigned and has been succeeded by Prof. Mark W. Harrington) is the most prominent of these inventors. He claims to be able to produce a regular down-pour, but it will cost $7,500 per shower. This expenditure would be justified only if it became an object to save crops over a large area. Until the whole modus operandi of these rain-makers is fully explained, most people will continue to prefer the old style of rain to any supply that can be artificially coaxed from the clouds. Perhaps the very best plan to insure the copious and general distribution of moisture is to plant an abundant supply of trees.

... CALIFORNIA on June 29th felt the severest shocks of earthquake experienced since 1868. Rumbles and sharp concussions were followed by a vibration from North-west to South-east. The earthquake lasted for fully a minute, being divided into two distinct series of shocks, the last having an oscillating motion. At San Jose, high towers swayed ten feet out of the perpendicular; there was a panic in the big hotels and half-clad guests rushed into the streets, while the entire city rocked like a sea. Several buildings collapsed while the undulations lasted. The shocks were felt throughout a large part of the State. The repetition, which usually comes after a short interval, was watched for but did not occur.

... IT WILL be good news to humanitarians the world over to learn from official sources that the African Slave Trade has almost reached its last stage of existence. British officials, who have been engaged in fighting the traffic in East Africa for many years, have just submitted their reports of last year's operations, which show that the traffic has been minimized to a very large degree. It is believed that the action of the Brussels Conference will give it the finishing blow, as, under that arrangement, all the European Powers, together with the United States, will now act in concert for its suppression, and the last strongholds of slavery will shortly be invaded.

... SECRETARY BLAINE'S health need no longer be a subject of anxiety for, since going to Bar Harbor, he has improved wonderfully. He goes out driving daily in a little rig, consisting of a low phaeton drawn by a single horse, a very modest affair by the side of the splendid turnouts at Bar Harbor. Mrs. Damrosch his daughter, usually accompanies him, holding the reins. Miss Hattie Blaine, now in Europe, is expected to join the family at Stanwood Cottage by the middle of the month. Mr. Blaine's doctors now say that if he avoids over-exertion during the summer months, there need be no fear of a relapse.

POETESS Elaine Goodale (now Mrs. Dr. C. E. Eastman) and her husband, the young Chief of the Sioux Nation, have settled down to their labors at the Pine Ridge Agency, Dakota, where Mrs. Eastman will devote herself to mission work and the education of the young charges at the agency. Mrs. Eastman (whose portrait is given in this column), has already won the hearts of American readers by her beautiful poems. She developed a talent for versifying at a very early age. Her childhood was largely spent out-of-doors, among the rugged Berkshire Hills. Elaine never went to school, but studied with her mother, Mrs. Dora H. R. Goodale, who was a woman of many gifts and who taught the little poet Latin, French and Greek. The family led a very secluded life in the mountains, their home being beside dense woods in a house overrun with woodbine and clematis. Elaine was always a warm admirer of the best traits of the Indian character, and her love of the woods shines out through her poems. One characteristic verse runs as follows:

MRS. DR. EASTMAN.

No lagging step outruns the happy days,
Our tread is soft as rain;
With careless joy we tread the woodland ways
And reach her broad domain.

No lagging step outruns the happy days,
Our tread is soft as rain;
With careless joy we tread the woodland ways
And reach her broad domain.

THE REAR-GUARD.

"And David came to the two hundred men, which were so faint that they could not follow David, whom they had made to abide at the brook Besor. . . . as his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff: they shall part alike. And it was so from that day forward, that he made it a statute and an ordinance for Israel unto this day." 1. Samuel 30 : 21-25.

THOSE who associate themselves with a leader must share his fortunes. Six hundred men had quitted their abode in Judæa; unable to endure the tyranny of Saul they had linked themselves with David, and made him to be a captain over them. They were, some of them, the best of men, and some of them were the worst: in this, resembling our congregations. Some of them were choice spirits, whom David would have sought, but others were undesirable persons, from whom he might gladly have been free. However, be they who they may, they must rise or fall with their leader and commander. If he had the city Ziklag given to him, they had a house and a home in it; and if Ziklag was burned with fire, their houses did not escape. When David stood amid the smoking ruins, a penniless and a wifeless man, they stood in the same condition. This rule holds good with all of us who have joined ourselves to Christ and his cause; we must be partakers with him.

I hope we are prepared to stand to this rule to-day. If there be ridicule and reproach for the gospel of Christ, let us be and reproached for his sake. Let us gladly share with him in his humiliation, and never dream of shrinking. This involves a great privilege, since they that are with him in his humiliation shall be with him in his glory. If we share his rebuke in the midst of an evil generation we shall also sit upon his throne, and share his glory in the day of his appearing. Brethren, I hope the most of us can say we are in for it, to sink or swim with Jesus.

Willing to be ridiculed

It frequently happens that when a great disaster occurs to a band of men, a mutiny follows thereupon. However little it may be the leader's fault, the defeated cast the blame of the defeat upon him. If the fight is won, "it was a soldiers' battle"; every man-at-arms claims his share of praise. But if the battle is lost, cashier the commander! It was entirely his fault; if he had been a better general he might have won the day. This is how people talk: fairness is out of the question. So in the great disaster of Ziklag, when the town was burned with fire, and wives and children were carried away captive; then we read that they spoke of stoning David. Why David? Why David more than anybody else, it is hard to see, for he was not there, nor any one of them. They felt so vexed, that it would be and why not David? Brethren, it sometimes happens, even to the servants of Christ, that when they fall into persecution and loss for Christ's sake, the tempter whispers to them to throw up their profession. Vile suggestion! Mutiny against the Lord Jesus? Dare you do so? Some of us cannot do so, for when he asks us, "Will ye also go away?" we can only answer, "Lord, to whom should we go?

A Relief to Stone Somebody,

Thou hast the words of eternal life." No other leader is worth following. We must follow the Son of David.

If we thus follow our leader and bear his reproach, the end and issue will be glorious victory. It was to see David leaving two hundred men behind him, and marching with his much diminished forces after an enemy who had gone, he scarce knew where, who might be ten times stronger than his little band, and might slay those who pursued them. It was a melancholy spectacle for those left behind to see their leader a broken man, worn and weary like themselves, hastening after the cruel Amalekite. How very different was the scene when he came back to the brook Besor more than a conqueror!

Yes, we have no doubt about the result of our warfare. He that is faithful to Christ shall be glorified with him. That he will divide the spoils with the strong is never a matter of question. "The pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand." This morning I want to utter God-given words of comfort to those who are faint and weary in the Lord's army.

I. I shall begin by saying, first, that there are of our King. Among the very elect of David's army—heroes who were men of war from their youth up—there were hands that hung down, and feeble knees that needed to be confirmed. There are such in Christ's army at most seasons. We have among us soldiers whose faith is real, and whose love is burning; and yet, for all that, just now their strength is weakened in the way, and they are so depressed in spirit, that they are obliged to stop behind with the baggage.

Possibly some of these weary ones had grown faint because they had been a good deal perplexed. David had so wrongfully entangled himself with the Philistine king, that he felt bound to go to fight against Israel. They were perplexed with his movements. I do not know whether you agree with me, but I find that half-an-hour's perplexity takes more out of a man than a month's labor. When you cannot see your bearings, and know not what to do, it is most trying. When to be true to God it seems that you must break faith with man, and when to fulfil your unhappy covenant with evil would make you false to your Christian professions, things are perplexing. If you do not walk carefully you can easily get yourselves into a snarl.

Worst of all, their grief came in just then. Their wives were gone. Although, as it turned out, they were neither killed nor otherwise harmed; yet they could not tell this, and

They Feared the Worse.

Is it at all wonderful that some of them were faint after performing that doleful miserere? Where would you be if you went home this morning, and found your home burned, and your family gone, you knew not where? I know many Christians who get very faint under extraordinary troubles. They should not, but they do.

Perhaps, also, the force of the torrent was too much for them. As I have told you, in all probability the brook Besor was only a hollow place, which in ordinary times was almost dry; but in a season of great rain it filled suddenly with a rushing muddy stream, against which only strong men could stand. Many there are of our Lord's servants who stop short of certain onerous service: they are not called to do what their stronger comrades undertake with joy. Many are too faint for needful controversy. I have found a great many of that sort about lately: the truth is very important, but

They Love Peace.

It appears quite necessary that certain of us should stand up for the faith once delivered to the saints; but they are not up to the mark for it. They cannot bear to differ from their fellows; and they hold their tongues rather than contend for the truth. There are true hearts that, nevertheless, cannot defend the gospel. They wish well to the champions; but they seek the rear rank for themselves.

Yet these fainting ones were, after all, in David's army. Their names were in their Captain's register as much as the names of the strong. And they did not desert the colors. They had the same captain as the stoutest-hearted men in the whole regiment; they could call David "Master" and "Lord" as truly as the most lion-like man amongst them. It is hard to brave men to be confined to hospital, and have no drive at the foe. The weary one wishes he could be in the front, where his Captain's eye would be upon him. He pants to smite down the enemies, and win back the spoil for his comrades.

II. Faint ones have ##### Their Leader for Their Advocate.

Listen to those foul-mouthed men of Belial, these wicked men: how they rail against those whom God has afflicted! They came up to David and began blustering—"These weaklings who were not in the fight, they shall not share the spoil. Let them take their wives and children and begone." These fellows spoke with loud, harsh voices, and greatly grieved the feebler ones. Who was to speak up for them? Their leader became their advocate.

First, do you notice, he pleads their unity? The followers of the son of Jesse are one and inseparable. I may be the foot, all dusty and travel-stained; and you may be the hand, holding forth some precious gem; but we are still one body. Yonder friend is the brow of holy thought and another is the lip of persuasion, and a third is the eye of watchfulness; but still we are one body in Christ. We cannot do, any one of us, without his fellow; each one ministers to the benefit of all. The eye cannot say to the hand, "I have no need of thee." We are all one in Christ Jesus. Surely this ought to comfort those of you who, by reason of feebleness, are made to feel as if you were very inferior members of the body.

Useful Service.

Then he pleaded their needfulness. He said, "These men abided by the stuff." No army fights well when its camp is unguarded. It is a great thing for a church to know that its stores are well guarded by a praying band. While some of us are teaching in the school or preaching in the street, we have great comfort in knowing that a certain number of our friends are praying for us. To me it is a boundless solace that I live in the prayers of thousands. I will not say which does the better service—the man that preaches, or the man that prays; but I know this, that we can do better without the voice that preaches than without the heart that prays. Therefore, as for those who cannot come into the front places of warfare, deny them not seats of honor, since, after all, they may be doing the greater good. Remember the statute, "They shall part alike."

Notice that David adds to his pleading a statute. I like to think of our great Commander, the Lord Jesus, making statutes. He makes a statute for those who are forced to stay at home because they are faint. Blessed be the name of our Lord Jesus, he is always looking to the interests of those who have nobody else to care for them! If you can look after your own cause, you may do so; but if you are so happy as to be weak in yourself, you shall be strong in Christ. Those who have Christ to take care for them are better off than if they took care of themselves. He that can leave his concerns with Christ has left them in good hands. Vain is the help of self, but all-sufficient is the aid of Jesus. To sum up what I mean: I believe the Lord will give to the sick and the suffering an equal reward with the active and energetic, if they are equally concerned for his glory. If lawfully detained from the field of active labor this statute stands fast for ever, for you as well as others: "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff: they shall part alike."

III. Now, these faint ones find Jesus to be

Their Good Lord in Every Wav.

Was he not a Good Lord when he first took us into his army of salvation? What a curious crew they were that enlisted under David! "Everyone that was in debt, and everyone that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him, and he became a captain over them." He was a captain of ragamuffins; but our Lord had not a better following. I was a poor wretch when I came to Christ; and I should not wonder if that word is near enough to the truth to describe you. I was a good-for-nothing, over head and ears in debt, and without a penny to pay. I came to Jesus so utterly down at the heel, that no one else would have owned me. He might well have said,—"No, I have not come to this—to march at the head of such vagrant beggars as these." Yet he received us graciously, according to his promise, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Since then, how graciously has he borne with us! We are not among those self-praising ones who have wrought such wonders of holiness; but we mourn our shortcomings and transgressions; and yet he still owns us, and he declares, "They shall be mine in that day when I make up

My Jewels.

Brethren, let us exalt the name of our Captain. There is none like him. We have been in distress since then—and he has been in distress with us. In all our afflictions he was afflicted. Have you not found it so? When we have come to a great difficulty like the brook Besor, he has gently eased his commands, and has not required of us what we were unable to yield.

What I have to say lastly is this: how greatly I desire that you who are not yet enlisted in my Lord's band would come to him because you see what a kind and gracious Lord he is! Young men, if you could see our Captain, you would down on your knees and beg him to let you enter the ranks of those who follow him. It is heaven to serve Jesus. I am a recruiting sergeant, and I would fain find a few recruits at this moment. Every man must serve somebody; we have no choice as to that fact. Those who have no master are

Slaves to Themselves.

Depend upon it, you will either serve Satan or Christ, either self or the Saviour. You will find sin, self, Satan, and the world to be hard masters; but if you wear the livery of Christ, you will find him so meek and lowly of heart that you will find rest unto your souls. He is the most magnanimous of captains. These forty years and more have I served him, blessed be his name! and I have had nothing but love from him. I would be glad to continue yet another forty years in the same service here below if so it pleased him. His service is life, peace, joy. Oh, that you would enter on it at once! God help you to enlist under the banner of Jesus even this day! Amen.

THE SECRET PRAYER.

I NEED not leave the jostling world,
Or wait till daily tasks are o'er,
To fold my hands in secret prayer
Within the close-shut closet door.

Their is a viewless cloistered room
As high as heaven, as fair as day;
Where, tho' my feet may join the throng,
My soul can enter in and pray.

And never through these crystal walls
The clash of life can pierce its way;
Nor ever can a human ear
Drink in the secret words I say.

One harkening even can not know
When I have crossed the threshold o'er;
For he alone who hears my prayer,
Has heard the shutting of the door.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Describes a Visit to the Largest School in the World, and What He Saw There.

VACATION, that period of unalloyed delight for childhood, had come around once more, and the "hopes of the household" were duly elated. Uncle John was the recipient of many confidences. Plans for excursions to the country, for botanizing expeditions, and similar pleasures were eagerly discussed.

"Two months is a long time in which to enjoy yourselves," said Uncle to Ted, who was most urgent in pushing the preparations. "Do you know," he added, looking gravely at the group, "that the young folks in this country get the longest vacations of any children in the world? Didn't know it, did you? It's a fact, though."

"Don't all school-children have one?" asked Tom.

"Not all," replied Uncle John. "There are children who never knew what vacation meant, until Christianity taught their parents and teachers to treat them more kindly. But did I ever tell you about the largest school in the world?"

"The very largest?" echoed Milly.

"Yes," said Uncle. "It is in Cairo, Egypt, and is called the El-Azhar. It is a religious school, attached to a famous Mosque or Temple. Nine years ago I was at Cairo, and went to see the great school, which is over eight hundred years old, and has more than ten thousand students and between three and four hundred teachers. The students are from all parts of the earth where the religion of Mohammed prevails, but of course most of them are from Egypt. It is a free school, and the scholar stays there from three to six years, according to the course of study he is to undertake. Many of the pupils are the sons of rich parents, and these give the professors presents, for the teachers are allowed no salary, and, indeed, it is thought to be a great honor to teach there for nothing."

"On the day our party visited the school they were having examinations in geometry, arithmetic and other branches, and also in poetry and law. All Mohammedan law is based on the Koran or Mohammedan Bible."

"Is it like our own Bible?" interrogated Ted.

"No; very different. Our sacred book is the best in the world. It would take too long now, Ted, to point out the differences. The Koran is held in the highest veneration by the Mohammedans. Nobody is allowed to print or translate it, this being expressly forbidden by the church. Some think that this is in order that the priests and scribes may have a monopoly of writing out copies of the Koran, for it is always written, generally on vellum or parchment, with finely-colored initial letters. Some of these copies are rare works of art. I have seen one valued at $3,000."

"Are there many poor scholars in the big school?" was asked.

"Plenty of them," said Uncle. "They support themselves by working at whatever they can, while they are being educated. I have seen some very young folks there, who, so they told me, had to sleep in the Mosque, because they had no money to pay for lodging. There is a room set apart for scholars from each country outside of Egypt, and there is a fine library where they can consult books on every topic, all being printed in the Arabic."

"Don't they close the big school in summer?"

"What!" exclaimed Uncle John; "give ten thousand scholars a vacation all together? Where would they go? Most of them are too poor to go anywhere. Besides, they are better off where they are. They take their books and wander off among the groves outside the city, or along the Nile banks, conning their lessons as they walk. Such a thing as a vacation is unheard of, beyond a day's outing now and then. They return home when their course of study is over and begin to teach others in turn. Some stay right on at the El-Azhar and become professors there. These professors are very dignified-looking fellows, with long cloaks coming down to their heels and great, wide sleeves, like a bishop's. On their heads they wear the largest turbans I ever saw, some of them having as many as thirty yards of cloth wound round about.

"There are primary schools in Cairo, too, where the very little folks are taught the simple branches. Ismail Pacha, who spent so much money that he has been called 'Ismail the Magnificent,' did one good thing when he was persuaded by his wife to give Egypt a good public school system, not unlike our own in America. Besides, our missionaries have established schools in different parts of the country, and have done a great deal of good. Miss Whately, the daughter of Archbishop Whately, had a school at Cairo for several years, where she taught poor girls, and it was the example she set in conducting her free school on Christian principles that set the Khedive's wife to thinking, and led to the establishment of public schools in all the principal cities of Egypt. So you see, children, what may come of the efforts of an humble individual working for the good cause. It is due to one noble, self-sacrificing woman missionary that thousands of children in Egypt are to-day being taught not only the rudiments of education but Christian principles."

"What do they teach the girls there, Uncle?" inquired Milly.

"Household duties, embroidery and plain sewing, and sometimes reading and writing. If they show a disposition for music they may be taught music. It is the oddest thing in the world for an American to enter a room and see a group of these little men and women, all turbaned, of course, puzzled before some hard problem set by the teacher. They have no forms or desks, but all squat on the floor on mats. Each pupil has a tablet in her hand with Arabic letters on it, and these they commit to memory, keeping up a terrible din all the time. It is the custom in nearly all Oriental schools for the teacher to sit on a high chair while the scholars sit either on low benches or on the floor. You know St. Paul speaks of himself as having sat at the feet of Gamaliel (Acts 22: 3), and the good Mary, sister of Martha, sat at Jesus' feet, when he taught her the great lesson of eternal life. So may you all sit at his feet and learn of him, as Mary did."

A Slave of the Kitchen.

"I'm a slave; that's what I am!" exclaimed Mrs. Dorr to her friend Mrs. Whitehouse, who had called to pay her a visit. "I'm always just as you see me in the thick of the work, never through."

"Doesn't Janet help you?"

"Her? Oh, yes; she does a bit; but what can a fourteen-year-old girl do in a house like this? We're six the family and everything to do. Nobody ever said a truer word than that

Man's work's from sun to sun,
But a woman's work is never done."

And she rubbed her hands on her apron, brushing off imaginary cobwebs.

Mrs. Whitehouse looked sympathetic.

"I read somewhere, the other day," said she, "that a woman's work is not finished, ing her hand. "One should never forget the injunction of the Master to Martha who was 'cumbered about much serving,' and careful about many things to the neglect of the one thing needful. When that is kept steadily in view, the cares of the household will be lighter and slavery will be at an end."

The Timid Ones.

A LADY writes us from North Carolina: "I am a member of the Church and my husband is an earnest worker in our church and our missions, of which there are two. I love everything connected with Christ's cause and it is my greatest desire to be a worker and do something for Christ. I have prayed that I might, through God's grace, overcome the only thing that seems to hold me back, and that is—timidity. I am too timid to be of any use whatever. It grieves me more than I can tell you. I long to go out and work in God's vineyard but I shrink from publicity. I can never tell anyone how many tears I shed for this weakness."

God equips his children differently for the work before them. Each is placed in the sphere where they can be most effective. If your timidity is an absolute barrier to public effort, you may still be a valued servant of the Master and the means of doing much good in your immediate circle. Work outward. Beginning at home, the influence of a godly example on your children will inevitably make itself felt on all with whom they come into contact. Thus your Christian influence will extend far beyond the precincts of your own household. It will be a light that cannot be hid, and perseverance in well doing may, by and by, make of the timid servant the glorious apostle. Courage, and work at whatever comes to your hand. The timid ones are not without recognition and reward.

The voice that cannot charm in public may be made musical in home-speech; the lips that cannot charm the world by their eloquence may lead the few in bonds of love. There is no service so small as to be unappreciated.

A Word to the Country Boy.

As a rule, we think boys are over-lectured. City boys and those from the country, too, have to face a dreadful amount of advice in the course of a year. Sometimes, however, a thing is said so sensibly that it would be well for the boys to lay it to heart.

To this class belongs the bit of advice offered by Theodore Temple in the Chautauquan, to country boys who come to town. We think the writer must himself have been a country boy, for he knows just what is needed to set and to keep the fresh-faced and innocent-hearted lads right, once they leave their rural scenes.

The first thing for a boy coming to a great city to do, he says, is to take a start with right associations. In every such town there are innumerable circles of society. The community is too large for everybody to know each other, and therefore it divides up into many circles of common acquaintances, and into each of these the members are as well-known to one another as are the inhabitants of a village. They are good or bad, evil in their influences and injurious in their tone and spirit, or salutary and helpful.

"Where, then, shall the country boy go for society? The best place is to a church. In these days a city church is the center of many social no less than religious activities. It is a life of industry in which men and women engage, so that something is going on ceaselessly, something to interest and to give scope for the ability of a young lad, and to satisfy his social instincts and demands. It is a community in itself, and nobody can belong to it for any considerable length of time, and exhibit sympathy with its ambitions and projects, without fitting into some place where he can display his capacities, and win due consideration because of them. He will make friends, and useful friends. He will have the social life and the social surroundings necessary for him. He should go to the church from the first, and regularly; make himself known to the pastor, and then without putting himself forward take a hand in all the undertakings of the parish. If he is patient the reward will come."

The country boys are to a very great extent the material of which our future statesmen, philanthropists and missionaries are made. All honor to the country boy.

All that the men to-day can do
To-morrow the boys will be doing, too.
For the time is ever coming when
The boys must stand in the place of men.

A RARE SPIRIT GONE.

The Late Rev. Goyn Talmage, and His Life-Work—Dying in the Harness.

ONE of the rarest spirits that ever blessed the world or the Church has just departed. A great leader in all things good was Goyn Talmage. When in 1874 the Reformed Church of America elected him to its highest honor, that of President of its Synod, it recognized the talents and the piety which characterized him. His sterling qualities endeared him alike to the churches to which he ministered and to the clergymen with whom he came in contact. "I loved to hear him talk or preach," says a minister who knew him well. "He seemed to me to have such sanctified good sense always expressed with such deep earnestness and enlivened with so much love and good-humor. He had such charming humility also, that in personal intercourse his words went deeper into your heart than would have been the case had he displayed any self-recognition or asserted a pretentious right of counsel." He seemed to love all men and it would appear from the number of expressions of sorrow which have been elicited by his death, as if that love was reciprocated by all who knew him. Not even those nearest to him were aware until now, how many people loved him and honored him, and how many feel personally bereaved by his departure.

His death was extremely sudden. He worked to the last, as he hoped that he would do. On the Sunday preceding the Wednesday morning on which he died, he preached twice and with all his old power and unction. It was his habit to work late in his study and on Tuesday night, June 23, he was sitting there writing when the other members of his family retired. Some time afterward his wife sought him and found him unconscious. Medical aid was summoned but he died in about an hour without recovering consciousness.

He was residing at the time of his death in his native village of Somerville, N. J. The family has been honorably represented in the State for nearly two hundred years. Its first representative there was Daniel Talmage who in the early part of the eighteenth century removed from Long Island and settled in Elizabeth. His two sons, Daniel and Thomas, were among the militia which defended the frontier against the Indians in the latter part of the Revolutionary War. The former was one of the victims in the sanguinary massacre by the Indians at Minisink near Lackawaxen, July 22, 1779. His nephew, a son of Thomas, was David T. Talmage who settled on the Van Neste farm two miles north of Somerville. He also was distinguished in his State, serving it as a member of the Legislature, as sheriff of his county and in other important and honorable positions. He was the father of ten children, of whom four have become ministers of the Gospel. These were Rev. James R. Talmage, D. D., a man of marked ability who died at the opening of a career of great promise; Goyn, the subject of this sketch, John V. N. Talmage, D. D., for many years a missionary of the Reformed Church at Amoy, China, and now living in delicate health at Bound Brook, N. J., and T. DeWitt, the youngest of all, who is Editor of this journal.

Goyn Talmage, whose portrait accompanies this sketch, was born December 7, 1821. He was educated at Rutgers College, New Brunswick, N. J., graduating in the class of 1842. He subsequently took a three years' course in New Brunswick Theological Seminary and was licensed to preach in 1845. His first charge was at White House, N. J., where he remained for six years. A call came to him from Niskayuna, N. Y., which he felt it his duty to accept and he labored there until 1855. From that year until 1862, he had a successful pastorate at Greenpoint, L. I., which he resigned to serve the churches as Secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions to which office his brethren in the ministry had elected him. After five years service in that capacity he resumed pastoral labor at Rhinebeck, N. Y. Thence after four years he removed to Paramus, N. J. During his pastorate in that town, he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from his Alma Mater, Rutgers College and was further honored by being chosen President of the Synod. In 1879, he received a unanimous invitation from the Reformed Church of Port Jervis, N. J., where he remained, doing excellent work, and enjoying the love and reverence of a united people until three years ago when failing health compelled him to relinquish active pulpit labor. His retirement was deeply regretted and he frequently yielded to the solicitation of the church to occupy his old pulpit for a Sunday. The last time was on May 17, of this year. Since his retirement he did considerable literary work and having a dislike to being, as he expressed it, "laid on the shelf," he preached occasionally for his brother ministers. So acceptable were these services that the applications for them were far more numerous than he could accept. He leaves a widow, (his second wife) and four children, one of whom is a prominent lawyer in this city and another the wife of Prof. Neimeyer of Yale College.

That his work was appreciated in the Reformed Church to which he belonged is evident from the following remarks of the Christian Intelligencer, the recognized organ of the denomination: "Dr. Goyn Talmage's pastorates were uniformly successful in all respects. He left each church he served stronger than when he took it. In nearly every one a new or improved church building or parsonage stands the monument of his wise and vigorous leadership, the testimony of the business ability and executive skill which he possessed to an unusual degree. He equally built up the spiritual interests of the flock. Drawing hearers to the services, and holding them by the power of the truth, and winning them to the Gospel, his charges witnessed a steady ingathering of soundly converted members. After he retired from the pastorate, few ministers more continuously wrought for the Master and the Church than he. He was much sought after by vacant churches, and urged to accept calls, and everywhere was the favorite supply. There was a vivacity, sparkle and force about his sermons that commanded attention and held the interest. He was not only a power in the pulpit, but also with his pen, and the only regret is that he did not write and publish more. Few men were permitted to fill out a better rounded, more honorable, or more useful life. He died, as he wished, in the harness, permitted to preach the truth, he held so firmly and loved so much, to the very last."

AN IRISH MOTHER'S PRAYER.

RECOVERY from the brink of the grave was the subject of a testimony given by a woman, recently, in New York. She came from Ireland. She had been an invalid for years. The amount of medicines she had taken would go a great way towards furnishing a drug store, and yet she remained hopelessly sick. At last the physicians told her plainly that their skill was baffled and they could do nothing more for her. She was perfectly resigned to God's will in her regard, but was naturally a little anxious about her children, who were very young and stood much in need of a mother's care. Turning with unbounded confidence and implicit faith towards the heavenly physician, she prayed thus: "Father, if it be thy holy will, spare me to my children. Thou knowest what is best for them and for me. I leave the matter entirely in thy hands." Instantaneously, she declares, she felt relieved, and in a very short time was restored to perfect health. Twenty years have elapsed since the utterance of the simple prayer, and the good woman states she has never tasted or needed medicine of any kind. She is a devoted member of a Christian Church, and loves to tell and re-tell the story of God's power and goodness.

MARGARET'S ORDEAL.

GOOD-BYE, Margaret, God bless you and keep you unspotted from the world." The words were spoken in a voice thick with tears by a man about fifty years of age, whose hair was thickly sprinkled with the snow of years, and whose brow was furrowed with the lines of care. He stooped, and tenderly kissed, as he spoke, a girl of about nineteen, who looked up at him cheerfully, but whose eyes were red with weeping. "Dear father," she said, "I know he will. The God of the country is the God of the city, too. You have trusted him all your life, trust him now with your daughter. He is faithful."

"I know, my dear, I know. He never failed me; I commit you into his hands, but it is hard to part. I never thought it would come to this. I bore the loss of property and the loss of friendship, and could see God's hand in it; but now I am losing my daughter. I am in the dark."

"Not quite, father. Your sight is dim, that is all. God's hand is in this as in all the rest. It was necessary for one of us to go. There is not enough for us all, and when this employment was offered me, we all thought it providential. Robert will be through college in another year, and Mary will be getting married; then I shall come back to you. In the mean time I shall earn a little money, and you will have more to spare for you and mother. It's the best thing that could have happened. You must think that, father."

"I try, my dear, but it is very hard. If I had only taken my money out of the bank before it failed, you would never have had to go away. Oh, what a fool I was!"

"Too late to think of that, father. You acted for the best, and the loss was no fault of yours. Perhaps some day the bank will pay you some of it back again."

"Little hope of that, I fear, my dear; but I pray God may send me my daughter back." Another fond farewell embrace, and the train carried the girl off to her employment in the city, while her father stood by the track at the little depot wistfully looking after it until it was out of sight. Then he turned and walked sadly homeward.

It was a sad home to which the man returned. The rascality of others lay upon it as a heavy load. Only one more week would the unhappy man and his beloved wife and daughter be able to call it home. Henry Scott must leave the house in which he was born, and must see the familiar furniture and the dearly-prized associations of his youth scattered among strangers, sold to the highest bidder. He must go into an humble frame cottage, with the roughest and rudest surroundings, and live, as best he could, on the wreck of his fortune. Worse than all, there would be a gap in the family circle; the place of his dearly loved Margaret would be empty, while she toiled amid the dirt, and discomfort, and temptations of the city for her bread. As she testified, he was a faithful Christian, but in this matter he was trusting feebly, dimly.

"Here is a letter from Margaret, mother," Mr. Scott said, as he entered his wife's room one morning some six months after these changes had occurred. "It will do you as much good as a whole bottle of medicine. The dear girl no sooner heard you were sick than she wanted to come right away to help to nurse you. I expected she would but I told her she must not think of it. So she sends loving messages, like the good girl she is."

The suffering mother took the letter and read it, weeping tears of joyful affection all the time. The daughter's anxious affection cheered her, as her husband expected, and more than medicine helped to bring back health and strength. Mrs. Scott improved wonderfully and even surprised the doctors, and when Margaret paid a flying visit, she too, was delighted to find her mother quite recovered and in good spirits.

During the next year she wrote more frequently than ever to her father, knowing well that now the companion of his life had been restored he would, more than before, value a daughter's affection also. In one of her letters she alluded to a trial through which she herself was passing, and begging her father's prayers for her that strength might be given her to do right in painful circumstances. He was troubled about this, and looked forward with yearning to the time, now fast approaching, when Mary's marriage would necessitate Margaret's coming back to the old home.

It was a glad day for the fond father when a letter came announcing Margaret's return. It was the eve of the marriage. Everything was ready. The last stitch had been set, and all the arrangements were completed. The little family gathered in the parlor. Robert was there, and Mary, and the young farmer to whom she was to be married tomorrow. A knock was heard at the open door, and a man entered the room. He was young, and tall, and dark, and on his face were the marks of recent illness. He threw open his cloak as Mr. and Mrs. Scott rose to receive him. "Does Miss Scott live here—Miss Margaret Scott?" he said, not seeing Margaret, whose back was turned toward him.

Margaret rose when her name was mentioned, and confronted the stranger. That she knew him was evident, but her face was cold and stern. "Why have you come here, Mr. Vane?" she asked. "You have no right to inflict this intrusion on my family."

"Miss Scott," said the man addressed, "I do not claim any right. I offer most humble apology to you and to your family for coming, but I have been very ill, and I have no hope in life but what you can give me. It is a matter of life or death to me, and so I thought you would pardon my intrusion."

All eyes were turned on Margaret's face as the stranger spoke, and her mother, observing her reluctance, interposed. "You are a stranger to me, sir," she said, "but this is my daughter, and all that concerns her concerns me. While I trust I would never be rude or inhospitable, I cannot permit any one to inflict needless pain upon her. I must therefore ask you to state here what you have to say, and to do so briefly."

"I acknowledge the justice of what you say," the young man replied. "The fact is that I love your daughter, and a year ago I had reason to believe that she returned my regard. Unhappily I gave her cause to lose confidence in me, and, in justice, she rejected my suit. Since then I have had a serious illness, and have been near the grave. I have risen from my bed a changed man. God has pardoned my sins for Jesus' sake, and I longed to tell Margaret of my changed character, and ask her if she, too, could forgive me."

As he spoke the sternness melted from Margaret's eyes, and she sat down and covered her face in her hands.

"Sit down, sir," said Mrs. Scott, "my daughter is agitated; she must answer for herself."

"Not now, mother; let Mr. Vane go away to-night. He may come again to-morrow after the wedding, and then he can tell us all."

"You will hear my story, Margaret! God bless you for your sweet compassion," said the young man, and bowing a farewell to the little family he took his departure.

It was the old story of wrong-doing, of suffering, of repentance, and conversion that Mr. Vane told the following day. Parents and daughter listened as the young man extolled the mercy of God in saving one so sinful as himself, and he spoke so earnestly and so humbly that Mr. Scott's heart was drawn toward him. He was satisfied that there was no hypocrisy in the statement, and when Margaret extended her hand to the repentant prodigal her parents also offered their hands and gave him welcome as a brother Christian.

A year later there was another wedding. Margaret had insisted on that interval, and Mr. Vane acknowledged that his past life justified that time of probation being demanded. As it was with Jacob, the year seemed to him but a few days because of his love. He begged that good parents of his bride would make his home with them, rightly thinking that the presence of these experienced Christians would bring a blessing to his home. Mr. and Mrs. Scott could not resist the pleadings of both the young people, and consented. In the comfort of the quiet happy family, ministered to by their beloved daughter, revered by her Christian husband, and loved by their children, they passed the declining years of life, shedding upon them all the blessings that come from those who, during half a century, have walked humbly with their God.

THE FLYING YEARS.

ONE after another we see them pass
Down the dim-lighted stair;
We hear the sound of their steady tread
In the steps of centuries long since Dead.

As beautiful and as fair.

There are only a few years left to love:

Shall we waste them in idle strife?

Shall we trample under our ruthless feet
Those beautiful blossoms, rare and sweet,

By the dusty ways of life?

There are only a few swift years—ah! let

No envious taunts be heard;

Make life's fair pattern of rare design,

And fill up the measure with love's sweet wine,

But never an angry word! —Selected.

WHATSOEVER HE SAITH.

The Christian Endeavor Topic For the Week Commencing July 19.

IN the Christian Endeavor Societies the topic for the week commencing July 19, furnishes the key to the Christian's life. He is "a man under authority," a willing servant of the Prince of Peace; a disciple of him who spake with authority. The two sons, of whom only one did the will of his father (Matt. 21: 28-31); the disciples obeying the command to feed the multitude, (Matt. 14: 16-21) when reason admonished them that obedience was impossible; and the Apostolic injunction (Eph. 6: 6) to sincerity and diligence, are the passages of Scripture which define the nature and extent of the obedience demanded.

"Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." The command may appear unreasonable, imprudent, unwise, but he that walks by faith not by sight is sure that it is right. His "not to reason why," his "but to do and die." "Not my will but thine be done." "Whatsoever he saith," no man has the right to interpose. Not the systems of doctrine men have built around him; not the creeds and articles and the ecclesiastical legislation of the councils are our law. The supreme command is whatsoever he saith. "Whatsoever he saith." Our Lord still speaks to the ear that is open to the still small voice. The Spirit still brings all things to remembrance. His will is revealed even now to those who desire to do it. "Whatsoever he saith unto you." Every man has his place and his duty in the church. Is another man negligent or inconsistent? Heed it not. What does he say to you. What are your gifts, your opportunities? What can you do for him in the home, in business, in society? Look around that field which is white to harvest and in which there are so few laborers and ask what he is saying to you. "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." Not think about it, or talk about it, or postpone it, but do it. It is he who "doeth the will of the father," who is one with Christ. We think too much of creed and too little of conduct. Words are but leaves, deeds are the fruit. The Lord expects to find fruit on the tree and if he finds none, the tree withers under his reproachful gaze. Christianity is a practical religion. The magnificent ecclesiastical edifices, the gorgeous ritual, the thrilling music, the eloquent sermon count for little with the Head of the Church. Looking down on the hollow pretence he says "I know thy works."

A GREAT GATHERING.

The Largest Religious Convention Ever Known in America.

RED-LETTER days are the next four in the Societies of Christian Endeavor in this and other lands. The thoughts of about a million persons are turned toward Minneapolis, Minn., where the United Society will hold its decennial convention, beginning to-morrow, July 9. Delegates are to be there from the Young Peoples Societies in all lands to celebrate the anniversary, to confer with each other and to strengthen and encourage each other in this marvelous and beneficent movement. Provision is made for the accommodation of fifteen thousand delegates and there is good reason for believing that fully that number will attend. Even that large assemblage will be but a meagre representation of the actual strength of the societies. It is believed that when Secretary Baer reads his report it will be found that there are now nearly 160,000 societies with an aggregate of about a million members. The significance of such a showing will be perceived when it is remembered that at the first anniversary in 1882, the total number of members, who were all in Portland, Me., was only 481. Their line has now gone out through all the earth; there is scarcely any speech or language where their voice is not heard. And this progress must have been due to the intrinsic merits of the plan for there has been no ecclesiastical influence, no central force to urge it on. Pastors and churches have perceived its utility and its capacity for service and have adopted it and recommended it to others. Greater things even than these may yet be evolved from it. It may serve as a basis for the union of evangelical churches in Christian work. There is no true Christian who could not take the Christian Endeavor pledge, whatever his denominational affiliations may be, and there is no true Christian who cannot hail as a brother the man who has taken that pledge and is living up to it. Among the possibilities of the movement there is none more hopeful than that contained in this bond of brotherhood. It has in it the promise of that economy of resources and concentration of effort which is to-day the great need of the Church. Many are the prayers that will go up this week all over the world for God's blessing on the Convention. Though in no sense a legislative body, its decisions will have a wide advisory influence and will be respected by the Societies from which the delegates come. That the proceedings will be conducted wisely and harmoniously may be predicted from the character of the men whose names are on the programme of speakers. Among them are: Rev. O. H. Tiffany, D.D.; President E. B. Andrews, LL.D., of Brown University; Professor William R. Harper, Ph.D., of Yale University; Rev. Wayland Hoyt, D.D.; Rev. J. A. Worden, D.D., and of course, the originator and founder of the whole movement, the Rev. F. E. Clark, D.D., the man to whose wise leadership and discreet guidance so much of this triumphant success is due.

The accompanying illustration shows the building in Minneapolis in which the Convention will be held. It is the Industrial Exhibition Building, the interior of which has been re-modeled for the purposes of the Convention. It has sitting accommodations for eleven thousand persons and a reserved space for a choir of a thousand voices. The Convention will confer on the city the distinction dear to the Western heart, of having had within its borders the largest representative assemblage ever gathered together for religious purposes.

A WORTHY PROJECT.

Poor mothers in New York City will rejoice if the project outlined by L. S. H. in the Silver Cross is realized. Briefly stated, the project is to buy a house, or hire one, in the lower part of the city for use as a day nursery, for the children of mothers who have to be out at work all day. It is thought that the funds needed for the purpose could be raised by the King's Daughters of the city and neighborhood. It would be an appropriate work for them to engage in, no class of people being more in need of some one to "lend a hand." It is proposed, if sufficient funds can be raised, to hire a large house with a garden or some vacant land near it, which could be used as a kitchen garden, and which the elder children, who now run about the streets in the absence of their mothers, could be taught to cultivate. One floor of the house is to be used for a day nursery for infants, another for a kindergarten for children a little older, and the top floor for a children's hospital. The idea was suggested by the experience of the Tenement-House Committee, who found in their visits among the poor that the needy women, many of whom were widows, were sorely embarrassed in their arduous endeavors to support themselves and their families, by their fear of the physical and moral dangers to which their children are exposed during their absence from home. Such an institution under the management of the King's Daughters would be a boon to them that would be most heartily appreciated. There ought to be no difficulty in raising the funds necessary for this noble undertaking. Let the King's Daughters make the effort with faith and prayer, and success is certain.

KING'S DAUGHTERS IN ENGLAND.

QUITE an array of aristocratic titles figure in the list of the ladies who form the Executive Council of the King's Daughters across the Atlantic. Among them are: The Duchess of Bedford; The Countess of Aberdeen; The Viscountess Lymington; Lady Mount-Temple; Lady Edith Ashley and Lady Hobart-Hampden. These ladies are already well-known in England for their kindness and their interest in every movement which has for its object the alleviation of the burdens of their poor sisters. They are doubly welcome in any philanthropic organization because they not only help with their money and personal labor, but their membership attracts other ladies, who like to be associated with titled dames in any enterprise. While it will not be well for the Order to become a mere fashionable whim in England or anywhere else, we are glad to see these ladies of high station identifying themselves with it. They will learn what "the reproach of the Cross" means when they wear the emblem of the Order in some of the places they frequent. That they will have the courage to bear it we have no doubt and it may be that in some of those aristocratic circles some burdened heart, seeing the emblem, may be led to go to the wearer for counsel and help. There are more such hearts in need of both in those circles than is generally supposed.

EPWORTH LEAGUERS ON VACATION.

WORDS of timely counsel are given to members of the Epworth League who are starting on their annual vacation, by a writer in the Christian Advocate, and as they may be useful to members of other orders and members of churches generally, we are glad to give them a wider publicity. They are as follows:

The genuine Epworth Leaguer is the same on vacation that he is at home. Especially because Christ is always present. He does the things that please and avoids the things that grieve the divine Master. He carries his Bible with him. Never omits to pray because of haste or the presence of a new companion. Keeps the Sabbath holy. Attends church. Puts something in the collection box. Goes to Sunday-school. Knows something about the lesson. Hunts up the young people's meeting. Says a word for the Master before it closes. Keeps away from every place that he would not frequent at home. Does not attend the high theatre, nor the low circus, and accepts no invitations to dance. Modestly but firmly flings the Epworth banner to the breeze when these temptations approach. Rejoices in the opportunity to stand up for Jesus where it may count for something. He remembers the home Chapter, and prays for the members there. Once or twice writes it a letter and sends his testimony to the League prayer-meeting. Remembers some sick or very poor person in the home church with a cheery note, or a few flowers sent by mail. No matter if the flowers wilt en route, their fragrance will reach the heart. In short, your Epworth Leaguer has a good time in more senses than one, and returns after vacation with face aglow with physical and spiritual health.

A THRIVING ASSOCIATION.

INCREASED prosperity is reported from Amsterdam, N. Y., in the Young Men's Era. The Young Men's Christian Association in that town, has just celebrated its thirty-third anniversary by moving into its new and commodious building. It was formerly a church and then an Opera House. The report says: A large room, 40 by 40 on the ground floor, will be the gymnasium; also on the ground floor will be the bath and the dressing-rooms. The reading-room and parlor are each 10 by 24, and the secretary's office on the ground floor, overlooks bath and gymnasium entrance. The entrance being conspicuous is an advantage, as the leading attractive saloons are near by and it is on one of the two great thoroughfares of the city. The lot is 53 by 163 and is considered a most desirable site. The city is growing rapidly, having more than doubled its population during the past ten years and still advancing in improvements and growth. The association looks forward to an enlarged usefulness along all lines.

PROGRESS IN THE EPWORTH LEAGUE.

OUR Methodist friends are evidently putting their characteristic energy into the Epworth League. They now announce the passage of the six thousand line. Six thousand chapters in so short a time is a record of which even Methodists, accustomed to rapidity of progress, may be proud. And the rate appears to be increasing. One thousand of the six were enrolled during the past three months. If this rate of progressive increase is maintained, the League will become one of the most effective agents for good in the denomination.

THE Y. M. C. A. IN JAPAN.

News comes from Japan of the flourishing condition of the newly organized Young Men's Christian Association in Tokyo. A new building is in course of erection and a library of eight hundred volumes has been collected. Among the officers of the Association who have recently been elected are some influential Japanese gentlemen. The President is the Hon. Taizo Miyoshi, the Attorney-General of Japan and a member of the House of Lords. The Vice-President is the Hon. Saburo Shimada, a member of Parliament and leader of one of the largest political parties. The Recording Secretary is Raizo Tatsui, a member of the Imperial Privy Council. The directors are all men of influence and high social position and several of them are professors in the Universities. All these gentlemen pledged themselves to zealous personal work in the affairs of the Association and an adjournment of the meeting for two weeks was taken to give them time to study the Constitution and the character of the duties they would be expected to perform before finally accepting office. At the adjourned meeting they renewed their pledge of fidelity and were formally installed. The rank and file of the membership of the Association also includes many distinguished men, statesmen, bankers, lawyers, etc.

THE NEW Y. W. C. A. BUILDING.

BROOKLYN's Young Women's Christian Association will have a magnificent home when the building commenced on Monday last is finished. It is to cost $125,000 and will be one of the most beautiful edifices in the city. Its site is on Schermerhorn Street near Flatbush Avenue. The building will be ninety-five feet square and six stories high. The front will be of light sand-colored bricks with ornamental terra cotta trimmings. A flight of stone steps will conduct to the main entrance where there is to be a fine octagonal reception hall. Thence a marble stair-way will lead to the upper floors on which there will be a chapel with seats for 700 persons, a library, reading and writing rooms, lecture room and parlor. Above these will be the kitchen, pantries and laundry. Electric lights will be used throughout and electricity will be the motive power for elevators and ventilating fans. The magnificent gifts and bequests which have enabled the Association to erect such a building have certainly been put to a use which will benefit a large number of Christian women.

The Captains Bargain

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

SUMMARY OF THE STORY.

[Captain Ezekiel Allen, the owner of a mill on Lal's Mountain, after selling some timber at Lacy takes a glass or two of grog and under its influence undertakes the care of a deserted child whom he sees on his way home. His wife 'Liza' refuses to ratify his bargain and insists on the child, named Robert, being sent to the poor-house. Robert, however, makes himself useful to her in amusing her two children and is so pretty and good that she relents on the condition of her husband giving up liquor. The boy as he grows up attracts the attention of Superintendent Murray, a wealthy neighbor whose wife is dead and whose only child is lost. He offers to adopt Robert and, when that offer is declined, proposes to pay the mortgage on Allen's mill and give him a thousand dollars if he will give up the child. From this point the story proceeds.]

'Liza's Illness.

THE Superintendent's appeal touched Captain Allen. He laid aside his wrath. "I'm sorry for you, with all my heart," he said. "I wish I could say a good word for you. But I'm not the only one to speak about Robert. 'Liza has worked for him, made, mended, washed, cooked, done without things for him, as she has for her own. I could not do anything unless 'Liza agreed, and I'm certain she'd say 'No.' Pink would pine to death over it."

"You think it over, and talk it over with Mrs. Allen," said the Superintendent. He rose from the nail-keg and stumbled his way out from under the mill, into the starry night. Captain Allen followed him, and stood listening to his horse's hoofs going up the road. It seemed as if they were already carrying Robert away. Then he entered the living-rooms. The little family, even the twins, were busy about the tubs full of apples.

"What's the matter, 'Zekiel?" said his wife, seeing his distressed face.

"I know," said Jerry, who had been unusually silent. "He's heard the news about old Mr. Wick."

"What news?" asked Captain Allen sharply. "He's had a stroke, and they reckon he's dying."

Meanwhile, Mr. Murray, riding to his lonely chalet, did not fail to see that he might buy the mortgage of Mr. Wick, and then press the Captain by foreclosing it. But though a selfish man, and rendered morose by his sorrows, the Superintendent was not a malicious man. He would not be guilty of so cruel an action. He said to himself that he could still wait; some chance might yet throw the coveted boy into his hands.

After the children had all gone to bed—for Robert and Bop now shared a little room which the Captain had made off from the workshop, and a shabby little place it was, do the best for it that Eliza could—Captain 'Zekiel and his wife sat by the dying fire and discussed their ever-falling fortunes, and Captain 'Zekiel told 'Liza of the offer made by Mr. Murray.

"The mortgage gone, and a thousand in hand, 'Liza, we should be set on our feet."

"But we would not enjoy it," said 'Liza. "It seems as if the new home wouldn't be half a home without our Robert. Oh, 'Zekiel, I can't give him up!"

"And, 'Liza, you said he shouldn't stay, and did not like my bringing him. He was a bad bargain!"

"No, no, 'Zekiel. He has been a good bargain and a blessing. 'Zekiel, do you think we should give him up? What would the children do?"

"Let us all sink or swim together, 'Liza," said Captain Allen, laying his hand on his wife's.

"So we will, 'Zekiel. We won't give up our boy."

No one of old Mr. Wick's relatives, not even his prospective heir, watched so anxiously the progress of his illness as did Captain 'Zekiel; no other one was so rejoiced when the old gentleman began to recover. On the first of January Captain 'Zekiel went to pay his half yearly interest—a small amount, but how hardly earned!

"Well, 'Zekiel," said Mr. Wick, giving a receipt for the money, "I didn't think I'd be here to take any more interest from you. I made sure my nephy Jones would have sold you out by this time. But I may take your money for a number of years yet, 'Zekiel."

"I hope to goodness you may," said Captain Allen. The payment of the mortgage was a good fortune beyond even hoping for. The being allowed to pay the half-yearly interest and not have his ancestral mill sold away from him, reached even beyond the limit of Captain 'Zekiel's expectations. The Captain was not an enterprising, nor active, nor fortunate business man. If he had been offered something to do in the city at twice the amount of a modest living at the mill, he would have stood by Lal's Mountain. His wildest day-dreams never passed beyond a new white house with seven rooms, a veranda, and a little flower-garden, besides a renovated mill. His children might go forth in the world and make their way in wider spheres; the Captain wanted the old place for himself and 'Liza, where the children could come home to visit and bring their children to set their toy boats sailing on the waters where the Captain's grandfather had first set a mill-wheel turning.

As it was, the Allen family, in spite of their poverty, managed to be very happy together in their tumble-down home. So one day went on very like another, and the children grew, and the Captain gathered together his interest money, and Mr. Murray waited, and Robert was thirteen. That spring the Fair-Weather was to go down the river in May. She had some lumber to take as well as the usual odds and ends of her trading expedition. The preparations were well under way when suddenly Mrs. 'Liza, the head and front of the household, fell ill. There had been a deal of sickness in the district that spring, and Mistress Allen had overtaxed herself helping her neighbors. All at once, she who arranged all the family affairs, the woman-with-a-head-on-her-shoulders, to whom they all turned for direction, lay prostrate. She was unable to think, to project, to direct; her thin hands were tremulous, her mind wandered, fever scorched her veins.

The neighbors had always said: "Well, the Allens are so unlucky, the last and worst that can come to them, is to have something happen to 'Liza." And now something happened: Eliza was lying helpless in her bed. The loading of the barge stopped; Jerry was no longer able to offer proposals for new enterprises; the children stood about, awed and quiet or crying; the poor Captain, 'Zekiel, was as a man distracted.

There were so many ill, or aged, or just recovering from sickness in that sparsely settled neighborhood, that there was no one to come to help the Allens. The burly, unaccustomed Captain was left to be sick-nurse, while distress and alarm had rendered him more impracticable than ever. The doctor came. Mrs. Eliza was "all run down;" "she was overworked." "She needed careful nourishing." Among other things she was to have beef-tea. Beef-tea! It was a new dish at the mill. But Jerry got the beef from Lacy when he went after medicines. The doctor had told them how to make beef-tea—but the Captain was hazy as to the instructions. Besides, he theorized if 'Liza needed to be strengthened, the tea should be rich; to his mind the fat was the best part of the meat—the Captain put plenty of fat in his beef-tea.

At last the potent dish was done. Mrs. 'Liza, in her room next the kitchen, had smelled the steam of the decoction, and was sure she did not want to taste it. But oh, she must. What! not take her beef-tea, when the doctor ordered it, and her Captain and the children were in such agony at seeing her ill! She must be heroic. The Captain poured his beef-tea, boiling hot, plenty of it, into a yellow bowl, and hurriedly advanced with it to the bedside while the children looked on.

It is a singular fact that, for some occult reason, the horniest of man-hands can never endure a hot plate or cup, with one-tenth the fortitude of softest woman-hands. Besides, the Captain, in anguish at 'Liza's situation, had quite lost his head. He distinguished himself by dropping the hot bowl, just as he got to the patient. The greasy fluid was distributed over the clean white counterpane, and scalded one of the patient's worn, thin hands. The children shrieked; poor, helpless 'Liza turned her face to the wall and incontinently burst into tears. The Captain tore his hair.

Then Robert rushed to the rescue. He saw that the Captain, the natural nurse of the occasion, was incompetent, so he sprang in before him, tore off the counterpane from the bed before the soup had time to soak through to ruin the clean blanket; seized a dish and deftly mixed 'Liza's remedy for burns—flour, salt, water, in a thick paste—poured it into a towel, and bound up the burned hand. Then he ran for the other clean counterpane and spread it neatly over Eliza, put his father and the children out of the door, bade Pink put the soiled counterpane to soak in a tub of suds, drew the curtains, opened the window, shut the bed-room door, bathed Eliza's face and smoothed her hair, set a bunch of green leaves and white flowers on the little table, and returned to the kitchen, to investigate the remains of the Captain's cooking.

There was still some broth in the little pot, and, luckily, the greasy portion had been spilled. Robert got a little china cup, a shelf ornament, set it on the best plate, put in it one of 'Liza's six small silver spoons, her only "silver," laid by it one of her six napkins, laid on the napkin a finger of brown toast, put the rest of the broth, carefully seasoned, into the cup, and carried the repast to Eliza. "Your hand doesn't hurt now, does it, mother? Pink is washing the quilt in hot suds, and we will bleach it lovely on the grass. And here is some nice broth; and don't worry, I'm going to take care of you. I believe I know how to 'tend sick people."

So he fed 'Liza the broth and toast, shook up her pillow, and went out to inform his father that he himself was now head nurse, and that the kitchen stove should be set out in a little lean-to shed, and no one allowed to walk with shoes, or do work, above the sick-chamber, and the children had better go to school, and leave the place quiet. "And, father, you'd better load up the Fair-Weather and make the trip, and take Bop and the twins with you. Jerry can see to the work, and Pink and I will take care of mother."

"But, Robert. Your mother—I can't go—indeed; suppose your mother should die, while I'm gone." The Captain's eyes were wide and dim, with the horror of the thought; for him the loss of Eliza would end his universe. "It's wrong, Robert, all wrong. Women ought never to die first. Women know how to take care of themselves; but I—but men—can never get on alone." And Captain 'Zekiel leaned his head on the tall blue-painted pump, and tears ran down his rugged face.

"Don't, don't father," pleaded Robert. "She won't die; oh, I know she won't die. We'll take such care of her. If the barge don't go, she'll worry, you know, about needing the money, and all—and she'll be quieter if Bop and the twins are away. She'll be well by the time you come back. Indeed, she'll do better if she sees everything is going on reasonably."

Indeed, when questioned by Robert, 'Liza expressed her strong wish that the Captain should take the younger children and make the trip. So the loading of the barge was completed, and as Robert showed himself an admirable nurse, and the patient did not get worse, the Captain agreed to make his voyage. In truth, he cheered up a little; and seeing Robert deftly brushing his mother's hair, the evening before the Fair-Weather was to leave, the Captain even ventured a jest. "'Liza, he isn't such a Bad Bargain after all; and, 'Liza, he does your hair a deal more softly than you did his, that first evening, you know." For there had been no effort made to deceive Robert as to his place by adoption rather than by birth. Eliza was a sensible woman. "He sees we love him, and do our best for him," she said, "and if we tried to hide from him that we found and adopted him, he would remember a little of the truth, and the whole of it would come out in some unpleasant way to hurt his feelings. It is best to be frank about it from the first." So as soon as Robert was old enough to understand, his coming to the mill was freely spoken of.

Well, the Fair-Weather went down-stream, for the first time in fourteen years, without Eliza. The poor Captain was heavy-hearted as he kept looking back, until the bend in the river hid his home from his eyes. Then, when the barge was out of sight, Robert and Pink hastened in to their duties of nursing and house-keeping.

All was very quiet at the mill. The steady creak of the wheel was a monotone to which they were so accustomed that no one noticed it. The bees in the row of hives, which was one of Jerry's industries, hummed at their work, and no doubt got ready for swarming; Pink borrowed Mrs. Britt's cook-book, and made beef-tea, gruel, panada, and toast water, and chicken broth, by rule and letter. The doctor said there was not a tidier, quieter sick-room in his rounds than Robert kept, and Robert had always something encouraging to tell, some new attention to offer to cheer the invalid. But 'Liza kept her bed, and was weak and unable to rally. She had had a life of hard work and many cares, this poor woman, and her system had lost tone.

The Captain made the shortest trip on his record. He was in a fever of haste to get home. He pushed his barge down-stream or up-stream until late at night. He made short stops. What use was it to stop, when he had not his poor 'Liza with him to make pleasant the visits of friends? He thought sometimes of Mr. Murray, and his sad tale of losing his wife. Poor man, however did he endure such misery! Had it been cruel to refuse to console him with Robert? But then, if Captain 'Zekiel had given away Robert, who at this crisis would have been the indefatigable nurse of Eliza, perhaps to the saving of her life?

So the Captain hurried his expedition. It is a pity that he did not take a little more time to it. He missed the advice, the business perspicacity of Eliza, her ultimatum on each venture. He was duller than ever; indeed, he had not by any means recovered the head he had lost when he spilled the soup and burnt the patient.

Unluckily, also, the Captain did his little trading with new parties. The old acquaintances had sold out to new firms, who saw in Captain 'Zekiel only a man uncommonly easy to over-reach in a bargain. The incapacity to reckon, the dubiousness as to whether Eliza's method was to multiply or divide, was not an occasional but a chronic state with Captain 'Zekiel. Unhappily, also, it made little difference whether he did multiply or divide; by his management the result of either method was painfully likely to be about the same.

Well, he traded, he got rid of his cargo, and he had something in lieu thereof; and, aided by a strong wind, he got up the Schuylkill in much better than usual time. But all the way up black care sat on his broad shoulders, and whispered that he had made a very disastrous trade, and that he was woefully behindhand, and that when his bills were paid he would be short of money for the June interest, and—alas, Captain 'Zekiel!

He reached home, and Eliza was still in bed. Her fever was gone, but she was weak, white, wan, without appetite or energy. She roused a little to inquire the result of the voyage. The Captain's fortitude was at an end. He sat by the table, his head bowed. "I've made a mess of it, 'Liza! You've got a head, and I haven't. I can't do a thing without you! There's all the money I brought back; and, though I've counted it a hundred times, I can't see that I have made above a dollar or so over the expenses."

Mrs. Eliza was overwhelmed for an instant. Then she revived from the shock. It acted as a tonic upon her. "'Zekiel Allen! I see plainly if I allow myself to die, you and the children will be in the county-house in six months. You weren't born to manage for yourself, 'Zekiel. Well, I won't die! Robert; make me a cup of tea and give me a soft-boiled egg; I must get well. If I don't, what will become of you?"

Joy! joy! The voyage had been one disaster, but Eliza was going to get well! Whenever did this admirable woman fail to keep her pledged word? Captain 'Zekiel came out of the depths, a smile passed around the family, playing from face to face, as one hill after another catches the illumination of the morning sun.

Eliza's energetic soul responded to planning. She came out of her sickness a new woman. Captain 'Zekiel rolled the accustomed burden of thinking off his shoulders and betook himself to working on well-planned lines. Beans and pop-corn grew for the autumn trip; the Captain and all the children gathered fruit from dawn to dark all the fruit season; Jerry made lye, and soaked and scoured the tubs as white as snow. Eliza boiled jam and jelly and apple-butter in their season; she also dyed her canary-colored woolen, and made a new dress for the autumn trip.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

K. C., Hunterdon, Pa.—On what day of the week did Columbus discover America?

On Friday, October 12, 1492, Columbus sighted land, which proved to be one of the Bahama Islands.

J. F., Whitehall, Ga.—Where did the idea first originate to imprison criminals?

The first mention the Bible makes of a prison is in Genesis 40: 3 and 42: 17 where it is intimated that prisons existed in Egypt under military control. Prisons seem to have been used in the remotest times, far beyond the reach of history.

J. A. W., Long Island City, N. Y.—What is the speed of a comet?

Astronomers who observed the great comet of 1882 computed its speed at over 300 miles per second. The distance around the sun which it traversed in a little over three hours was 1,000,000 miles. The scientists calculated so closely that they even computed the comet to have lost five feet per second through being retarded by the solar atmosphere.

T. A. and B. L., Xenia, O.—Who was the first chemist?

To say who was the originator of the science of chemistry is now an impossibility. The Egyptians possessed the greatest amount of chemical information of any of the ancients as is evidenced from the excavations in the tombs of that country. The Chinese, too, unquestionably were chemists at a very early stage of the world's history. What the Greeks and Romans knew of the science they gathered from Egypt, which seems to have been the cradle of almost all of the arts and sciences.

Reader, Quincy, Ill.—I see by the daily press that there are now apprehensions in California of a Japanese influx. What is the population of Japan?

Japan has a population of 45,000,000—considerably smaller than our own. There would not seem to be any good reason to fear an invasion of Japanese in such large numbers as to affect the labor market. They are, for the most part, an industrious people, superior physically and morally to the Chinese; shrewd traders and rather peaceful and domestic in disposition. Japan has long been regarded as one of the most progressive of the Asiatic nations.

A. M., Cedar Falls, Ia.—When Christ said (John 13:14), "If I then your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye ought also to wash one another's feet," did he mean this observance to continue till he came again?

It has never been so regarded, except by the Dunkers (a peculiar sect founded in Germany about 1708.) There are 70,000 Dunkers in this country. In some parts of Europe and the East, the washing of feet is observed on certain occasions, as a rigid ceremonial. Within the last few years, an Empress attended a public feet-washing in one of the European capitals.

J. T. L., Newport, Pa.—Can we justify a devotion to religious work so close that it is maintained at the sacrifice of health?

While religious principle is of more value than health or even life itself, God does not ordinarily require a devotion so close that bodily illness will follow. A devotion which would deliberately sacrifice health would belong to the same category as the penances, flagellations and mutilations, self-inflicted by followers of other religions than the Christian. To violate the natural laws set up by God is a sin, yet even such a violation may be justifiable in cases of great emergency.

W. W., Ashland, Mo.—What is meant to be conveyed by the expression "is there no balm in Gilead?"

The balm, or balsam is a common name used for many oily and resinous substances flowing from certain trees or shrubs and used in medicine and surgery. Gilead (Gen. 27: 25 and Jer. 7: 27) was famous for its balm, which was of the species called opobalsamum. This particular balm is mentioned by Pliny, Strabo, Tacitus and other famous historians, as being found in that part of Judea alone. Josephus says the trees or shrubs were originally brought by the Queen of Sheba to Solomon. It is believed, however, that the balsam or true balm of Gilead has long disappeared, although there are still trees belonging to the same class. The gum of the balm tree of Gilead was very precious, especially for healing wounds, hence the expression applied by Jeremiah (8: 22) "Is there no balm in Gilead, is there no physician there?"

Merchant, Rome, N. Y.—Is a person ever justified in telling a falsehood? Suppose I were sheltering a fugitive from a furious mob, and knew that to betray his presence would be followed by his death. Would I be justified in denying all knowledge of him? Would such a departure from truth be justifiable?

The question propounded by our correspondent is one concerning which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would be pleased to hear the opinions of its readers. All answers sent will be carefully read and considered with a view to publication.

A GREAT COUNCIL.

The Congregational Conference in London this Month, and its Object.

ONE of the most important Church Councils of the year will be held in London next week. All the Congregational Churches in the world are invited to send representatives, and the subjects to be discussed will include many of the leading questions that have been recently debated in religious circles all over Christendom. Rev. R. W. Dale, LL.D., of Birmingham, who will preside, is one of the ablest clergymen in Great Britain, being equally well-known in the pulpit and on the lecture platform. The United States will be represented by about one hundred delegates. The Rev. Henry Hazen, of Boston, Secretary of the National Congregational Council, announces that the honor of delivering the Council sermon has been given to the Americans and that it will be preached by Rev. Dr. Edward P. Goodwin, of Chicago. Other American divines who will take a prominent part in the Council's deliberations are:

Revs. N. Boynton, Boston, Mass.; A. H. Bradford, D. D., Montclair, N. J.; James Brand, D. D., Oberlin, O.; N. P. Clark, D. D., Boston; Richard Cordley, D. D., Lawrence, Kan.; A. E. Dunning, D. D., Boston; Professor F. W. Fisk, D. D., Chicago, Ill.; B. M. Fullerton, Waltham, Mass.; Washington Gladden, D. D., Columbus, O.; Arthur Little, D. D., Boston; John K. McLean, D. D., Oakland, Cal.; William H. Moore, Hartford, Conn.; President Cyrus W. Northrop, LL. D., Minneapolis, Minn.; A. H. Quint, D. D., Boston; A. H. Ross, D. D., Port Huron, Mich.; Professor L. F. Stearns, D. D., Bangor, Me.; Henry A. Stimson, D. D., St. Louis, Mo.; William M. Taylor, New York; Professor William J. Tucker, D. D., Andover, Mass.

Among the topics to be discussed are the following:

1. Congregationalism, Domestic, i. e., in its own internal working forces, such as Sunday schools, Young People's societies, theological currents of thought, ecclesiastical councils and training of ministers. 2. Congregationalism in the Nation; Home Missions; Church and State; Labor and Capital; Temperance; International Federation for the Promotion of Peace and Righteousness. 3. Congregationalism in the Church Catholic. 4. Congregationalism and the World Missions in their broadest scope and claims.

One of the objects of the Council is to promote acquaintance and fellowship, and to learn what the denomination is doing in its various fields of labor, as well as to listen to the reading of a number of papers prepared by leading members and submitted in advance to a Committee of Arrangements. It is impossible to foretell what may be done in the way of overtures to other denominations. The Congregational Churches are, to a large extent, independent, no national or international body having any authority to legislate for them. This leaves the field open for a wide range of discussion and action. It is possible the Council may change the present system and create a governing body invested by the churches, with a supervising power over the churches which have till now been autonomous.

Some of the best known clergymen of the denomination have expressed their opinions of the outlook of the Council. President Franklin W. Fisk, of the Chicago Theological Seminary, believes that it will be largely a missionary body and ready to work in harmony with all other Christian organizations. The Rev. William Taylor, D. D., will in all probability, be a silent member. The Rev. A. H. Bradford, D. D., of Montclair, N. J., will read a paper on the "Doctrinal Tests of Church Membership." He believes religious conditions in this country will be fully considered, especially those relating to the methods of ministerial education and missionary work. He considers it altogether probable that some strong deliverance will be issued concerning the union of all Christian bodies; but, as the Council is simply in the nature of a conference without authority, whatever it does will be purely in the way of recommendation.

The Rev. Richard Cordley, of Kansas, thinks that among the religious conditions in this country almost certain to be broadly considered will be the work of women in the churches, the work among the youth, the development and future of Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor, the relations of the Church to capital and labor, and its attitude upon the drink question. He will deliver an address on the "Laws Respecting the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors," in which he will review restrictive legislation and show that the drink traffic is the great and overshadowing evil of the present generation.

The Rev. Henry A. Stimson of St. Louis, believes there is no reason to doubt that what ever can be done to bring about a closer fellowship of Christians will surely be done.

It is hoped that one of the most interesting figures in the Conference will be the Rev. Francis E. Clark, D. D., the founder of the Christian Endeavor movement in the United States. He regards the Council as especially timely and is confident that it will do much good and will result in a blessing to the denomination and to the world at large. Should he be able to attend, he will speak of the history and growth of the Christian Endeavor movement and its wonderful spread from one society in 1881 to almost 15,000 in the present year, with a membership reaching nearly a million souls. The Society has now a flourishing membership in England also, besides an Australian section and thriving branches in all the missionary lands.

These are only a few of the more important topics to be discussed by the approaching Council, which will mark a notable era in the history of Congregationalism here and in Europe. Portraits are given above of President R. W. Dale, Rev. Amory H. Bradford, Rev. Richard Cordley, Rev. F. E. Clark, and President Franklin W. Fisk of the Chicago Theological Seminary.

Leave the World for Jesus.

"If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."—1 John, ii: 15.

JUST FOR TO-DAY.

JUST for to-day, my Saviour,
To-morrow is not mine;
Just for to-day, I ask Thee
For light, and help divine,
To-morrow's care I must not bear,
The future is all Thine.

To-day I bring my measure
To Thee, that Thou might'st fill
And bless it, Lord, and teach me
To trust and to be still,
To-day I'd be, my God, for Thee,
And do Thy holy will.

Just for to-day, my Saviour,
For ere the morrow break
Thy voice may call me unto Thee,
And I shall no more walk
The desert path with need of faith,
But face to face shall talk.

And if I have enough, Lord,
To-day, why should I grieve
Because of what I have not,
And may not need to have?
Each day, I pray Thee, have Thy way,
And I will trust Thy love.

HE KNOWETH.

LIFE has its desert shadow
Its interspace of tears;
And yet a sunburst often breaks
And scatters swift our fears.
For as a father pitieth
The children of his love,
So God, our Father, watched us
With pity from above.

Our feeble frame He knoweth,
Remembreth we are dust,
And evermore His face is kind,
His ways are ever just.
In evil and in blindness
Through darkened maze we rove,
But still our Father leads us home,
By strength of mighty love.

GOD LIVETH EVER.

God liveth ever!
Wherefore, soul, despair thou never!
What though thou tread with bleeding feet
A thorny path of grief and gloom?
Thy God will choose the way most meet
To lead thee heavenward, lead thee home.
For this life's long night of sadness
He will give thee peace and gladness.

A NEW DEPARTURE.

SAID Uncle Sam: "I will be wise,
And thus the Indian civilize:
Instead of guns that kill a mile,
Tobacco, lead and liquor vile,
Instead of serving out a meal,
Or sending agents out to steal,
I'll give, domestic arts to teach,
A cake of 'IVORY SOAP' to each.
Before it flies the guilty stain,

The grease and dirt no more remain,
'T will change their nature day by day,
And wash their darkest blots away.
They'll turn their bows to fishing-rods,
And bury hatchets under sods,
In wisdom and in worth increase,
And ever smoke the pipe of peace;
For ignorance can never cope
With such a foe as 'IVORY SOAP.'"

WORK AT NORTHFIELD.

The College Students' Summer School—A Conference for Bible Study.

NORTHFIELD, the birthplace of Dwight L. Moody, the greatest of American evangelists, is becoming more and more every year the centre of a vast missionary and educational movement. Its schools, its summer gatherings, its conventions and the grand work that is done there, individually and collectively for Christ, are now known to many thousands of earnest workers who, only a few years ago, were unaware of the existence of the pretty and secluded New England village. Every June, after his tireless rounds of labor during the preceding months, Mr. Moody returns to Northfield and at once plunges into the business pertaining to his two schools—the Seminary for young men and that for young women—and the preparations for the summer gatherings. To the students, in these June weeks, he assumes the role of theological professor and encourager. In the Students' Summer School there are pupils from all parts of the world and these have the advantage of listening to the teachings and expositions of such eminent divines as Rev. John Smith, of Edinburgh, Scotland; Professor W. W. Moore, of Virginia; Professor W. G. Moorehead, of Ohio; Dr. W.

Arthur T. Pierson, of Philadelphia; R. A. Torrey, of Chicago; Major D. W. Whittle, Rev. Mr. A. Gumbart, of Boston; L. W. Munhall, of Philadelphia and others. Most of those named will be among the speakers at the different meetings. The music will be led by Ira D. Sankey and George C. Stebbins.

Mr. Moody in his announcement of the coming Conference states that there will be a Bible lecture daily through the summer, so that those who would like to rest and study can do so. He extends a general and cordial invitation to all who desire to enjoy the benefit of these meetings.

The illustration accompanying this article shows one of the many handsome buildings that have been erected at Northfield in the interest of the educational movement.

The Young Ladies' Seminary, costing $20,000, East Hall $30,000, the Marquand Memorial Building $60,000, Recitation Hall and Stone Hall are all structures that would do credit to a metropolis. The Library Building cost $20,000. The bulk of the money needed for these buildings was contributed mainly by Christian people friends of Mr. Moody and warm supporters of the Northfield scheme. Messrs. James Talcott of New York, D. M. Weston, Boston; D. W. McWilliams, Brooklyn, and Postmaster General Wanamaker were among the leading donors, the latter bearing the entire cost of beautifying the Seminary grounds and the lake.

There are two courses of instruction at Northfield, each covering three years. The study of the Bible is a leading feature in both courses, the principle observed being that Bible study should underlie and overlie all education. Much time is devoted to the life of Christ. Many former students are now successful missionaries in foreign fields, while others are engaged in city mission work at home.

Not only does Mr. Moody give liberally of his time to the boys and girls studying at Northfield, but he devotes to the same object all the money realised from the sale of his hymn books. The total cost of tuition and board is $100 per capita, yearly. It is thus an easy matter for philanthropic persons to pay for the maintenance of one or more students, and, indeed, this is frequently done. There are among the 700 students at Northfield many whose expenses have been defrayed by kind friends of large means, interested in their welfare.

The Summer School for College students had its inception in 1886, when Mr. Moody invited all the colleges of the United States and Canada to send delegates to a "Summer School" at Mount Hermon. The result was a surprise, two hundred and fifty students, representing eighty colleges accepting the invitation to spend their vacation "searching the Dealers who claim that their preparations are "as good as Hood's Sarsaparilla," by so doing admit that Hood's is the standard and possesses peculiar merit which they try in vain to reach.

Scriptures." Before the close of the first session ninety-five had devoted themselves to missionary careers, and of that number many are now in the field serving the Lord.

One of the features of the Northfield schools and seminary is the Ladies' Aid Society, formed five years ago, and of which Mrs. Moody is treasurer. The object is to lend money to deserving students and the custom is to pay fifty cent of the total cost of educating a student who is not otherwise fully provided for. The student is expected to pay the balance. This welcome aid has aroused in the students a helpful spirit, and they strive in every possible way by extending assistance to each other, and by meeting the debt at the first opportunity, to show their appreciation.

To fully describe the attractions of Northfield, the breadth and general scope of the Christian scheme of education now in operation, and the many beautiful philanthropies that find practical expression there, would fill an entire issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. At some day in the near future we may take occasion to return to this subject and deal with it at much greater length.

ONE OF THE SCHOOL BUILDINGS AT NORTHFIELD.

R. Harper, Professor R. E. Thompson, of Philadelphia, and others. This year the Summer School—which is distinct from the regular schools that are in operation all the year round—opened on June 27 and there have been hundreds of interested and delighted visitors every day. Thus far, Yale has had many more representatives present this year than Harvard, and between studies morning and evening and athletics in the cool afternoons, the students were fully occupied. On July 4th Mr. Moody himself led in a great patriotic celebration and the best of feeling prevailed. There was a good deal of speechmaking and the boys did their share of it in true, hearty, spread-eagle fashion.

Three weeks hence, on July 30th, the Ninth General Conference for Bible Study and Equipment for Christian work will be held at Northfield, lasting till August 9th. This is the second part of the regular summer programme at this famous assembly ground of those interested in Christian work. At the Conference there is likely to be a very large attendance of well-known divines, including Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D., of Boston; Revs. F. B. Meyer, of London; Russell, of Philadelphia; Dr.

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

Mr. Spurgeon's New Book.

WITH A PAGE OF PRECIOUS PROMISES FOR EVERY DAY OF THE YEAR.

THE CHEQUE BOOK of the BANK OF FAITH, BEING PRECIOUS PROMISES ARRANGED FOR DAILY USE. With Brief Experimental Comments. Nearly 400 pages. 12mo. Price $1.50.

In Mr. Spurgeon's Preface he says: "I believe all the promises of God, but many of them I have personally tried and proved, I have seen that they are true, for they have been fulfilled to me. I commenced these daily portions when I was wading in the Surf of Controversy. Since then I have been cast into waters to swim, which, but for God's upholding hand, would have proved waters to drown in. The waters rolled in continually, wave upon wave. I do not mention this to exact sympathy, but simply to let the reader see that I am no dry-land sailor—I know the roll of the billows, and the rush of the winds. Never were the promises of Jehovah so precious to me as at this hour."

N. Y. Christian Intelligencer: "When it is stated that this well-named book contains a SCRIPTURE PROMISE FOR EACH DAY IN THE YEAR, commented on, in his best vein, by the prince of practical and experimental preachers, enough has been said to commend as first in its class. It is most admirably adapted for daily reading either in the family or the closet, and wherever used will be found spiritually stimulative."

"Mr. Spurgeon's words are so plain, his style so sparkling, and his spirit so devout, that the reading of his productions is almost sure to excite a mental glow and awaken holy aspirations. This book is brimful of quickening, soothing, soul-lifting power, and is admirably adapted to the end in view."—N. Y. Witness.

RESCUED AND RESCUING OTHERS.

A ROMANTIC story is told in the Church at Home and Abroad, of a zealous worker for Christ, who died recently in the city of Heong Shan, China. It was her native city. Her father was an opium-smoker, who, falling into poverty through his vice, sold his daughter to pay his debts. After years of hard servitude and cruel treatment, she escaped to the mountains, but was discovered, sold again in Hong Kong and thence sent to California. Here the same life of ill-usage, toil and blows awaited her, but, hearing of the Mission Home from some neighbors, she fled thither and was taken in, protected, taught and cared for. There she was converted and baptized, and remained with the teacher and matron of that Home until her marriage. Her husband was in business in San Francisco and became very successful. A little over a year ago, he relinquished his business and he and his wife returned to China as self-supporting missionaries. On their arrival in Canton, their little daughter sickened and died in the Missionary Hospital there. After the death of the little girl, the mother went with her husband to her native city, Heong Shan. There, they were laying plans for their volunteer missionary work, when the wife was prostrated by fever and died after a short illness. The missionary who reports her death says: "She was remarkable for her lovely Christian character, constant study of the Bible and missionary zeal. Her loss is a sad blow."

A MEDICAL MISSIONARY'S REWARD.

A SIGNIFICANT incident is reported from Kurdistan where Dr. Cockrem's American Medical Mission has won the confidence and esteem even of the ferocious Kurds. These men who are noted for the ruthless savagery with which they descend on Persian villages, burning and stealing and killing, have occasionally had their wounds treated at the mission, and have not forgotten their obligation. It appears that one of the most powerful sheikhs whose home was but a few miles away from the mission was sick, and sent a messenger with a request that Dr. Cockrem would visit him. The good missionary-doctor started immediately. He found the sheikh down with pneumonia, and in imminent danger. He remained with his patient until he was quite recovered, and did his utmost to lead the man to Christ. In this he seemed less successful than he had been in his medical work. Some time afterward another summons reached Dr. Cockrem from the sheikh. This time the sheikh was not sick. He had sent for the doctor to inform him that he was about to besiege a certain village, but had heard that the doctor had a mission there. Before commencing the attack he had sent to Dr. Cockrem to assure him that the mission and all it contained would be unhurt. Five hundred Christians with their flocks and herds were gathered into the lands surrounding the mission, and during the whole time that the siege lasted, not one of them was injured, although the village was almost devastated and hundreds of the people were slain.

IN THE ZENANAS OF INDIA.

LATE news from India indicates that at last, there is hope of reaching the native women, who are secluded in the Zenanas. Some of the cures effected by lady medical missionaries, have been noised abroad, and, now they are in constant request for native invalid women, who in former days would have pined away, and died in neglect. The Secretary of the Mission, which is undenominational, says: "The Zenanas are open to our lady physicians; in fact there are more opportunities than they are able to embrace. At Patna at one time the Mohammedan leaders made a stir to 'turn out these two ladies,' as they said, and the Mission compound was surrounded; but they have quieted down now, and, so far from our ladies being turned out, they are now engaged in a valuable school, Zenana, and medical work there. At Lucknow last year thirty-nine major and 183 minor operations were performed by the lady doctors. You will see that this medical work supplies a much-felt need. The sufferings which women in India undergo during sickness are such as would appeal to the sympathy and pity of all hearts, and the provision in the native homes in times of sickness is so inadequate that hospitals are an absolute necessity, if patients are to be successfully treated. We believe that millions of the women in India are suffering untold miseries, which could be prevented or greatly mitigated by additional hospitals at numerous centres, under the direction of competent lady medical practitioners.

HOW A SCHOOL WAS FORMED.

MR. GREIG, one of the Christian gentlemen who is helping Mr. McAll in his mission work in Paris, gives the following history of the founding of one of the most successful of the schools in the French capital: "We had been working in the school in the Faubourg St. Antoine, and had been so blessed there that I was anxious to open another school in the Petit Montrouge—a district quite as badly in need of the Gospel as St. Antoine. I went there, but could not find any room for hire that was suitable. After spending all day going through its dirty streets and finding no place, I was returning disappointed, when a poor, little, deformed child ran out of one of the alley-ways and caught my arm. 'Oh, Mr. Greig,' she said, with evident pleasure, 'are you going to open a Sunday-school here? I hope you are. We had such a nice one in the Faubourg St. Antoine! I was so sorry to leave it, but father and mother left Paris to come here, and I had to come with them.' 'My little girl, there is not a place to be had in Montrouge. I have been looking for one, but there is none.' 'Oh, but you will find one,' she replied, 'for I have asked God for it.' Mr. Greig smiled and said, 'May it be so, my child, continue to pray.' Returning to Paris, he thought much on the faith of the little girl. Two days after he was informed that the owner of a drinking shop had failed, and that the place was offered at a low rent. He returned to Montrouge, found it was so, hired the shop and opened a Sunday-school. The prayerful little girl was one of the first scholars. The second Sunday she brought eight other children. The school continued to grow, and the little girl was always hunting up and bringing in new scholars. It is now the most prosperous we have."

AN ALL-NIGHT STUDY.

AN interesting incident is related in a letter received shortly before his recent death from Rev. J. Gilmour, whose portrait appeared in this journal on June 24. He said that in a journey over a new district he arrived at a strange town. According to his usual custom he invited the people to his tent. A large number responded and among them the lama or priest of the village. Mr. Gilmour explained to them the way of salvation but made little impression. At last the lama began to put questions, beginning in a hostile spirit. Mr. Gilmour's courtesy disarmed him and then his questions were evidently prompted by a desire for light. The people became interested in the discussion between their priest and the stranger, and listened attentively. At the end Mr. Gilmour gave the lama a New Testament and he sat down there and then to study it. The other people went away. The lama read on, now and then asking a question. Finally Mr. Gilmour having travelled far that day and having exhausted himself at the evening meeting, grew sleepy and rolling himself in his sheepskin blanket was soon wrapped in unconscious and refreshing slumber. Presently he woke up, and there, sitting by the fire, he saw the lama reading slowly away at the Gospel which had been given him a few hours before. And thus he continued to read the whole night through. In the morning the lama, in no degree wearied by his night vigil, resumed the discussion with new zest and when Mr. Gilmour left him it was with strong hope of his conversion.

A NOBLE MEMORIAL.

New Home of the Brooklyn Y. W. C. A. —
A Consecrated Woman's Life fitly Crowned.

WOMAN'S work for Christ has extended wonderfully within the last decade in all the large centres of population. Where, ten years ago, she bore a comparatively small share of the public burden of Christian work, to-day she is laboring side by side with the other sex in a thousand avenues of spiritual usefulness. Some of the handsomest buildings devoted to missionary efforts have been erected and are to-day controlled by female management. In New York, Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Philadelphia and several other large cities, commanding edifices have been raised largely by the efforts of women and are now, in their own sections, headquarters of practical Christian activity, with an influence for good reaching in every direction.

The Young Women's Christian Association of Brooklyn is a recent growth. Nothing speaks more eloquently of its development than the fact that, in 1888, a mere handful of Earnest Christian Women composed the entire membership, while the last annual report for 1890 shows a membership of nearly 1,500. Fourteen ladies in the Fall of 1888 filed a certificate of incorporation, their object being to promote "the temporal, mental and spiritual welfare of young women, particularly of those dependent upon their own exertions for their support."

These incorporators were Harriet Judson, Helen F. McWilliams, Mary A. Brigham, Caroline E. Prentiss, Emily S. Wood, Matilda H. Spelman, Mary L. Beers, Nellie A. Porter, Caroline McP. Bergh, Caroline Field, Adela J. Lyon, Lillian W. Betts, Sarah Trustlow and Martha C. McLeod. The trustees and managers of the Association during the first year of its existence included, besides several of the incorporators, Harriet P. Packer, Mary V. Terhune, Kate Duryea, Louise M. Cuddy, Elizabeth L. Catlin and Mary May, all well-known and honored names in the "City of Churches," and abundantly qualified, by reason of their high Christian character and social position, to give the new society the necessary impetus at the start.

Like many similar organizations, the new Association began its work

In a Modest Way, holding its meetings in the Johnston Building, on Flatbush Avenue near Fulton Street, Brooklyn. At first it occupied only two rooms; then its growth necessitated the use of an entire floor, with parlor and library. The rapid expansion of the last twelve months has shown the Association the advisability of finding permanent quarters of its own, where classes in languages, dress-making, white sewing, history, arithmetic, penmanship, stenography, type-writing, book-keeping, cooking and various other branches of education could be conducted with all the facilities and privileges necessary to a great institution. In her report for last year, President Mrs. Charles N. Judson, says: "the educational, the employment and the spiritual are being more closely drawn together as the one purpose that animates them all is developed," and in this happy

Spirit of Sisterly Love the affairs of the Association have been thus far successfully conducted.

When it was decided that the young society should seek quarters suited to its growth, the Hon. S. B. Chittenden, (a wealthy Brooklyn gentleman, formerly a member of Congress, and who has since passed away), deeded to it a plot of ground on the corner of Schermerhorn Street and Flatbush Avenue, for the purpose of erecting a building. The plot is ninety-five by ninety-five feet and adjoins a public school. Following this generous gift came an offer from another wealthy Christian gentleman, Mr.

C. D. Wood of $125,000 as the nucleus of a building fund, on the condition that an additional $100,000 should be secured, the second $100,000 to constitute an endowment fund to be invested and held in trust for the Association.

This wise stipulation was not long in being complied with. The friends of the Association went vigorously to work, and within six months, the total fund, amounting to considerably over the necessary quarter of a million, was raised. The next step in order was signed a structure which when completed will not only meet the requirements of the Association but will be an ornament to the city as well. The proposed building is shown in the illustration. It is to be six stories in height, including the basement, the front to be faced with light, tan-colored brick, with ornamental terracotta trimmings to match. The main entrance will be adorned with carved pillars and will be in the centre of the building. An outer vestibule with marble steps will lead to the level. On one side of the octagonal hallway will be the Secretary's office, and also the entrances to the cloak room and the elevators. The chapel, which is reached from the hallway, has a dome-shaped ceiling, the centre of which extends through all the floors, up to the roof. On stories will be taken up by class rooms, of which there will be eighteen, all of ample dimensions and well supplied with the necessary equipment for the various studies. The style of architecture is

Italian Renaissance, and the entire cost, exclusive of the site, will be little short of $150,000. The building will be ready for occupancy by May, 1892. One of its unique features will be a roof garden, where in the heated evenings of summer, after toil is over, the members may go and enjoy a refreshing breeze. This garden, lighted by electricity, will cover the rear half of the roof and will command a fine view.

In accepting from the living donor, the gift that made the complete success of their organization possible, the Association did not fail to recognize God's goodness which came thus unexpectedly to the rescue. It was a gift made in memory of a noble Christian woman now passed away, and who, during a lifetime spent in works of charity and love, was one of the warmest friends of the Brooklyn working girls. The late Mrs. C. D. Wood, in whose memory the princely gift was made by her husband and children, was one whose friendship upheld the Association in its infancy and she had endeared herself to its members in a thousand different ways. The memorial gift having been supplemented by public donations to the necessary amount, Mrs. Wood's faith in the ultimate success of her philanthropic scheme is thus assured.

Much good work has been accomplished by the Association, in the few years of its active existence. Its membership embraces many nationalities and all ages, and almost every occupation open to women is represented, including many that require a high standard of intelligence, such as artists, engravers, journalists, governesses, secretaries, librarians, cashiers, stenographers. There are also represented the more ordinary avocations in stores, factories and workshops. Within three years, 1112 girls have applied for work at the Intelligence Bureau of the Association, and an average of 320 positions a year have been filled. It is a work in which public interest is steadily growing, and demonstrates the value and potentiality of co-operation among working-women, who, when they are banded together for Christian objects, find friends multiply on every hand, and realize in their happiness and success, the truth of the sacred saying: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

the ground floor, on the opposite side from the Secretary's room, there will be a large salesroom in which articles made by the members will be displayed to buyers. In the basement will be the physician's room and pharmacy, the intelligence office, baths and gymnasium. On the second floor will be the library and reading-room with a gallery and storage room for books. On the third story will be the large lecture-room, with a seating capacity of three hundred, and a handsome parlor connecting, with sliding doors between. ### THE WITNESS-STAND.

Rev. Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning at Great Camp-Meeting at High Bridge, Ky., the Text being, "We are witnesses." Acts 3:15.

STANDING amid the hills and groves of Kentucky, and before this great multitude that no man can number, most of whom I never saw before and never will see again in this world, I choose a very practical theme. In the days of George Stephenson, the perfecter of the locomotive engine, the scientists proved conclusively that a railroad train could never be driven by steam-power successfully without peril; but the rushing express trains from Liverpool to Edinburgh, and from Edinburgh to London, have made all the nation witnesses of the splendid achievement. Machinists and navigators proved conclusively that a steamer could never cross the Atlantic Ocean; but no sooner had they successfully proved the impossibility of such an undertaking than the work was done and the passengers on the Cunard and the Inman and the National and the White Star lines are witnesses. There went up a guffaw of wise laughter at Professor Morse's proposition to make the lightning of heaven his errand boy, and it was proved conclusively that the thing could never be done; but now all the news of the wide world put in your hands every morning and night, has made all nations witnesses.

So in the time of Christ it was proved conclusively that it was impossible for him to rise from the dead. It was shown logically that when a man was dead, he was dead, and the heart and the liver and the lungs having ceased to perform their offices, the limbs would be rigid beyond all power of friction or arousal. They showed it to be an absolute absurdity that the dead Christ should ever get up alive; but no sooner had they proved this than the dead Christ arose, and the disciples beheld him, heard his voice, and talked with him, and they took the witness stand, to prove that to be true which the wisecracks of the day had proved to be impossible; the record of the experiment and of the testimony is in the text: "Him hath God raised from the dead, whereof we are witnesses."

Now, let me play the sceptic for a moment. "There is no God," says the sceptic, "for I have never seen him with my physical eyesight. Your Bible is a pack of contradictions. There never was a miracle. Lazarus was not raised from the dead, and the water was never turned into wine. Your religion is an imposition on the credulity of the ages." There is an aged man moving in that pew as though he would like to respond. Here are hundreds of people with faces a little flushed at these announcements, and all through this throng there is a suppressed feeling which would like to speak out in behalf of the truth of our glorious Christianity, as in the days of the text, crying out: "We are witnesses!"

The fact is, that if this world is ever brought to God, it will not be through argument, but through testimony. You might cover the whole earth with apologies for Christianity, and learned treatises in defence of religion—you would not convert a soul. Lectures on the harmony between science and religion are beautiful mental discipline, but have never saved a soul, and never will save a soul. Put a man of the world and a man of the Church against each other, and the man of the world will, in all probability, get the triumph. There are a thousand things in our religion that seem illogical to the world, and always will seem illogical.

Our weapon in this conflict is faith, not logic; faith, not metaphysics; faith, not profundity; faith, not scholastic exploration. But then, in order to have faith, we must have testimony, and if five hundred men, or one thousand men, or five hundred thousand men, or five million men get up and tell me that they have felt the religion of Jesus Christ a joy, a comfort, a help, an inspiration, I am bound as a fair-minded man to accept their testimony. I want just now to put before you three propositions, the truth of which I think this audience will attest with overwhelming unanimity. The first proposition is: We are witnesses that the religion of Christ is able to convert a soul. The Gospel may have had a hard time to conquer us, we may have fought it back, but we were vanquished. You say conversion is only an imaginary thing. We know better. "We are witnesses." There never was so great a change in our heart and life on any other subject as on this. People laughed at the missionaries in Madagascar because they preached ten years without one convert; but there are many thousands of converts in Madagascar to-day. People laughed at Dr. Judson, the Baptist missionary, because he kept on preaching in Burmah five years without a single convert; but there are many thousands of Baptists in Burmah to-day. People laughed at Doctor Morrison, in China, for preaching there seven years without a single conversion; but there are many thousands of Christians in China to-day. People laughed at the missionaries for preaching at Tahiti for fifteen years without a single conversion, and at the missionaries for preaching in Bengal seventeen years without a single conversion; yet in all those lands there are multitudes of Christians to-day.

But why go so far to find evidences of the Gospel's power to save a soul? "We are witnesses." We were so proud that no man could have humbled us; we were so hard that no earthly power could have melted us; angels of God were all around about us; they could not overcome us; but one day, perhaps at a Methodist anxious seat, or at a Presbyterian catechetical lecture, or at a burial, or on horseback, a power seized us, and made us get down, and made us tremble, and made us kneel, and made us cry for mercy, and we tried to wrench ourselves away from the grasp, but we could not. It flung us flat, and when we arose we were as much changed as Gourgis, the heathen, who went into a prayer-meeting with a dagger and a gun, to disturb the meeting and destroy it, but the next day was found crying: "Oh! my great sins! Oh! my great Saviour!" and for eleven years preached the Gospel of Christ to his fellow mountaineers, the last words on his dying lips being "Free grace!" Oh, it was free grace!

There is a man who was for ten years a hard drinker. The dreadful appetite had sent down its roots around the palate and the tongue, and on down until they were interlinked with the vitals of body, mind and soul; but he has not taken any stimulants for two years. What did that? Not temperance societies. Not prohibition laws. Not moral suasion. Conversion did it. "Why," said one upon whom the great change had come, "sir, I feel just as though I were somebody else." There is a sea-captain who swore all the way from New York to Havana, and from Havana to San Francisco, and when he was in port he was worse than when he was on sea. What power was it that washed his tongue clean of profanities, and made him a psalm-singer? Conversion by the Holy Spirit. There are thousands of people here to-day who are no more what they once were than a water-lily is a nightshade, or a morning lark is a vulture, or day is night.

Now, if I should demand that all those people here present who have felt the converting power of religion should rise, so far from being ashamed, they would spring to their feet with more alacrity than they ever sprang to the dance, the tears mingling with their exhilaration as they cried, "We are witnesses!" And if they tried to sing the old Gospel hymn, they would break down with emotion by the time they got to the second line:

Ashamed of Jesus, that dear friend
On whom my hopes of heaven depend?
No! When I blush, be this my shame:
That I no more revere his name.

Again, I remark that "we are witnesses" of the Gospel's power to comfort. When a man has trouble the world comes in and says: "Now get your mind off this; go out and breathe the fresh air; plunge deeper into business." What poor advice! Get your mind off it! when everything is upturned with the bereavement, and everything reminds you of what you have lost. Get your mind off it! They might as well advise you to stop thinking, and you cannot stop thinking in that direction. Take a walk in the fresh air! Why, along that very street, or that very road, she once accompanied you. Out of that grass-plot she plucked flowers, or into that show-window she looked fascinated, saying, "Come see the pictures." Go deeper into business! Why, she was associated with all your business ambition, and since she has gone you have no ambition left. Oh, this is a clumsy world when it tries to comfort a broken heart! I can build a Corliss engine, I can paint a Raphael's "Madonna," I can play a Beethoven's "Symphony" as easily as this world can comfort a broken heart. And yet you have been comforted. How was it done? Did Christ come to you and say, "Get your mind off this, go out and breathe the fresh air; plunge deeper into business?" No: There was a minute when he came to you—perhaps in the watches of the night, perhaps in your place of business, perhaps along the street—and he breathed something into your soul that gave peace, rest, infinite quiet, so that you could take out the photograph of the departed one and look into the eyes and the face of the dear one and say: "It is all right; she is better off; I would not call her back. Lord, I thank thee that thou has comforted my poor heart."

There are Christian parents here who are willing to testify to the power of this Gospel to comfort. Your son had just graduated from school or college and was going into business, and the Lord took him. Or your daughter had just graduated from the young ladies' seminary, and you thought she was going to be a useful woman, and of long life; but the Lord took her, and you were tempted to say, "All this culture of twenty years for nothing!" Or the little child came home from school with the hot fever that stopped not for the agonized prayer or for the skilful physician, and the little child was taken. Or the babe was lifted out of your arms by some quick epidemic, and you stood wondering why God ever gave you that child at all, if so soon he was to take it away. And yet you are not repining, you are not fretful, you are not fighting against God. What enabled you to stand all the trial? "Oh," you say, "I took the medicine that God gave my sick soul. In my distress I threw myself at the feet of a sympathizing God; and when I was too weak to pray, or to look up, he breathed into me a peace that I think must be the foretaste of that heaven where there is neither a tear nor a farewell nor a grave." Come, all ye who have been out to the grave to weep there—come all ye comforted souls, get up off your knees. Is there no power in this Gospel to soothe the heart? Is there no power in this religion to quiet the worst paroxysm of grief? There comes up an answer from comforted widowhood, and orphanage, and childlessness, saying, "Ay, ay, we are witnesses!"

Again, I remark that we are witnesses of the fact that religion has power to give composure in the last moment. I shall never forget the first time I confronted death. We went across the corn-fields in the country. I was led by my father's hand, and we came to the farm-house where the bereavement had come and we saw the crowd of wagons and carriages; but there was one carriage that especially attracted my boyish attention, and it had black plumes. I said: "What's that? what's that? Why those black tassels at the top?" And after it was explained to me, I was lifted up to look upon the bright face of an aged Christian woman, who three days before had departed in triumph. The whole scene made an impression I never forgot.

In our sermons and in our lay exhortations we are very apt, when we want to bring illustrations of dying triumph, to go back to some distinguished personage—to a John Knox or a Harriett Newell. But I want you for witnesses. I want to know if you have ever seen anything to make you believe that the religion of Christ can give composure in the final hour. Now, in the courts, attorney, jury and judge will never admit mere hearsay. They demand that the witness must have seen with his own eyes, or heard with his own ears, and so I am critical in my examination of you now; and I want to know whether you have seen or heard anything that makes you believe that the religion of Christ gives composure in the final hour.

"Oh, yes," you say, "I saw my father and mother depart. There was a great difference in their death-beds. Standing by the one we felt more veneration. By the other, there was more tenderness." Before the one, you bowed, perhaps, in awe. In the other case, you felt as if you would like to go along with her. How did they feel in that last hour? How did they seem to act? Were they very much frightened? Did they take hold of this world with both hands as though they did not want to give it up? "Oh, no," you say; "no; I remember as though it were yesterday; she had a kind word for us all, and there were a few mementoes distributed among the children, and then she told us how kind we must be to our father in his loneliness, and then she kissed us good-by and went asleep as a child in a cradle." What made her so composed? Natural courage? "No," you say; "mother was very nervous; when the carriage inclined to the side of the road, she would cry out; she was always rather weakly." What gave her composure? Was it because she did not care much for you, and the pang of parting was not great? "Oh," you say, "she showered upon us a wealth of affection; no mother ever loved her children more than mother loved us; she showed it by the way she nursed us when we were sick, and she toiled for us until her strength gave out." What, then, was it that gave her composure in the last hour? Do not hide it. Be frank, and let me know? "Oh," you say, "it was because she was so good; she made the Lord her portion, and she had faith that she would go straight to glory, and that we should all meet her at last at the foot of the throne."

Here are people who say, "I saw a Christian brother die, and he triumphed." And some one else, "I saw a Christian sister die, and she triumphed." Some one else will say, "I saw a Christian daughter die, and she triumphed." Come, all ye who have seen the last moments of a Christian, and give testimony in this cause on trial. Uncover your heads, put your hand on the old family Bible, from which they used to read the promises, and promise in the presence of high heaven that you will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. With what you have seen with your own eyes and from what you have heard with your own ears, is there power in this Gospel to give calmness and triumph in the last exigency? The response comes from all sides, from young and old and middle-aged: "We are witnesses!"

You see, my friends, I have not put before you an abstraction or a chimera, or anything like guess-work. I present you affidavits of the best men and women, living and dead. Two witnesses in court will establish a fact. Here are not two witnesses, but millions of witnesses on earth and in heaven testifying that there is power in this religion to convert the soul, to give comfort in trouble, and to afford composure in the last hour.

If ten men should come to you when you are sick with appalling sickness, and say they had the same sickness, and took a certain medicine, and it cured them you would probably take it. Now, suppose ten other men should come up and say, "We don't believe that there is anything in that medicine." "Well," I say, "have you tried it?" "No. I never tried it, but I don't believe there is anything in it." Of course you discredit their testimony. The sceptic may come and say, "There is no power in your religion." "Have you ever tried it?" "No, no." "Then avail!" Let me take the testimony of the millions of souls that have been converted to God, and comforted in trial, and solaced in the last hour. We will take their testimony as they cry, "We are witnesses!"

Professor Henry, of Washington, discovered a new star, and the tidings sped by submarine telegraph, and all the observatories of Europe were watching for that new star. Oh, hearer, looking out through the darkness of thy soul, canst thou see a bright light beaming on thee? "Where?" you say, "where? How can I find it?" Look along by the line of the Cross of the Son of God. Do you not see it trembling with all tenderness and beaming with all hope? It is the Star of Bethlehem.

Deep horror then my vitals froze,
Death-struck I ceased the tide to stem,
When suddenly a star arose—
It was the Star of Bethlehem.

Oh, hearers, get your eye on it. It is easier for you now to become Christians than it is to stay away from Christ and heaven. When Madame Sontag began her musical career she was hissed off the stage at Vienna by the friends of her rival, Amelia Steininger, who had already begun to decline through her dissipation. Years passed on, and one day Madame Sontag, in her glory, was riding through the streets of Berlin, when she saw a little child leading a blind woman, and she said: "Come here, my little child, come here. Who is that you are leading by the hand?" And the little child replied, "That's my mother; that's Amelia Steininger. She used to be a great singer, but she lost her voice, and she cried so much about it that she lost her eyesight." Give my love to her," said Madame Sontag, "and tell her an old acquaintance will call on her this afternoon." The next week in Berlin a vast assemblage gathered at a benefit for that poor blind woman, and it was said that Sontag sang that night as she had never sung before. And she took a skilled oculist, who in vain tried to give eyesight to the poor blind woman. Until the day of Amelia Steininger's death, Madame Sontag took care of her and her daughter after her. That was what the queen of song did for her enemy. But oh, hear a more thrilling story still. Blind, immortal, poor and lost, thou who, when the world and Christ were rivals for thy heart, didst hiss thy Lord away—Christ comes now to give thee sight, to give thee a home, to give thee heaven. With more than a Sontag's generosity, he comes now to meet your need. With more than a Sontag's music, he comes to plead for thy deliverance.

Investigating the Seal Fisheries.

PRESIDENT HARRISON has decided to send two government agents to Alaska, to gather all necessary technical information respecting the actual state of the Behring Sea seal fisheries. It is believed that Prof. Mendenhall, Chief of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Prof. Merriam, ornithologist, Agricultural Department will be assigned to the duty. They will investigate simultaneously with Sir George Selkirk, English Commissioner.

A JAPANESE CONVERT.

The Mission of Tell Sono to the Women and Girls of Japan.

ELLOW is given the portrait of a Japanese lady, whose name is Tell Sono, who has taken up a very worthy and patriotic cause. She came to this country, five years ago, to see America for herself, to study our civilization, and especially the condition of women here, that she might return to Japan, and initiate a movement which would help her countrywomen. Before coming here, she had supported herself as a lawyer in Tokyo. She was not a Christian, when she landed in San Francisco, and her idea of her mission was purely secular. She wanted to elevate the women of Japan, socially and intellectually, and she expected to do it by education and the introduction of American customs. She entered a lady's classical college, from which she graduated with honor. But her ideas were all changed by that time. She was converted while she was in the college, and then she perceived that Christianity was the basis of our civilization. She no longer hoped to benefit her country women by secular education alone, but her chief reliance was on giving them the Gospel. Tell Sono has spent the time since her graduation in Cleveland, Chicago, Brooklyn and other cities, in association with Christian workers, studying the Bible and the methods of Christian labor. Her intention is to return to Japan, next year, and at once to open a Christian school in Tokyo. She believes that foreign missionaries can never reach the high caste women of Japan, who are the leaders of female society in the empire. They will, however, have no prejudice against her, as she is herself high caste, but willingly come to her for instruction, and place their daughters in her school. The enthusiasm and hopefulness of her disposition are contagious, her manner is vivacious, and her command of the English language, is remarkable. Among the claims Tell Sono has on the attention of her Japanese sisters are some that count for a great deal in a land of aristocratic traditions. She belongs to an ancient family, the pedigree of which she can trace back for six hundred years. She is at present a member of the Hanson Place Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn of which Dr. A. B. Kendig is pastor. Dr. Kendig, who has seen much of her, writes that "she is full of faith, zeal and knowledge." Mrs. Kendig is acting as treasurer for the fund that is being raised here to enable Tell Sono, to establish her Christian school on her return. Any of our readers, who may desire to aid her in that enterprise may send a contribution to Mrs. Kendig, by whom it will be thankfully received. They may help Tell Sono, also, by buying a copy of her biography, which she quaintly calls her "life-book," which may be obtained for sixty cents from Hunt & Eaton, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York.

SERVICE ON THE MARCH.

QUIET, persistent fidelity under the most adverse circumstances characterizes many of the converts from heathenism. An illustration of the fact is given by Rev. George Weavind, who formerly labored in the Transvaal. He says: "There was one old chief called Petros Molepo, a man old enough to be my father, and he used to treat me as though I was his own child. He formerly lived at Tabane's station, and there he was a member of the society and a teacher among his people, but for some reason or other he found it necessary to go forth and find a home somewhere else. He was wandering about from place to place with his people for twelve long months without finding a home. But during that long time the old chief gathered his people together week by week for their meetings; Sabbath by Sabbath he halted that they might have the services to which they had been accustomed for many years. Every morning and every evening, no matter where they might be, he gathered the people together and conducted family worship amongst them. By-and-by they found a home upon the property belonging to the Missionary Society, and the very first thing they did when they trekked their wagons on to the land where they were now to find their home was to build a house of prayer that they might there acknowledge God's goodness to them in at last providing them a shelter. After a time, old Petros got very ill indeed, and his illness lingered for months. I went to see him often, and I saw him, just a few days before he died, and I said 'Is it all right?' 'Oh, yes,' he said, 'I am going to be with the Lord,' and thus trusting and confident the old man died."

A SERVICE IN UGANDA.

WHAT God has wrought in Uganda is truly marvellous. It is the land in which Bishop Hannington was murdered less than six years ago, and where every native Christian whom the savage king could find was ruthlessly put to death. Bishop Tucker, who is carrying on the work there now, writes in a letter received: "Exaggeration about the eagerness of the people here to be taught, there has been none. No words can describe the emotion which filled my heart as, on Sunday last, I stood up to speak to fully 1,000 men and women who crowded the church of Baganda. It was a wonderful sight! There, close beside me, was the katikaro—the second man in the kingdom. There, on every hand, were chiefs of various degrees, all Christian men, and all in their demeanor devout and earnest to a degree. There was a second service in the afternoon, at which there must have been fully 800 present. The same earnest attention was apparent, and the same spirit of devotion. I can never be sufficiently thankful to God for the glorious privilege of being permitted to preach to this people."

CHRIST AND NICODEMUS.

S. S. Lesson for July 26, By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 3: 1-17. Golden Text, John 3: 16.

THE testimony of Jesus was always unwelcome to the man of this world, who lived after the flesh. There was nothing in all he said or did to exalt man. The man of that age, as of this, "loved the praise of men more than the praise of God." The larger number of those who took any notice of Jesus were cavillers, critics, and hostile to his person and his teaching. But in every city, and in every age, and God finds means to bring them where they may meet with Jesus. Nicodemus was one of these. Probably, what he had heard of Jesus responded to a secret but intense longing in his heart for real, personal contact with God; he had watched the miracles of Jesus, and had drawn his own conclusion that they were divine. Nicodemus was a person of distinction, a ruler of the Jews. Anxious as he was to come in contact with the new Teacher, he felt something was due to his own position, and so, lest he should be misunderstood, he "came to Jesus by night." And the Master saw all his cowardice, and yet did not repulse him! Where there is a heart seeking after him, Jesus will bear, with his own wondrous patience, the mixed motives, the want of courage and uprightness, which, by and by he will be able to purge away. "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." He was about to say to Nicodemus, "Everyone that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be re-proved. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God." This was the truth, and the truth for Nicodemus, but the hour was not come when Nicodemus could bear it. Oh, how we need the wisdom of God in dealing with souls, how often in saying things which are really the truth and really the message of God to them through us, but spoken in our time, instead of God's time, we have really hindered souls, instead of helping them. God only knows when things are ripe, and when he has prepared a soul to receive a truth, then the seed will bear fruit; we need the most true, and moment-by-moment guidance of the Lord, for dealing with souls.

There are Hungry Souls

Nicodemus came to him with self-assertion, "Rabbi, we know that thou art a Teacher sent from God; for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him."

"We Know;"

this is a bad beginning for a seeking soul. Jesus immediately shows him something which he does not know. "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again (or born from above), he cannot see the kingdom of God." Is this a real fact, and yet men who have read and heard this passage again and again, will give precedence to anything—some mere business matter, some simple family claim, which in time of sickness must needs be disregarded—rather than the settling of this, above-all-else-important matter, am I, or am I not born again of the Spirit of God?

Nicodemus, like most men who have something of a religious life behind them, began by arguing the matter; he knew well that he had not this experience, but then, what if, after all, the whole thing was a delusion? "How can a man be born when he is old?" and thus showing how utterly earthly were all his conceptions. Nicodemus did not see how the body, created to be the useful servant of the spirit, had, through the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, subjected the soul—the affections, intelligence and will to itself, and so flesh, instead of spirit, ruled the soul. He did not see that to be born from above was to be quickened in that very part of his being which died in Adam in the day of his sin, and which only lives again as we are born of the Spirit, and only can live by the life of God, and in communion with him. Jesus answered, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." Flesh cannot produce spiritual life; neither earnestness nor energy, devotion nor zeal, can produce spiritual life; unless it comes by a birth from above, it does not really exist. The first man Adam was made a living, but not life-giving, soul; the last Adam (Jesus Christ) was made a quickening (or life-giving) Spirit. "As the Father hath life in himself so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself." But "the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God."

Nicodemus was out of his depth: the life of the Spirit was utterly unknown to him, he could study, he could reason, he could act, but here was a something indispensable to a man for his salvation, which nevertheless a man could not bring about, but for which he was wholly dependent upon God. And there was a power, a life, a presence about the wondrous man in whose company he was, which made it impossible for him to doubt the reality of the things he taught. Jesus taught him that just as real as the presence of the wind, but just as uncontrollable, just as much out of the power of man, is that birth of the Spirit. "How can these things be?" said the astonished truthseeker. "Art thou the teacher of Israel, and understandest not these things?" was the reply of the great Teacher. "How canst thou teach spiritual things without the Spirit, or the life of God without having that life within thee?" O how many try to make consisting of intellectual doctrine, of emotion, feeling, or will, stand in the stead of the Spirit of God, his birth from above, his working from above, his life which controls, and is not controlled by ours. "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, we speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen." In the things of the Spirit of God all is life, all is reality, this is no theory, no imagination. "If I have told you earthly things and ye believe not, how shall ye believe when I tell you of heavenly things. And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven."

All was new, all was strange to Nicodemus, but he was conquered, his questions ceased; from an inquirer, he became a learner, and thus the Master could go on teaching him. What shall he say, this Son of God, now that he has stilled the flesh in Nicodemus, and won him at last to listen to his Lord? How teach the unspiritual man spiritual truth? It is which explains the mystery, this theme of Moses and Elijah on the mount of transfiguration, this only acknowledged theme of Paul, this theme of the highest in heaven, and of all the redeemed which join them. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Nicodemus had yet to learn that only one thing could be done with the flesh, with man as he is apart from God. There was no remedy but death, "the soul that sinneth it shall die." (Ezek. 18: 4.) But "Christ once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust," and "we thus judge, that one died for all, therefore all died." This was the lesson Nicodemus had to learn when Jesus spoke those never-to-be-forgotten words, "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved." This then is man's part, and man's only part, that he may be born again. He must receive as his, receive for himself, a crucified Redeemer. No room for "we know" here, the teacher and the scholar come in side by side, helpless sinners, to be saved, in the very same way, by the same Saviour. The outwardly moral and the poor profligate come under the shadow of the Cross of Jesus on the same terms. "Neither is there salvation in any other for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we may be saved."

LESSON POINTS

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

THE same came to Jesus by night. And he, who said, "Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out," received Nicodemus kindly, and graciously undertook to teach him the mystery of the new birth and the secret of life eternal. Later on Nicodemus, by his actions, publicly avowed his discipleship, but just then he was a "disciple secretly for fear of the Jews."

Gotthold, wishing to seal a letter called for a lighted candle. The maid obeyed his orders but proceeding too hastily, the flame, which had not yet gathered sufficient strength, went out. "Here," said Gotthold, "we have that which may well remind us of the gentleness and tact to be observed in our deportment toward weak and erring brethren. Had the candle, when first lighted, been carried carefully and shaded by the hand from the air, it would not have been extinguished, but would soon have burned with vigor. In like manner many weak brethren might be set right, if we only came to their help in the right way. It is not by violent strokes that we reduce the dislocated limb. Jesus himself does not quench the smoking flax, but blows upon it with the gentle breath of the blessed words that proceed out of his mouth and this was the reason why disconsolate sinners flocked to and pressed upon him to hear what he said.

Ye must be born again. It may be a mystery to us, but it is nevertheless a fact and although we may not be able to explain the new birth, we and others will know when it has taken place within us. The blind man, who had his sight restored, knew nothing about how it was done, but he did know that "whereas, I was blind, now I see." We may not early in the Spring, know a cherry tree from a chestnut tree, but later on, when the time of fruitage comes, we can readily discover the character of the tree. We may not know just how we are born of the Spirit, but we do know that the fruitage of the flesh is uncleanness, hatred, envy, drunkenness and the like, while the fruitage of the spirit is love, gentleness, goodness, temperance.

And it is impossible to bring forth the fruit of the spirit unless we are born again. "Can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard his spots? then may you also do good, that are accustomed to do evil."

Art thou a master of Israel and knowest not these things? The professing Christian who imagines that the proper pronunciation of some Shibboleth and the correct observance of certain forms alone are indispensable to salvation, will sooner or later find out that he is making the mistake of his life. The form of godliness without its power will not avail us in time of trial. We must know for ourselves and not for another, that these things are so, and the minister of the Gospel, who aims at preaching eloquent sermons and arranging for a methodical and scientific salvation, a conversion of the head rather than of the heart, is wasting his opportunities and God will hold him accountable. No man is fit to preach the Gospel, who has not personally in his own heart experienced religion and who knows for himself that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin. "If the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch."

Recently at the Yorkville Police Court, New York City, a boy was brought before the magistrate, charged with theft. The evidence was strongly against him but his mother pleaded earnestly for his release and as a final clinching argument, she said, to the judge, "Your honor, my boy cannot be guilty of this crime, because, sir, he would rather die than eat meat on Friday."

"But I cross myself ever so many times," you say. That cannot save you. "But I give liberally to the poor." That will not save you. "But I read a chapter every night before I go to bed." That will not save you. "But I sit at the communion table every month." That will not save you. "But my name is on the church books." That will not save you. "But I have been a professor of religion for thirty years." That will not save you. I place on your side of the balance all the edicts, all religious forms, and all communion tables ever built, but I place on the opposite side of the balance: "Having the form of godliness, but denying the power thereof. From such turn away."

THE DOMINIE'S BOY.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text, John 3: 16, "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son," etc.

WE were inclined to laugh a good deal, I remember, about the fuss that was made over the new baby at the Parsonage. I was asked a dozen times by my fellow members if I had seen the dominie's baby. I confessed that I had not. Being a bachelor, I took little interest in babies, and avoided as much as possible being in their society. At that time I voted babies a nuisance. So, though almost everyone in the church had been to the Parsonage, and the ladies especially were loud in their praises of the new prodigy, I postponed tendering my homage. I liked Dr. and Mrs. Wingate exceedingly, and some of my happiest evenings had been spent in their snug little home; but the coming of the baby had spoiled all that. I knew that I was best away.

It was the first baby, and as I learned from my mother and sisters, was sure to be spoiled. The Dominie was almost as ridiculous about it as his wife. I heard that he would sit and watch it by the hour and see new wonders in it all the time. It was so intelligent, so bright and so pretty—in short it was thought at the Parsonage that there had never been quite such a wonderful baby in the world before.

The baby affected everything. The Dominie did not speak of it directly from the pulpit, but we heard a great deal in his sermons at that time about parental love, and the opening intelligence of childhood. Of course, I had to go to the parsonage eventually, and I went. I remember how proudly the doctor called his wife and what a pretty picture the young mother made, entering the room with her infant boy in her arms.

The child was not spoiled, in spite of my sisters' predictions. He grew up a fine intelligent boy. I liked him better when he could run around, and had many a romp with him. He had his father's love of learning, too, and, when he went to school he was ahead of all his class-mates. There were no brothers or sisters, so he had the doctor's undivided attention, and enjoyed such instruction as the doctor above most men was able to give. Nor was his physical training neglected; he could run and jump and swim better than any boy of his age in town. "He will be a credit to you, Doctor," was the best compliment you could pay the dominie in those days; and if you predicted that the boy would be in the Senate or even the Presidential chair, if he lived, it would not be thought that you were talking nonsense. In fact there were many more unlikely things.

In due time the boy was sent to college, and there he acquitted himself grandly. He succeeded, beyond even his proud father's hopes, graduated with double honors, and was publicly spoken of by the president of the university as "a young man who will make his mark." The next question was the choice of a profession, and I think we were all consulted about it. Eventually, the young man's own preference for the law was confirmed, because it was the recognized road to the highest offices in the State and Nation. The Senate or the Presidency, did not seem such impossible things, after all, to one who spent an evening in the young man's society, or heard him lecture in the school-room, as he did several times. So he was received into one of the best law-offices in the State, and Dr. Wingate thought more than ever of his beloved boy.

Two years later, I was in Battery Park, New York, and, keeping myself well hidden by the trees, I witnessed a sight, I shall not soon forget. There stood, Dr. Wingate and his wife, intently watching a steamer outward bound. What was passing in their minds, I could guess, and I took care not to intrude upon them. They waited till the steamer was lost to view, and then turned sorrowfully away toward the depot, whence they would take the cars for their village home. Their faces bore the look of those who had passed a severe ordeal.

On the steamer, they were watching, was their only son, their beloved, almost idolized boy, of whom so great things had been expected. He was going to a heathen land to preach the Gospel of Christ, and to do this he had, with his father's approval, sacrificed his brilliant prospects and the joys of home. How much it cost the parents and the son to carry out this thing, no one ever knew. We caught some glimpses of the ordeal the next Sunday, when the Dominie preached the most powerful sermon I ever heard him deliver. The text was, "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son."

IN ANSWER TO PRAYER.

How John Ross Began to "Kneel Down"—
Led by a Little Child.

THE room was small, and the furniture old-fashioned; but there was a neatness and warmth about it that made it look pleasant and comfortable. On a stool by the fire was a bright little girl; and at the tea-table sat a pale matron, anxiously seeing that her husband had all that he wanted, while he for his part was just finishing his evening meal of haricot.

"Was it nice, father?" asked Ally, as he turned towards her, wiping his mouth with the napkin.

"Ay, just as usual," was the answer. "Hunger's the best sauce, you know, Ally."

The mother smiled. It was scant praise, but she was satisfied.

"You won't be going out again to-night, John, will you?" she inquired, presently.

Her husband hesitated. He was no drunkard, yet the tavern had for him very great attractions. He liked excitement, political discussion, and the gossip which he called conversation. It never occurred to him that it was worth while to converse with his little daughter, and his thoughtful, intelligent wife.

"I must go," he said, "for they will expect me."

"They" were some fellow-workmen and the landlord.

"But you will not be long?"

"I don't know; that depends. But you need not sit up, burning candle for nothing, as you did last night."

"Very well, John. Say 'Good night' to father, Ally, dear."

The child put up her mouth for a kiss.

disturb them; for Ally began to talk about him, saying, "I do hope he will come before I go to sleep. Don't you, mother?"

"Yes, darling; though I cannot expect it," said her mother.

The child waited a little while, and then said, "Is it far?"

Mrs. Ross had been sitting with her eyes fixed on the fire, thinking, perhaps, of her blithe girlhood and earlier married life. She started now, asking, "Is what far?"

"The 'Welcome Home,' where father goes every evening; don't you know?"

Did she know? Ah, too well, too well! It required some effort to answer calmly,

"Half-a-mile."

"And why does he never take us there?" continued Alice.

"It is not a place for little girls, my child."

"What do they do, mother?"

"They talk, Ally, and—and smoke."

"And, I suppose," said Ally, gravely—"I suppose they kneel down, too?"

"What makes you think so?"

"Because, when I stay awake till father comes, I see that he does not kneel down here; and so I think he must have said his prayers at 'The Welcome Home.'"

There was no answer; and in a few minutes Ally's little feet went pattering into an inner room, where, after being snugly tucked up by her mother, she lay awake, listening for the step which was too often so long in coming.

Meanwhile the father, sitting alone beside the hearth, mused over the little sermon which his child had, all unconsciously, been preaching. He would never forget that sermon while he lived.

"I have been strangely blind," he began to say within himself that night; "but now I

PEACE! IT IS I!"

PIERCE was the wild billow;

Dark was the night;

Oars labored heavily;

Foam glimmered white;

Mariners trembled;

Peril was nigh;

Then said the God of Earth,

"Peace! It is I!"

Ridge of the mountain-wave,

Lower thy crest!

Wail of Euroclydon,

Be thou at rest!

Peril can none be,

Sorrow must fly,

When saith the Light of light,

"Peace! It is I!"

Jesus, Deliverer!

Come thou to me;

Soothe thou my voyaging

Over life's sea!

Thou, when the storm of death

Roars, sweeping by,

Whisper, O Truth of truth!

"Peace! It is I!" —ST. ANATOLIUS.

SPIRITUAL INSIGHT.

Christ's Insight into Man.*

AFTER the miracle at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, Jesus and his family and his school moved in a body to Capernaum. The reasons for this movement are not given. Nor was the stay long. The Passover soon called them to Jerusalem, where Jesus drove the merchants out of the Temple. His acts and words increased the number of those who believed on his name with that kind of belief which is the mere result of wonder at sudden exhibitions of power. But they had not so worked his principles into their character as to be willing to either live or die for him. In the close of the second chapter of St. John's Gospel, it is recorded that Jesus did not believe in them, did not treat them as perfectly trusted disciples, because He knew all things. "He knew what was in man."

When we see a man, ordinarily, we simply receive on the retina of our eyes, the figure produced; sometimes we see more deeply and penetrate somewhat into his character; but when Jesus looked on a human being, he saw that which was "in him," that spirit which is the man himself. To Him the man's spirit was stark naked and visible.

Immediately after this statement of Christ's insight, and as an illustrative case thereof, the record is given of one man, a semi-believer, whose interview with Jesus was of a most important character. His name is given. It was a Greek name, but common in Palestine in the days of Jesus. It was Nicodemus. It is observable that sometimes names are given in the Gospel history, and sometimes omitted. We have Mary of Magdala, sweet saint, and we have a certain nameless woman, who touched the hem of his garment and was made whole. Perhaps, some one will find the clue to this discrimination. There must be some reason; there is nothing accidental in the Bible.

The Feast of Tabernacles.

From all parts of the land, and even from many foreign parts, the devout poured into the Holy City. No good Jew allowed himself to sleep in a house. Boughs full of green leaves were brought from the country, and temporary booths constructed on house-tops and along thoroughfares, and in all the environs of the city, until Jerusalem was covered with a temporary forest. Gladness reigned, and public and private rejoicing prevailed. The Temple service partook of the festal air of the occasion. Immediately after the regular morning sacrifices, every day, a priest went with a golden vessel to the fountain of Siloam, on the side of the hill on which the Temple stood, and drew water, which he brought through the Water-Gate, accompanied by a gay procession and the sound of trumpets; and having mixed it with wine, poured it on the sacrifice upon the altar, amid the hallelujah shouts of the people. This probably reminded them of the supplies of water Jehovah had given to their fathers in the emergencies of the wilderness. The joyfulness of this ceremonial was so great that it passed into a common proverb: "He that never saw the rejoicing of drawing water, never saw rejoicing in all his life."

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF WOMAN.

LET us consider for a moment the splendid opportunities and the tremendous responsibilities which rest upon the woman in what is known as society. If woman was the first to sin in this world, it was also on the breast of woman that the world's Redeemer was nourished. Bethlehem has atoned for Eden! As if Christ desired to test the gratitude of woman, he has given her, in Christian civilization, a kingdom that is all her own. The statesman, the soldier, the priest, the lawyer, the merchant, when he mingles in the social world where women reigns, becomes her subject. In that world woman is supreme. She makes the laws; she, practically, makes standards of right and wrong, and sets the pitch of thought and feeling. If she is frivolous, society is frivolous; if she is false, society is false; if she is high-minded and gentle and true-hearted, if she is holy and devout and Christian, she can make society all these. More than statesman, or prophet, or king, she has it in her power to elevate or degrade, to lead men to God or to turn them away from him. In order to exercise her power, she need not preach, or reason, or exhort; she has only to be what she will, and what she is she will unconsciously make society.

Ah, sometimes I marvel that women do not better understand their power and use it to better purpose. Now and again they do accomplish marvelous things, by words in season, fitly spoken, or by well-planned schemes of usefulness. But after all, the best and noblest power of woman lies, not in what she does, but in what she is. We often hear the complaint, and it is true, that the men of this generation are hard and grasping, and they seem to care for little else than material gain and external show; but how much of this is due to the sordid tone of the fashionable world and the ostentatious exactions of society?

The Bliss of Heaven.

If Paradise were merely rest for the weary, and joy for the afflicted, and peace for the storm-tossed, and honor and glory for the humble and neglected, it would lack one element without which it is impossible to imagine conscious and eternal felicity. Mere peace and rest and joy, and honor and glory, I care not in what degree, would not suffice to make a soul blessed here, much less could they suffice to make a soul blessed forever hereafter. In this world, and in all worlds, true blessedness does not depend on ease, or rest, or any idle rapture of delight; it is the self-spendingly rapture of love—the bliss of doing good. True spiritual blessedness, here or in Paradise, must have its source in self-forgetting love and self-denying service.

JOHN ROSS HEARS HIS CHILD'S PRAYER.

"Good night, father," the child whispered, as he stooped to receive her caress: "come home as quick as you can."

He was gone. Mrs. Ross washed up the plates and dishes, and put them, with Ally's help, into the cupboard. Then she sat down to mend her husband's waistcoat. They were dull that night, and with reason; yet the child laid her head on her mother's knee with a sense of rest and calm that seldom came to her in her father's presence. Soon she began to sing the hymns which she learnt at school. Then, kneeling to pray beside her mother's chair, she began to say, "God bless dear father—"

Hush! Was that some one at the window, or was it only a puff of wind that rattled the one half-frame against the other? Ally looked up, and listened.

"It is nothing," said her mother, and the child went on: "Bless dear father to-night, and bring him home safe, and help me to be a good child to him and mother, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen."

As these words rose to heaven, the door was opened by John Ross himself. Unseen by his wife and child, he waited in the shadow to hear the rest. It was not much, if measured by the number of its words—simply a similar prayer for other relations, and that all-comprehensive prayer which Christ taught His disciples—but there was a beauty in the scene, a touching pathos in the voice, and, above all, a reality in the petition, which compelled John Ross to bow his head and worship. Nor, even when the last Amen was uttered, could he persuade himself to come forward and think I see. The child's words have opened my eyes. Thank God for that!"

It might be absurd, but it was very natural, he thought, that at this moment he should remember a time—long ago, it seemed—when, having a hurt foot, he had spent a whole evening at home; and when Ally, standing on a high stool at his elbow, had brushed his hair till he fell asleep, and he woke to find her laughing on his knee. How firmly, as he then thought, he had determined to spend at least four nights a week at his own ever-bright fireside, and how miserably he had failed to keep his resolve! Truly, John Ross had small reason to trust himself!

In whom, then, could he trust? Of whom seek power to act rightly towards self, wife, and child? Must he not, if he would be firm and strong, look upward? In other words, must he not, from that hour, begin to "kneel down?"

Nearly a year has gone by, and still John Ross spends his evenings at home. The paleness has left his wife's face, and little Ally is making wonderful progress in arithmetic. If you could look in upon them to-night, you would see them all busy making a child's scrap-book, and you would hear a sound of ringing laughter, and a manly voice making funny speeches, and you would see the mother's pretended chiding as the mirth delays 'the work,' and you would know at once that they were happy.

Happy they are; for the peace of God, which passes all understanding, dwells with them in their home, and being united to each other and to God, they fear no evil.

THE WORST FOE.

THE mightiest obstacle to the progress of religion in this day is, not infidelity in any form, nor organized crime, but strong drink, whether you call it Swan gin, or Bourbon whiskey, or brown stout, or pale ale, or Schiedam schnapps, or wine, or anything else that flutters the pulse and poisons the brain, and makes a man unnatural. Standing in our pulpits on the Sabbath day, we are aware of the fact that there are men who are hiding behind a barricade of wine flasks and demijohns. There are thousands of men who do not come into the kingdom of God simply because they tittle. While they are discussing the question as to whether they shall drink at all, or how much they shall drink, they let the question of their eternal salvation go by default. And how often it is you find a man anxious about his soul, and you talk with him, and pray with him, and wonder why he does not yield his heart to God, and come into the peace of the Gospel; but after many weeks have passed, and he has gone back again into the world, you find that he is a victim of strong drink, and, although he may not realize it, his love for the titillation of his palate has been the means of his spiritual and eternal overthrow. How much better it would be for all such men, instead of stopping to discuss the question as to how much they shall drink, or whether they shall drink at all, to throw the wine flask out of the window, and fill their demijohns with kerosene oil and turpentine!

Secular temperance societies have a grand work to do, and they are accomplishing it. All the sympathies of my heart are with them. God bless the men and the women who are in these secular ways battling against the intemperance of the land. They are working through the temperance pledge by giving healthful employment to the fallen, by stirring and rousing temperance lectures, and in a thousand ways. But my great hope for the salvation of the land from strong drink, and for the redemption of the nations from this evil habit, is in the converting power of Christ's Gospel. I have presented the temperance pledge to a great many persons. How many of those who signed the temperance pledge without consecrating themselves to God have kept that pledge? Not one! But of all those to whom I have given the temperance pledge who at the time of signing it became Christians, how many of all that number have kept the pledge? All; absolutely all. Am I not then, speaking out of my own observation, right in saying that there is nothing but the converting grace of an omnipotent God that can cure men of the habit of strong drink? Now let us march in solid column on this subject. Let us, from the pulpit and from the pew, preach righteousness, temperance, and a judgment to come, and the one doctrine as emphatically as we do the other.

In order to this, be teetotallers. I have tried other theories and other modes. When I first entered the ministry I drank wine at weddings, and there were exceptional occasions when I took it, and I felt it was allowable, and I was committing no sin against either my conscience or my God; but I felt always trammelled when I came to talk about intemperance, and I said to myself one day: "There must be something wrong in doing anything which trammels my tongue on this subject," and from that time I have declined even wine at the wedding. The only ground for Christian men to take is the teetotal ground. Take it on account of your influence; your children will do as you do, only a little more so. You take wine, for instance, only on New Year's Day, and your sons will take it on New Year's and Christmas and Thanksgiving Day and the Fourth of July; and sometimes when they feel hot and sometimes when they feel cold, and sometimes when they feel tired. You take a quarter of a glass, they will take three-quarters of a glass. You take ale, they will take brandy. You drink, and your sons will drink. It is an awful responsibility for a parent to assume, that of taking his whole family on the wrong road. They think you are right. They have more admiration for you than they have for any other man. They try to walk like you. They try to wear their hat like you. They would like to dress like you. In every respect you are their model. Now, look out in this matter of strong drink you do not become an evil example and a ruinous and blasting influence.

You also have an influence in the community. Time was when a Christian man might consistently have wine on his sideboard and on his table every day at noon, and as good men as ever lived practiced that all their lives, and have gone into glory sitting down to drink new wine in our Father's kingdom, a wine that never intoxicates; but that day is passed. God winked at those times of ignorance. In this day, the line is so thoroughly and sharply drawn that there are but two sides, the men who are for rum, and the men who are against rum, and you cannot afford to sit on the fence, and you will not sit there a great while, for either this side or that side will pull you over. You will not do much in the way of bringing souls unto Jesus Christ unless you are right on this subject in this day of glorious enlightenment.

AN OPEN DOOR.

WE do well not to allow foreign nations to make this country a convict colony. We would have a wall built as high as heaven and as deep as hell against foreign thieves, pickpockets and anarchists. We would not let them wipe their feet on the mat of the outside door of Castle Garden. If England or Russia or Germany or France send here their desperadoes to get clear of them, we would have these desperadoes sent back in chains to the places where they came from. We will not have America become the dumping-place for foreign vagabondism. But you build up a wall at the Narrows before New York harbor, or at the Golden Gate before San Francisco, and forbid the coming of the industrious and hard-working and honest populations of other lands who want to breathe the air of our free institutions and get better opportunity for better livelihood, and it is only a question of time when God will tumble that wall flat on our own heads with the red-hot thunderbolts of his omnipotent indignation.

No more than a tenth part of this continent is fully cultivated. If a man with a hundred acres of farm land should put all his cultivation on one acre he would be cultivating a larger ratio of his farm than our nation is now occupying of the national farm. Pour the whole human race, Europe, Asia, Africa and all the islands of the sea, into America, and there would be room to spare. All the Rocky Mountain barrennesses and all the other American deserts are to be fertilized, and as Salt Lake City and much of Utah once yielded not a blade of grass, now by artificial irrigation have become gardens, so a large part of this continent that is now too poor to grow even a mullein stalk or a Canadian thistle will, through artificial irrigation, like an Illinois prairie wave with wheat or like a Wisconsin farm rustle with corn tassels. Besides that, after perhaps a century or two more, when this continent is quite well occupied, the tides of immigration will turn the other way. Politics and governmental affairs being corrected on the other side of the waters, Ireland under different regulation turned into a garden, will invite back another generation of Irishmen, and the wide wastes of Russia brought from under despotism will with her own green fields invite back another generation of Russians. And there will be hundreds of thousands of Americans every year settling on the other continents. And after a number of centuries, all the earth full and crowded, what then? Well, at that time some night a panther meteor, wandering through the heavens will put its paw on our world and stop it, and putting its panther tooth into the neck of its mountain range will shake it lifeless as the rat terrier a rat. So I have no more fear of America being overcrowded than that the porpoises in the Atlantic Ocean will become so numerous as to stop shipping.

A BOLD DASH.

WE want a more rapid and spirited move in religious matters. Our great ammunition wagons are so clumsy and our big guns so unwieldy that the enemy often has us at a disadvantage. I think a squad of flying artillery perhaps might go forth and surround the foe. We want more men in the religious world with the bold dash that Kilpatrick and Stonewall Jackson had in the military. We glorify the policy of "fighting it out on one line if it takes all summer," but forget what a little Christian stratagem did when Gideon's three hundred men flung the pitchers and hoisted the lamps! There is such a thing as too much deliberation in religion. The game gets away from us while we are loading the gun. I would not give one of the backwoods Methodist meetings, where I used, in boyhood, occasionally to go and stand at the door, afraid to go in—for they had fifty persons converted there in one night—for a hundred precise churches where they preserve their religion from spoiling by keeping it on ice.

TEMPTATION OF APPLAUSE.

THE approval of the world is destructive. It is right that we should want to be thought well of. God says a good name is better than precious ointment. It is an immense power for good. Always be on the right side, ready to speak or to act for the cause of God, and one's country gives one a reputation that is fit to be the ambition of any man. But he who lives for the approval and applause of the world is already under a destructive process. There are thousands who have gone down under it. Across holocausts of the dead, men have fought their way just to add one star more to their shoulder straps. Beauty, genius, everything that men and women have, have been sacrificed for this; and it has generally been the case that in proportion as they went up in fame they went down in character. Some of them took to their cups. Some floundered in political dishonesties. Some stood in the high places of the earth, or sat in presidential chairs, displaying a stubbornness and spite, the laughing-stock of all nations. Byron wrote that he felt more pain from the criticism of the most ignorant man than he felt joy from the praises of all intelligent men. The very same admirers that applauded Sheridan's wit, wrangled over Sheridan's coffin. Dryden was kept from being buried several days after he ought to have been buried, because the roughs hooted and howled and quarrelled about his dead body. Burns, after being spoiled of popular caresses, is flung into an inebriate's grave. And the devil now takes a man up to the top of the temple, and shows him the kingdoms of the world and the glories of them, and then pushes him off the pinnacle. The world slew, by its flatteries, Charles Mathews and De Quincy and Campbell and Aaron Burr and Pierpont Edwards; and it has paved Westminster Abbey and the Congressional burying ground with the hollow skulls in which genius and art and eloquence once lived.

BRIEF NOTES.

Owing to a fire in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD press-rooms, doing serious damage and considerably delaying the present edition, we are compelled to ask the indulgence of our readers. A very large part of the edition which had been printed was spoiled, the presses were disabled and our stock of paper for several issues ahead was greatly damaged by water. These facts, and the hurry incident to the use of other facilities temporarily, account for the paper this week not being up to its usual standard. Arrangements have been made, however, which ensure the full restoration of our facilities for subsequent issues.

Princeton has already registered two hundred and seventy freshmen for next year.

The music and hymns printed in this and the two preceding issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be obtained in sheet form of Mr. George Tabor Thompson, of 318 West 44th Street, New York. They are of a size convenient for pasting in hymn books. The price is two cents each or a hundred copies for $1.50.

Christian men and women throughout the world have been deeply concerned by the reports which the cable brought last week of the critical illness of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon. On Sunday July 5, prayer-meetings were held in his Tabernacle in London, without intermission all day for his recovery. Many pastors on this side the Atlantic also offered public prayer for him.

Rev. John M. Allis, D. D., whose portrait and an account of his successful missionary work in Chili, appeared in this journal on March 4, is about to pay a visit to New York. He will be glad to give descriptive lectures on affairs connected with missionary life in Chili and South America during his stay. Churches desirous of availing themselves of his services may address him at 53 Fifth Ave., New York.

The new Auditorium at Asbury Park, N. J., has just been opened, in charge of Rev. S. Edward Young, pastor of Westminster Presbyterian Church, Asbury Park. The seating capacity is four thousand and the building, situated at the ocean's edge, is entirely enclosed with glass. A special feature is the 4 P. M., "National" service, addressed by Christian laymen and ministers of national reputation. Dr. Talmage preached the first sermon at this service last year.

The revival at the Allen Street Memorial Church, New York, conducted by Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD evangelist, has been successful beyond all expectation. That so large congregations should have been gathered in the heat of the summer is a surprise to all. Nor are the results less gratifying. One night last week (July 8th) there were no less than seventeen persons enquiring the way to Christ. Over one hundred persons have gone forward as seekers during the two weeks of the services. Among them was a man sixty-seven years old, a German of considerable education. Mr. Cannon's method was to hold an open-air meeting on the steps of the Church, singing stirring hymns, making a short address and then inviting the people inside.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Our New Weather Chief—A Fatal Cyclone—Immigration—The Disabled "Servia"—A Royal Wedding—Death of a Statesman.

THE mammoth Cunarder, Servia, when at sea about 150 miles east of Sandy Hook light-ship, broke the crank-pin of her high-pressure cylinder and was disabled. The great steamer was drifting for some time in dangerous proximity to the shore, when she was sighted by the oil-tank steamer, Chester, which took her in tow. The German-Lloyd steamer, Eider, signaled her, and offered to render assistance or take off the passengers, of whom there were over a thousand, but the big steamer declined, signaling back that she was in no danger. When the news reached New York, there was great excitement, which was not allayed until the Servia reached the Cunard dock. Two weeks will be required to repair her shaft. The salvage which the Cunard Company will have to pay to the Chester for towing the Servia is variously estimated at from $150,000 to $250,000. The captain of the Chester will receive $30,000 as his share. The Servia was outward bound when the accident occurred.

A Fatal Cyclone.

THE week has been one of storm in the West and South, the severest visitation having been at Baton Rouge, La. On July 7th, a cyclone struck the city, unroofing fifty houses and injuring many persons. At the State Prison in the suburbs the cyclone demolished the second and third stories of the north wing killing ten convicts and injuring thirty-six others. Shade trees were uprooted, stores gutted or demolished, tall chimneys overthrown and many stanch buildings in the path of the cyclone—whose track was three hundred yards wide—suffered more or less damage. So sudden was the visitation that many bread-carts, express-wagons and other vehicles in the streets, were wrecked before the drivers could seek shelter. The loss by the storm in nine parishes will exceed $400,000. Many persons are known to have perished.

Our New Weather Chief.

AMERICANS everywhere will naturally be interested in the personality of the new chief of the Weather Bureau, Prof. Mark W. Harrington, who has succeeded Gen. Greely. Prof. Harrington, whose portrait is here given, is principal of the State University at Ann Arbor, Mich., and is also editor of the American Meteorological Union. He is forty-three years old and is regarded as a high authority on all climatic problems, having particularly made a study of weather changes in relation to agriculture. In 1871, he acted as astronomical aid of the U. S. Coast Survey in Alaska. While abroad in 1876, he was offered the position of professor of astronomy and mathematics at Peking, China, and while in that country he introduced the first large telescope ever seen there.

Chili's Long Rebellion.

LATE advices from Santiago intimate that President Balmaceda is gaining ground in his conflict with the Congress Party. The insurgents are represented as being short of guns and ammunition, while Balmaceda suffers only from a lack of naval force. The war vessels, which till now have been controlled by the rebels, are in bad condition and the men are dissatisfied. A similar state of affairs prevails in the army, which is now reduced to less than 4,000 men who have not been paid in many weeks. Most of the residents of Iquique, Pisagua, and Antofagasta have emigrated to Southern Chili or Peru, and business everywhere remains paralyzed, even the Courts being idle. Balmaceda's government supplies itself with funds by a system of wholesale taxation and promiscuous fining.

A Royal Wedding.

A WEDDING of unusual splendor took place in London on July 6th, when Princess Louise, the second daughter of Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein and grand-daughter of Queen Victoria, was married to Prince Aribert of Anhalt, in St. George's Chapel, Windsor. Royalty was well represented at the wedding, the Queen of England, the Emperor and Empress of Germany, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and a host of minor princes being present. There was all the bewildering display usually attendant on royal nuptials: the state carriages, the dazzling military escort with their arms, cuirasses and helmets flashing in the sun, the scarlet-coated outriders and the long line of carriages, each with its armorial crest. Prince Christian, the father of the bride, conducted his daughter and her attendants to the Chapel Royal, where heralds trumpeted forth their arrival. The blue-velvet-covered dais on which the principals stood during the ceremony, was surrounded by the imperial party, the outer circle being composed of Knights of the Garter, and other distinguished guests. No finer display of jewels has been seen at any wedding in a generation. The bride's dress was of cream-white satin, trimmed with orange blossoms. She wore her mother's wedding veil. The Archbishop of Canterbury officiated at the service, after which the Queen kissed her beautiful granddaughter, the Emperor insisted on the same privilege, and then all the princesses kissed the bride in turn. After the wedding, the Eton school-boys pelted the happy pair with rice according to old English custom, the Princess skillfully using her parasol to ward off the shower.

An Immigration Wave.

THE tide of immigration from the Old World continues without abatement. During the past year, according to the report of the Superintendent of Immigration at New York, 405,664 immigrants arrived at that port, being fully 70,000 in excess of 1889. Germany sent us 75,000, Italy 70,000, Ireland 35,000, and Russia 33,000. 170,000 settled in New York State, the greater number of whom went no farther than the metropolis. Of the remainder, the majority went to Pennsylvania, Illinois and Michigan. The prospect is that 1891 will be the greatest immigration year on record. It is estimated that within the next ten years 300,000 Russian Jews will come to America.

Emperor William's Visit.

ALL England is "doing itself proud" over the visit of the German Emperor, William and suite are domiciled, at Windsor. On his arrival on British soil, there was a grand naval display, the pick of the fleet taking part. This was followed by an imposing military pageant on land. The week has been a succession of royal festivities, military reviews, dinners and luncheons. An event was the silver wedding of Prince and Princess Christian, of Schleswig-Holstein, which was celebrated at Cumberland Lodge near Windsor, on the 8th inst., when Queen Victoria, the Emperor and Empress and all the English and German princes were present. On the 10th inst., the Emperor visited Buckingham Palace on his way to Guildhall. Business was suspended along the route of the procession, the windows, roofs and sidewalks were covered with sight-seers, and flags and bunting were everywhere visible. The pageant was the greatest show in a military and civic sense that England has seen in twenty years. At the Guildhall, the freedom, of London, was presented to the Emperor in a gold casket.

The New Patent Commissioner.

PRESIDENT HARRISON has appointed ex-Congressman William M. Simonds of Connecticut as Commissioner of Patents, in the place of ex-Congressman Mitchell. The new Commissioner is a member of a business firm in Connecticut of which State he is a native. He represented the first District of that State in the fifty-first Congress, and ran again last fall but was defeated by Louis Sperry. While a member of the House, Mr. Simonds took a conspicuous part in the struggle for the passage of the international Copyright Law. He is a man of wide public experience, generous education and a fine lawyer—qualities that will be of the highest service in the new and important office to which he has been called.

Mrs. Sheldon's African Journey.

SINCE her return to civilization, Mrs. French-Sheldon, the courageous American who undertook a trip to Central Africa from Zanzibar, has given a most interesting story of her experiences. After almost incredible hardships, and attended only by her black guides, she reached the snow-capped mountain, Kilimanjaro, and traversed the country of the fierce Masai. In some degree she made a record as an explorer, having traced the lake back of Kilimanjaro to its headwaters, and also circumnavigated Lake Chala in a small boat which her attendants carried throughout the journey. After her experience among the Masai, her strength and courage gave way together, and to avoid complete prostration she came back to the coast.

Protecting the Missionaries.

ONE important result in the visit of Chief Nanpie of Ponape (in the Caroline Island group) to this country will probably be the stationing of an American warship at Ponape, to guard the interests of our missionaries there. Last fall Rear-Admiral Belknap dispatched the Alliance to Ponape, and took off the missionaries to safer quarters, while the conflict was raging between the Spanish garrison and the natives. Spain's active interest in the Carolines only dates from the time when Germany began to look out for coaling stations in the Pacific. Under the irksome rule of the Spaniards the natives have shown signs of renewed revolt and Nanpie is now at Washington to urge our government to interpose in the island's behalf. The Spaniards have repeatedly devastated the settlements and burned the buildings of the peaceful natives, besides subjecting the missionaries to almost ruthless treatment.

A Noted Statesman Dead.

ONE of the prominent figures in politics that appeal to the older generation, has just passed away in the person of Hannibal Hamlin, who was born in Paris, Maine, in 1809. He had little educational advantages and worked on a farm till his 18th year, when he began to study law. His studies, however, were interrupted and only resumed five years later, after he had again taken to farming and had spent at least a year in the composing room of the Jeffersonian newspaper. In 1833, he removed to Hamden, Maine, where he passed the rest of his life, first as a practicing lawyer and later as an active politician, devoting all his energies to the welfare of his native state. He was successively a member of the Maine Legislature, the Lower House of Congress and the U. S. Senate. In 1854, he changed his politics and became Republican. In 1857, he was elected Governor of Maine and in 1860, he was chosen as Vice-President on the ticket with Lincoln, and served till '65. In '69, he returned to the Senate. Mr. Hamlin was a man of unflinching integrity and great energy, shrewd and with capacities for leadership that made him a power in his party. One of his peculiarities was that he never wore an overcoat, his broad-cloth suit affording him sufficient protection even in the severest weather.

THE DIVINE TONIC.

"Out of weakness were made strong." Hebrews 11: 34.

THOSE who out of weakness were made strong are written among the heroes of faith, and are by no means the least of them. As believers in the Lord Jesus, we are called to two things, namely, to do and to suffer for his name's sake. Certain saints are summoned to active marching duty, and others are ordered to keep watch on the walls. There are warriors on the field of conflict, and sentries in the box of patience.

Both in doing and in suffering, if we are earnest and observant, we soon discover

Our Own Weakness.

"Weakness" is all we possess. "Weakness" meets us everywhere. If we have to work for the Lord, we are soon compelled to cry, "Who is sufficient for these things?" and if we are called to suffer for him, our weakness, in the case of most of us, is even greater: many who can labor without weariness cannot suffer without impatience. Men are seldom equally skilled in the use of the two hands of doing and bearing. Patience is a grace which is rarer and harder to come at than activity and zeal. It is one of the choicest fruits of the Spirit, and is seldom found on newly-planted trees. The fact soon comes home to us that we are weak where we most of all desire to be strong.

Our longing is to be able both to do and to suffer for our Lord, and to do this we must have strength from above, and that strength can only come to us through faith. I have read you this glorious eleventh of Hebrews, which describes the mighty men of faith, the men of renown. They accomplished all their feats by a power which was not in them by nature. They were not naturally strong either to do or to suffer. They achieved everything that was necessary in the form of service, and they bore up gloriously under the most fearful pressure of suffering, simply and only by faith in God, who became their Helper. You and I may be very weak at this time, but we can be made strong out of just such weakness. Upon this simple but most practical matter I am going to speak to you at this time. We all wish to be strong. Medicines, embrocations, foods, baths, and all sorts of inventions are advertised as means of increasing strength. We are all in heavenly things so weak, that the idea of being made strong should be very attractive to us. Let us learn, then, how others "out of weakness were made strong," and let us follow on to enjoy their privilege by copying their conduct.

I. To begin with:

Faith Makes Men Strong

for holy doing. Faith alone takes hold of the divine strength; and only by that strength can we obey. Hence faith is the essential point of holiness. Ah, my dear friend! if you start on the voyage of life, by divine grace, with the resolve that you will follow the track marked down on the chart by the Lord your God, you will find that you have chosen a course to which the Lord's hand alone can keep you true. The current does not run that way. Before long you will find that the wind is dead against you, and the course to be followed is hard to keep. What will you do then if you have not faith? When duty is contrary to your temperament, what will you do without faith? When it involves loss of money, or ease, or honor, what will you do then if you have no faith? If you believe that God is the Rewarder of them that diligently seek him, ye will persevere: but not else. Suppose the right course should expose you to ridicule, cause you to be spoken of as a fanatic, or mocked at as a hypocrite, or despised as a fool, what can you do without faith? If you trust the living God you will do the right, and bear the loss or the shame; but if your faith fail you, self-love will create such respect for your own good name, such fear of ridicule, such unwillingness to be singular, that you will slide from your integrity and choose a smooth and pleasing road.

Taking another view, we would remark that faith makes us strong to fulfil the relationships of life. We are not alone by ourselves, and we can neither live nor die apart, for God has

Linked us with Others.

We shall either curse or bless those around us. If we have faith in God, we shall bless our children, as Isaac and Jacob blessed their sons. Dear father, have you children who are unruly, irreligious, defiant? Do the young men refuse to be advised? Are your girls light and trifling? Go to God in prayer and faith. He that knows the care of a household knows how easily a parent can do serious mischief with his children by his very efforts to do them good. One parent is too indulgent, another is too severe. Take the children to God, take them to God, I pray you. It is here that your strength lies.

Do I speak to a youth here who fears God, and who lives in an ungodly family? Do you feel bewildered as to how to behave yourself? Orders are given you which cause you great searchings of heart. You have to question in your inmost soul whether you can conscientiously do as your employer requires. I beseech you, have faith in God that he will direct you, and have faith also to follow that direction when you receive it. It is when the young man first leaves the home of piety, and finds himself where the fear of God is not in the place. If, as a decided believer, he takes his stand, and if he is firm and steadfast for his God, he will make a man, and his after years will be bright and useful; but if he begins to give way a little, and if he tries to trim his sail to the wind, he will never attain a holy character. Father, mother, husband, wife, sister, brother, servant, master—whatever your relation, I beseech you, if you feel weak in the discharge of your duty, exercise faith in God and out of weakness you shall be made strong.

There is a high and blessed duty and privilege—I will call it both—which is to every Christian the necessity of his life, and that is to pray. Can you pray, my brother? If you know how to pray, you can move heaven and earth. Can you pray, my brother? Then you can set almighty forces in operation. You can suffer no need, for everlasting supplies await the hand of prayer: "Ask, and it shall be given you." You cannot miss your way, for

You Shall be Guided

in answer to prayer. You shall hear a voice behind you, saying, "This is the way, walk ye in it." He who knows how to pray has his hand on a leverage which moves the universe. But there is no praying without believing. If thou believest not, thou mayest be heard—it is more than I can promise thee; but if thou believest, thou shalt be heard, for God refuses no believing prayer.

It may be that certain of my hearers feel that they cannot attain to the matters I have mentioned, for they are as yet battling to reach the position of servants and pleaders. Faith is the great force which is needed by those whose principal work is to overcome sin. When God began with many of us, he found us very low down beneath the flood of evil. It may be that broke over us in waves. We have to rise superior to it. Possibly he found us plunged in the great deeps of an evil habit. Was it drunkenness? Was it gambling? What was it? It had to be left beneath; we were called to rise out of it. Some are permitted to sink a long way down in sin; and when God begins with them, they have a desperate ascent even to reach common morality; what must the conflict be before they attain to spirituality and holiness? I have seen many a soul wearying to ascend; receiving a little light, and a little more light, and a little more light; but yet far from being clear of the dark waters of iniquity. Dear struggler, you will never overcome sin except by faith in Jesus Christ. Trust him! Trust in the precious blood; that is the great sin-killer. Trust his pierced hands to pierce the hands of your lusts. Trust his wounded side to smite through the heart of your evil desires. Your hope lies there: where Jesus died, where Jesus rose again, where Jesus has gone into the glory. You may resolve to overcome a sin, and, perhaps, any one sin you may conquer for a time; but sin itself, as a force, in all its armies, is never to be overcome, save through the blood of the Lamb. You will never be able to cut down the huge upas tree except with the axe of Christ's atoning sacrifice. Take that, and every blow will tell, but no other instrument will avail.

An Awful Temper

I have often met with persons awakened by divine grace to see the evil of a certain act, and they have said, "I do not know how I shall ever break off the habit;" yet they have

Very Easily Escaped from It.

I remember one who was very foul-mouthed, and used oaths habitually. I hardly think that, for years, he had spoken without ill language; and yet, from the moment he turned unto the Lord, he never used an oath, and he also noted that he never had a temptation so to do. I remark that the particular form of sin known as blasphemy is one of the first to die, and to be buried out of sight. Other sins die hard, but this is shot through the head by true repentance and faith in Jesus. Some sins cling to a man like the fabled tunic of Hercules, which could not be torn away, but burned into his flesh and bone, whatever he might do. How long a well-beloved habit lingers at the door after the heart has given it a bill of divorce! How weak we are in this matter! How slow to cut off right hands, and pluck out right eyes! But yet it must be done; and only faith can do it, by calling in the aid of the Almighty One.

I change the run of my discourse altogether by remarking that there is another thing that falls to the lot of Christian men, a matter of the very first importance: namely,

To Spread the Gospel.

"Yes," says one, "I own that it is an urgent service to make known to others what the Lord has done for me: but, somehow, I cannot discharge my conscience by fully doing as I would. I tried the other day to say a good word, and I am afraid that I made a failure of it." Do you not think that we are too apt to attempt to spread the Gospel in our own strength; and need we wonder if we break down? If we were by faith to begin, humbly waiting upon the Lord for words, and taking hold upon divine strength, might we not accomplish far more than we now do? "But," says one, "I know if I were to speak to any of my neighbors, I should break down." Friend, I am not careful in that matter, nor need you be. If you are in real earnest, you might possibly do more by a break-down than by anything else. Only break the ice, and begin; and you shall find my text to be true in your case also, and out of weakness you, too, shall be made strong.

I would make one more application of my text, which is capable of being used in a thousand directions. "Out of weakness were made strong": this will be experienced in

of God. Suppose that you are called to testify for truth in the midst of those who doubt, disbelieve, or even deride it. You look to those who agree with you, and they are lukewarm; you turn to old associates, and they do not share your concern. Friends tell you that you are making much ado about nothing, or that you are uncharitable, narrow-minded, and bigoted. I need not repeat the accusations; they have been so often hurled at myself that I know them by heart. They say, "The man was born too late; he is behind the age; he fights for a worn-out creed; he is out of place in a world of progress." What then? Is there anything galling to you in all this? Indeed there is, unless faith is strong; and then the bullets turn to pellets, and the stones are soft as sponges. When they talk to you like that, do not begin bristling up, and declaring that, after all, you are as wise and as strong as your opponents, though that may readily be the case; but accept all their remarks upon your folly and weakness, and say to yourself, "Out of weakness were made strong." Hold you to God's Word by faith, and you will be strong. God will vindicate his own cause; but it may be his way to let error prevail for a while. Bide your time when the cause is an eternal one, for you can afford to do so.

II. Now, beloved friends, suffer me a few words upon the other cheering fact, namely, that faith makes men

Strong for Patient Suffering.

Many are called to suffer much in daily life. Ah me! what a world of misery there is in this great city, among even good and gracious people! A man might study London till he turned his brain. The poverty and the suffering of even godly people in London would be a subject too harrowing for those of you who have specially tender hearts. Few, if any, are without sorrow, and many saints have a double portion of grief in their pilgrimage. Sitting here with your brethren in Christ, you look very cheerful; but I may be addressing those whose life is one protracted struggle for existence. Assuredly, you will not hold out without true faith, and much of it. You must endure, "as seeing him who is invisible."—You must joy in God, or you will not joy at all. Commend me to firm faith for power to bear the daily cross. He that believeth hath everlasting life, and the joys which come of it.

Certain saintly ones are called to bear great physical pain, and I commend to them, from practical experience, the power of faith in God

Under Acute Agony.

This is the sweetest support in the presence of a threatened operation. How grim those surgeon's lancets seem! Ah me! I knew a patient once—I know her still—who, when the lancets had been used upon her, caused the doctor's case of instruments to be filled up with roses! God alone can help you to fill up with roses that grim memory of danger and suffering. He knows thy poor body, and he permits it to be frail, and permits thy heart to be trembling, because he will glorify himself in his tenderness to thy weakness, wherein he will make thee strong. Jehovah Rophi is his name:

"The Lord that healeth thee." Give thyself up to him, and thou shalt yet sing of his loving kindness and tender mercies.

But there are other forms of suffering than these of daily life and of bodily pain. Possibly I speak to some who are suffering the evils of persecution. No cruel tyrant can burn believers now, nor even cast them into prison for Christ's sake; but there are ways enough for the seed of the serpent to show its enmity to the seed of the woman. "Trials of cruel mockings" are common yet. There are many ways in which the devil's whip can reach the back of the child of God. Persecution is still abundant, and many a man's foes are of his own household. I will rehearse no stories of Christian women with jeering husbands, nor of godly youths who endure scoffing and far worse; but many a house is still

A Place of Martyrdom.

Gracious sufferers, may the Lord keep you from anger and unkindness! By faith alone can you bear persecution, and turn it to account for the good of others. Do not attempt to escape by yielding what is right and true; but ask the Lord to help you to stand fast for him. If it be true that the Lord has his martyrs still, let it be seen that they are as brave as ever.

We have among us those who are not exposed to persecution, but have to stand against assaults of unbelief. That which believers in past ages have accepted as truth, is not believed in many places nowadays; and so it comes to pass that one brings to us a bit of sceptical science which he has picked up from Huxley or Tyndall; another comes with a criticism that he has found in some sermons of the modern divines, and a third appears with a vile blasphemy from one of the coarser assailants of religion, and each one demands an immediate answer to his quibble, or his difficulty. Do they really expect that we are to answer, on the spur of the moment, every objection that they are pleased to raise? I confess that I do not believe that one human brain is capable of answering every objection that another human brain could raise against the most obvious truth in the world. Do not try to answer cavillers; but if you do, mind that faith is your weapon. If you take the wooden sword of your own reasoning, you may easily be beaten. Believe for yourself, because God has said it; and speak as the Lord guides you.

Again, it may be that I am speaking to sad ones who suffer

Under Mental Depression.

Some of us are by constitution inclined to that condition. I have sometimes envied those good people who are never excited with joy, and consequently seldom or never despond. "Along the cool, sequestered vale of life they hold the even tenor of their way." Happy people! At the same time, when I rise, as upon eagle's wings, in joyous rapture, I feel right glad to be capable of the blissful excitement. Yet if you soar to the skies, you are very apt to drop below the sea-level. He that can fly, can faint. Settle this in your heart: "Whether I am up or down, the Lord Jesus is the same."

My time is ended, although I had much more to say. I can only pray the Lord to give you to believe in him. If I should never again have the pleasure of speaking for my Lord upon the face of this earth, I should like to deliver, as my last confession of faith, this testimony—that nothing but faith can save this nineteenth century; nothing but faith can save England; nothing but faith can save the present unbelieving church; nothing but firm faith in the grand old doctrines of grace, and in the ever-living and unchanging God can bring back to the church again a full tide of prosperity, and make her to be the deliverer of the nations for Christ: nothing but faith in the Lord Jesus can save you or me. The Lord give you, my brothers, to believe to the utmost degree, for his name's sake! Amen.

HOMES FOR FIVE DOLLARS.

NUMEROUS inquiries have been made during the past few weeks from an official at Albany, N. Y., as to the good faith of an advertisement which has been inserted in many country journals. The advertisers have been offering lots thirty feet by one hundred and twenty-five for five dollars each. Persons who had seen the advertisement and were anxious to purchase, were unable to obtain definite answers from the advertisers and therefore wrote to the Controller. He replied that he had been told that the lots advertised were "located on the side of a mountain, almost inaccessible and to which a goat could hardly climb." That will prove a fatal objection. The more valuable and the cheaper the lots, the more vexatious it would be for the owners if there was no way to them that they could travel. So it would have been with the human race if the only way to reach heaven had been perfect obedience to the law. But hope came when Jesus declared "I am the way . . . no man cometh unto the Father but by me." (John 14: 4.)

AN ANXIOUS IMMIGRANT.

A BOHEMIAN woman with an infant in her arms has been at the Barge Office, New York, for three weeks anxiously awaiting the arrival of her husband. She landed from the Wieland about the middle of June. She said that she and her husband had become separated in Hamburg just before the vessel sailed, and that she expected him daily. As day after day went on without any tidings of the man, the Barge Office officials began to doubt the woman's story, and finally decided that they would send her back on July 6. On July 5, she slipped out of the detention pen while the passengers of the Rhaetia were being landed, and going up-stairs gazed wistfully through the slats into the enclosure where the immigrants were swarming from the landing barges. She was looking for the man she had so frequently and vainly looked for before. This time she saw him. She gave a scream of joy that echoed through the granite building and hurried down to meet him as he came out of the office. Then there was an affecting scene as the couple met and the wife told her husband how his coming had just saved her from being sent back to Europe. Her trouble had all come from that unfortunate separation from her husband in Hamburg which she must have doubly regretted when she found she could not enter the country without him. Sometimes Christians are unhappily separated temporarily from their Lord by their sins and inconsistencies, and they, too, know that without him they cannot enter into heaven. But for them there is the sure promise that he will heal their backslidings and receive them freely. (Hosea 14: 4.)

THE LEGEND OF NEW RIVER.

A REMARKABLE legend current in California is told by one of the pioneers of 1849 in the Hartford Courant. He states that soon after 1850 a party of emigrants on their way to "the land of gold" crossed the Colorado river by the ferry left by Graham in 1848 "and struck out on the desert for the land of promise. The trail was well defined by abandoned wagons and the bones of horses, mules, and human beings. Struggling through the yielding sand, the thermometer at 120 degrees," wheels falling apart, animals dying from heat and thirst, they on the second night out halted some ten miles from "Cooke's Well," with the water in their kegs exhausted. Tradition states that a little ten-year-old girl was heard praying, in one of the wagons, for water. It was a simple prayer and though one of the men said reverently, "God grant it," none of them thought anything of the child's supplication. They were half-mad with thirst and discussed how they might save their lives and caring nothing for the gold. Suddenly the voice of the little child, in cheerful accent, sounded clear in the silent night. "O mother, mother, get me water; oh, I can hear it running; oh, do get some for baby and me." They thought her delirious from her sufferings, when suddenly a babel of sounds broke forth from the oxen and mules, all frantic and endeavoring to break loose from the wagon poles. A rustling noise called their attention to a slight depression near the wagons, and on investigating the cause they found water gushing up out of the sand sweet and clear. Their lives were saved and they thanked God. It was afterward discovered that the stream, which flowed a distance of twenty miles, was caused by a sand bar below the Yuma, but those whose lives it saved called it the miraculous water. There are many crises in life when deliverance would come if men instead of devising plans would exercise childlike faith and cry to God for help. (Matt. 11: 25.)

TWO EXPERTS PUZZLED.

A DEMAND for a new system of arranging Railroad time-cards is made by a New York journal. It declares that the present system is not understood by one per cent. of the travelling public. Even persons supposed to be experts are puzzled by the cards now issued. An incident in proof of the statement is told. It appears that in a depot in Boston, Mass., a gentleman was studying the time-card on the wall, without making out what he wanted to know, when the president of the road came by and accosted him. The two were old friends, the puzzled man being a professor who is the author of a work on the railroads of America and an accepted authority on all railroad matters. "I am very glad to see you," the professor said: "I wish you would help me out with this time-table. I cannot make head or tail out of it. The President joined in the investigation, and for some moments the pair blundered about among the figures, with no satisfactory results whatever. "Oh, I never can make anything out of these things!" the president of the road exclaimed at length. "Let's ask somebody!" And they went and asked a brakeman who promptly gave them the information they wanted. The spectacle of the two great men who were supposed to know everything about railroads getting enlightenment from a humble brakeman was significant. The difference between them was that the knowledge of the great men was theoretical while that of the brakeman was practical and was acquired in the discharge of duty. Many a humble Christian is for the same reason less perplexed about doctrinal matters than learned professors. Christ's promise is that they who do his will "shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." (John 7: 17.)

A BEWITCHED PRISONER.

THE story of an effort to subdue a turbulent prisoner is told by a Boston journal. Mrs. Barney had set her heart on inducing the city authorities to employ police matrons, but could not convince the police that they would be of any value. "We have one woman brought in here three or four times a year," they said, "who is so violent that it requires four policemen to put her in a cell and they generally get their faces badly scratched. What could a matron do with her?" "Send for me next time she is brought in and I will try," Mrs. Barney said. In a few days she was notified that the woman was in a cell. "Now," said the chief of police, "if you can take her quietly into court, I shall believe in the use of police matrons." Two policemen were detailed to protect her when she entered the cell, but Mrs. Barney refused their assistance. "I am your friend, Sallie," were her first words to the culprit. "No," was the reply, "I have no friend in the world." But Mrs. Barney sat by her side and talked to her and drew from her the history of her life. When the time came to go to court the cell-door was opened and Sallie taking the arm of her newly discovered "friend" walked quietly into court. The policemen who stood around, prepared for the struggle which usually preceded Sallie's appearance in court, were amazed at her docility. Mrs. Barney had "bewitched her," they said. If love and kindness were among the powers of witchcraft they would have been right. These were the powers by which the violent woman had been subdued and they are the powers by which men are to be won for Christ. The all powerful message which the Christian is to carry to the unconverted is that God loves them. (John 3: 16)

RESCUED BY A TRAMP.

A LITTLE girl, about ten years old, while playing in City Hall Park, New York, on July 5th, fell into the fountain, which was filled to the brim with water. The fountain is deep, and she would have been drowned had it not been for one of the loungers in the park. The girl was with two other children of her own age, and when she fell into the water their screams attracted a crowd. Strange to say, not a person in the crowd attempted to save her. They simply stared at the girl. Just as she went down for the third time a rough-looking man pushed his way forward and jumped in after her. He found her on the bottom and quickly brought her to the surface. He placed her on the edge of the basin and looked about for help, but no one offered to assist him, and he held her there with one hand, while he clambered out with the aid of the other. Placing her on his knee he forced out the water that she had swallowed, and soon had the satisfaction of seeing her regain consciousness. Then, handing her over to her companions who promised to take her home, he walked off in an unconcerned manner. When asked for his name and address the man said his name was Thomas Burns, but he had no address. There was a little inconvenience and trouble, but it saved a life. Many a soul might be saved from perishing if Christians were similarly ready to go down to them in their misery and lift them out. Men who do this, though the world knows them not, will be recognized and rewarded on the last great day. (Mal 3: 17.)

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editor, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE TIMID DISCIPLE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning July 26. John 3: 2; 7: 50-53; 19: 39.

WHO Nicodemus was. A man of high station. Probably a member of the Sanhedrim, the Jewish Supreme Court. This is indicated by his being in a position to protest against Christ being condemned unheard (John 7: 50-51.) Membership of that body was peculiarly honorable, there being but seventy or seventy-one members. They were the aristocracy of the nation. Nicodemus had consequently more to give up than most men of his time. The wealth and honors men desire often operate as hindrances to spiritual advancement. The call to follow Jesus was obeyed by men who had only boats and nets to leave, but not by Nicodemus who had a seat in the Jewish Senate to renounce.

He went to Jesus. That was more than other men of his station did. It showed that he had been impressed; that prejudice did not blind his eyes; that he had read aright the lessons, the miracles were intended to teach. He perceived that they were credentials. He came for teaching. A remarkable tribute to the Galilean peasant from a Pharisee.

His Compromise. He went to Jesus by night. Did not wish it to be known. Thereby, Jesus lost the prestige, which he would have gained by a convert of so much distinction. Through his secrecy it was possible for the taunt to be made, "Have any of the rulers or the Pharisees believed on him?" (John 7: 48.) The cause of Christianity lost the benefit of the influence, which his example would have had on the people. Nicodemus, himself lost the companionship of Christ, the privilege of listening to his discourses, of seeing his miracles, of being with him in his daily life. He lost, too, the glory explicitly promised (Matt. 10: 32), to those who confess Christ before men.

He had to come out for Christ after all. Notice the stages of his progress. He protests against the hostility of his colleagues (John 7: 50-53), but only on general principles. Timid Christians in worldly society, do this sometimes; but as with Nicodemus, it is ineffective. Christ was not helped by the half-and-half championship, the enemy was not propitiated, and Nicodemus was snubbed. At last, he showed more courage than the avowed disciples. When they all forsook their master and fled, Nicodemus went with gifts to his burial. (John 19: 39.) The crisis brought out the heroism of the man. Strange that one, who concealed his discipleship in the brighter days, should have avowed it, when all seemed lost! Tradition says the Jews deprived him of office, beat him cruelly, and drove him from Jerusalem.

A PIONEER WORKER.

Rev. Francis E. Clark, D. D., the Founder of the Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor.

WHILE the echoes of the mammoth Christian Endeavor Convention at Minneapolis, Minn., are still vibrating through the land and all that pertains to the wonderful movement is of public interest the portrait here given of the founder of the Society will be doubly welcome to our readers.

We are apt to think much of a man, who by some invention has raised himself from poverty to affluence, but surely infinitely greater honor is due to the man, whose idea has been so blessed of God, as to bring a wealth of souls into the Church of Christ. In the latest number of the Golden Rule, it is authoritatively stated that during the past year, there have been added to the Church, no less than eighty-two thousand souls from the ranks of associate members of the Societies of Christian Endeavor. Everything connected with the origin of these Societies and the man whose fertile brain conceived the idea of them is therefore of interest to the church.

Rev. Francis E. Clark, D. D., is a Canadian by birth, though of New England descent. He was born Sept. 12, 1851, in Aylmer, Quebec, where his parents were temporarily residing. His father, who was a civil engineer died when he was two years old and five years later his mother, who in the interval had supported herself and her family by teaching, also died. The boy was then adopted by his uncle, the Rev. E. W. Clark, a Congregational minister at Auburndale, Mass., and subsequently of Claremont, N. H. After acquiring the rudiments of education, he was sent at the age of eighteen to Dartmouth College, whence, having resolved to give his life to the work of the ministry, he went to Andover and graduated there in 1876.

Dr. Clark's first charge was at Portland, Me. Fifteen years before he went there, a devoted woman had gathered about her a number of neglected children for religious instruction on Sunday afternoons. Gradually a large Sunday School was formed from the beginning she had made, and two years afterward the State Street Congregational Church took hold of it and established a mission. In 1866 a Chapel was built and named Williston, as a memorial of the recently deceased wife of the pastor of the State Street Church, whose maiden name was Maria Williston. The cause grew and became strong enough to stand alone and in 1873 it was organized as an independent church. To the pastorate of this church Dr. Clark was called in 1876.

He was from the first an aggressive pastor and he was cordially and heartily assisted in his efforts to win souls by his excellent wife. Mrs. Clark was especially successful with the children, over whom she exercised a wonderfully magnetic influence. Many were won for Christ by God's blessing on her efforts, and many more, whom she had interested in religion, were brought in during a revival. These, Mrs. Clark united in what she called "a Mizpah Circle," the object of which was mutual help in growth in grace, and missionary effort among other young people outside the circle. The remarkable success of this circle, its rapid increase and its helpfulness in the work of the church suggested to the pastor the idea which developed into the first Society of Christian Endeavor. Its first meeting was on February 2, 1881. Its objects as defined in its constitution were three: (1) to lead children and youth to Christ; (2) to teach them religious truth; (3) to train them for service. Fifty-seven persons signed the first covenant as active members and six others as associates.

The benefits which flowed from the organization were made known to the Christian public by Dr. Clark in August 1881, in an article contributed to a religious journal. Pastors of other churches saw at once that here was the clue to the solution of the perplexing problem of keeping the young people actively interested in church work, and they adopted it promptly. By the end of 1881 five societies were organized and when the annual conference of 1883 was held there were fifty-six. From that time the movement has continued to grow, until now there are 16,274 societies, with an aggregate of 1,008,980 members.

FOR BUSINESS WOMEN.

THE ladies connected with the Young Women's Christian Association in New York have given a new proof of their intelligent interest in the welfare of their sisters, who are earning a livelihood in business. They have opened a new kind of restaurant in the heart of the business district of the city for the use of women only. The food supplied is of the best quality and is sold absolutely at cost price. The novel feature of it, however, is that special provision is made for girls who bring their own lunch. A number of these may engage a table at a nominal sum where they can sit together and enjoy their meal. If they desire to supplement the food they bring, they can have a large cup of excellent tea or coffee for two cents, or a bowl of soup and bread and butter for five cents. Evidently there is not much prospect of making money for the managers in this enterprise, but there is a certainty of money being saved to the girls who avail themselves of its advantages. How great a benefit it will be to them can be realized only by people who know how small is the salary the girls are able to earn by long and arduous toil. That the managers of the Association know how to run a restaurant is proved by the fact that it has been found necessary to close the one recently opened in the Margaret Louise home, adjacent to the Association Building. So overwhelming has been the patronage of the restaurant, exceeding the wildest expectations of its managers, that larger accommodation and increased facilities are a necessity. The restaurant has therefore been temporarily closed while the necessary extensions are made.

THE GREAT CONVENTION.

ALL that was expected of the Christian Endeavor Convention, at Minneapolis, both as to numbers and enthusiasm, was abundantly realized. At the first opening exercises, though several delegations including those from Washington and New York, had not arrived, there were over twelve hundred delegates present. Dr. Clark's address showed that he was deeply moved by the magnificent assemblage, which the call of the United Society had brought together. It was gratifying to observe that each speaker emphasized the paramount importance of keeping the Society strictly apart from denominational lines. It may be hoped that their words will be heeded. The beauty, power and usefulness and all the future prospects of good in the Society, hinge on its being unrestricted by sectarian limits.

HOW TO PROCEED.

AN Epworth Leaguer dropped a query into the Question Box at a recent Convention, which has elicited an elaborate reply from a contributor to the Christian Advocate. The question was: "The Chapter Organized, What Then?" Briefly summarized, the advice is for every member to thoroughly familiarize himself with the obligations and responsibilities of membership, realizing that he is in the League to get good and to do good. Then to concentrate effort on the Department of Christian Work. Make sure that the League is in touch with the Pastor, the Official Board, the Sunday School Board and the Class Leaders, and see that they clearly understand that the League is organized to help them in church work. Afterward organize the several departments with officers and committees. Prepare the programme in the Cabinet Meeting, present it to the chapter and enroll members. The officers should arrange most of the business in the Cabinet Meeting, submitting the more important items for approval to the chapter. A business meeting should be held once a month and should be preceded by a consecration meeting. These directions, if carried out earnestly and in the right spirit, will ensure success to the League.

AN APPROPRIATE WORK.

A SINGULARLY gratifying report is that, which the Silver Cross publishes of the recent convention of the King's Daughters, in North Carolina. It is gratifying not only on account of the flourishing condition of the Order, in that State, but on account of the character of the work in which it is engaged. "Every circle," says one of the members, has been doing its best to relieve suffering. That is a peculiarly appropriate work, for those who are followers of Jesus, who "went about doing good." All honor to the circles, who work to pay off a church debt, or to put a new Bible in a pulpit, or a new carpet on a church floor, but especially let us honor those who endeavor to relieve suffering, as the King himself will surely honor them.

The report read at the convention shows, too, that the Order is not confining its attention to physical suffering. It is engaged in an effort to promote the welfare of the girls of the State by an industrial school. "Another object," says the Secretary, "has been placed before us. In the Oxford Orphan Asylum are gathered more than two hundred homeless, destitute children from all parts of this State. There is great lack of certain essential comforts, conveniences and articles needful for the proper training of the children.

"There is another class that ought to claim your attention that needs our prayers and help—our fallen sisters. Can we do nothing to lead these lost daughters to pure and sinless lives? The King did not scorn them—why should we? Guarded and sheltered in pure homes, we can hardly understand how any woman can be so tempted as to fall into such degradation, and yet, we know there are thousands who have gone down to the lowest plane of dissipation and sin. Take their woe-ful condition to the Father of all, and ask for guidance and help in finding some way to aid them in escaping from a life so hapless here, and so hopeless for the great hereafter."

A JAPANESE Y. M. C. A. SECRETARY.

THE General Secretary of the newly organized Young Men's Christian Association of Tokyo, Japan, Mr. Seijiro Niwa, is evidently a man of strong religious principle and one eminently fitted for the office to which he has been elected. From a brief sketch of his life which Mr. J. T. Swift of Tokyo sends to the Young Men's Era we learn that it is only nine years since he renounced Shintoism for Christianity. He was then seventeen years of age and was employed as a clerk in the National Bank at Osaka. In the evenings he attended a commercial school, the teachers of which were among the most determined opponents of Christianity in Japan. Under their influence he was led to believe that anyone accepting the new religion could not be a patriotic Japanese citizen. He became much prejudiced against Christianity and Christians in consequence, and was very outspoken in his hostility, especially toward a Mr. Hirose, one of his fellow-clerks, who had embraced Christianity. This very hostility caused him to be the subject of special prayer. It became a habit of Mrs. Hirose whenever her husband was late in returning from the bank to pray for young Niwa, who, she suspected, was detaining him in religious controversy. Her prayers have been abundantly answered.

Mr. Niwa had a great desire to learn English and for that purpose took lessons from a foreign missionary, who made the Bible his text-book. In order to make better progress the pupil procured a Chinese New Testament that he might gain some idea of the book he was translating. In a short time he came to believe in God and to worship him as the heavenly Father, though he refused to believe in Jesus Christ as the Son of God. The Sermon on the Mount, however, led him to reconsider his position and he prayed to God for enlightenment. The result was that he became a sincere believer in Christ and was baptised. He entered the Doshira or college of the American Board in Japan to prepare himself for missionary work among his people. He has been elected secretary of the Y. M. C. A.

"EYE HATH NOT SEEN."

SOMEWHERE in the realms supernal
Is a home prepared for me
Where my joys shall be eternal,
And my spirit ever free.
Mortal vision helps not here;
God conceals it from my sight.
By effulgent beams of light;
Oh, that he would bring it near!

I cannot draw back the curtain
That conceals the glory land;
Yet my hope is sure and certain,
For the tracings of God's hand
On the opposite do appear,
Like the cherubim of old
Wrought in needle-work and gold,
Bringing all the glory near.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Describes a Children's Festival in the East—The Story of Selfish Selim.

THE household—or at least the juvenile portion of it—was in great glee last week. It lacked but three days to the annual Sunday School festival and the children were all agog over it and full of pleasant anticipations. Of course, Uncle John was admitted to their confidence.

"We're going to sail out as far as the Oak Grove, Uncle," spoke up little Ted, "and the Browns are going and the Wheelers and—"

"And everybody else, I suppose," said Uncle John, smiling at the earnestness of the faces before him. "Well, I'm sure you ought to be grateful to your teachers for providing such a capital holiday for you. Be careful of one thing," he added.

"Don't overdo it, as little Selim did, when he went with the Sunday School picnic at Ismailia."

"Oh, Uncle, do tell us what he did," cried Milly, as they gathered around the traveler's knee.

"Who was Selim?" inquired Tom. "But—won't you wait a minute till I ask Max Wheeler to come and hear it, Uncle? Pray, do wait. You know Max is going with us, and he would like to hear about Selim."

He ran from the room and in a few minutes returned, bringing with him his neighbor and playmate, Max, a fair-haired bright-eyed lad of eleven, who came shyly forward.

"Well, now," resumed Uncle John, "I suppose you think you've got me where I can't get away, so I have to tell everything. Selim? Why Selim was a little fellow, no older than you, Tom. He belonged to a poor family, who lived in a wretched quarter of Ismailia, which, as I told you sometime ago, is a town on Tamsah Lake, in Egypt, with about 7,500 inhabitants. Before the Suez Canal was dug, Ismailia didn't amount to much, but now it's a place of some importance, with a railway station and many white inhabitants. There are several schools there, conducted by Christian people, although the whole district is Mohammedan.

"One of the schools decided to give the children a treat. Now, it is quite different, dealing with Moslem boys and girls from what it would be with children here. Poor folks there give their children very little clothing—the prevailing garment of childhood being a blue cotton robe and possibly an old jacket with tarnished embroidery and, in the case of the girls, a veil. Selim and his little sister, Haneen, were among those who came, and no pair looked neater than they did, although Haneen had a veil almost large enough to bury her out of sight and Selim's jacket was dreadfully big, too, I must confess.

"Now, Selim had been preparing for this holiday for a long time ahead. He had gotten together about twenty paras, (the smallest Egyptian coin, and worth less than a cent of our money), and had bought of a sugar-date and candy seller a quantity of his wares with which he stuffed the pockets of his faded jacket till they bulged out again. The managers of the excursion, had laid in a goodly stock of sweet cakes, flavored with saffron, such as Moslem children love, and had figs, sesame cakes, fruit and other delicacies besides. These were all loaded upon a donkey, and when we were ready, we set out for a pleasant nook on the lake-side, where we spread our camp under the shade of the trees. Here we had first a short service and singing, and then the young people gathered in a circle and the feast began.

"These Arab children had learned some of the familiar gospel hymns, and it sounded beautiful to hear their fresh young voices ringing sweet and clear amid the tamarisk trees. And they thoroughly enjoyed their repast of cakes and dates, sugar-cane and sweetmeats. Even the donkey-boy came in for a share."

"And don't they have plums and nuts, as we do?" interrogated Max.

"No, not like those in our land. Every country and climate has its own fruits. Sugar cane is a perpetual delight to the boys and girls of Egypt. For a para you can buy a stick of a street seller, or for a piastre (equal to about four cents of our money) one can purchase enough sugar dates to satisfy quite a number of young people. It is an amusing scene to witness the Moslem boys and girls flocking around the sellers of sweets in these old Eastern towns. In most places the English money is coming into general use, and you hear the diminutive tots talking of a 'shilling' or a 'sixpence' just as though they were in London. Many of the Moslem children lisp. It is funny to watch them, with their abbreviated gowns and their soft black eyes and even white teeth, trotting about the bazaars which have for them a wonderful attraction, particularly on market day.

"But to return to our picnic. We noticed that Selim, after he had received his portion of the cakes, went off and sat all alone under a distant tree, and would not even permit little Haneen to sit by him. I went over and saw that he had spread out on a piece of matting a miscellaneous collection of sweets, including his own purchases, and was devouring them greedily. The result was he was taken terribly sick and we had to take him home and put him under the care of a physician."

"He was an awfully greedy little chap, wasn't he," interrupted Tom.

"He had certainly a tendency to selfishness and gluttony, but probably not more than some American boys," replied Uncle John. "But his illness was not the only punishment he had to endure for his fault. He was avoided by the scholars, for true Orientals hold selfishness to be one of the worst of vices and their children are trained early in generous and hospitable habits. The lad felt the slight keenly and when he overheard the scholars speak of him in whispers as 'Selfish Selim,' he came to me with tears coursing down his tawny cheeks and sobbing as though his heart would break. I talked to him and pointed out the sinfulness of his conduct. I read him that beautiful text from the 20th. chapter and 16 verse of the Proverbs, which says 'Hast thou found honey? Eat as much as is sufficient for thee, lest thou be filled therewith and vomit it;' and the words of Paul where he encourages the men of Corinth to generous acts and to give to others not grudgingly or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver' (11. Cor. 9:7.) Poor Selim was utterly overwhelmed and deeply penitent. 'I will pray the good God to give me a clean heart again,' he said.

"That was ten years ago," sighed Uncle John. "I saw Selim years afterward, when he was a prosperous merchant in Port Said, and he then told me that he had never forgotten that day. It had been the turning-point of his life, for he is now a Christian and there is not a nobler nor more generous man in all Egypt.

"Remember," he added, in conclusion as he patted little Milly's auburn curls, "when you are tempted to selfishness or greed, that God loves a generous soul and that he himself is the fountain of all generous acts, having set us the highest example in giving up his only-begotten Son for our sakes, that we might be happy with him hereafter."

Table Manners.

"Like as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings," say the Scriptures, and so the good mother watches over her young ones at all times. Not the least important result of this vigilance on the part of Christian mothers is the quietly modest and sincere behavior of the children. At table, and in all the daily associations of domestic life, this training shines out, marking a refinement to be found nowhere else than in the Christian home. Selfishness, surliness, gluttony, and the train of petty vices that prevailed too many tables are absent, and instead we find an amiable gene-

Civil War. What a glorious opportunity for Christian workers to bring these young ones as recruits under the banner of the Cross.

What triumphs might be accomplished by such an army as this, marching shoulder to shoulder for the cause! Here is encouragement for fathers and mothers everywhere throughout the land.

Hot Weather Tempters.

A GOOD many people have two kinds of tempers—one for pleasant days and quite another for those in which the mercury rises uncomfortably high. It would, perhaps, be too much to expect everybody to be equable and agreeable in torrid weather; but the difference with some is so marked that their sultry-day moods deserve to be characterized as 'hot weather temper.'

It is astonishing what an amount of friction one hot-weather temper will bring into a household. If it belongs to papa, there is a settled gloom on all sides, from mamma down to the baby who hasn't yet begun to go to school. Breakfast is a marked failure, usually, and the little excursion that had been planned for days in advance isn't even mentioned in a whisper, while the meal is in progress. The head of the house scowls and glares in his coffee cup, as if he expected there to find the cause of his own disgruntlement. Then he looks crossly at his good wife, with a look that clearly says: "I have something on my mind if I only cared to let it out." He fumes as he chips his egg, slips a roll off the pile with something very like a snarl and, finally, after mopping a red and perspiring forehead, off he goes to business as wretched as possible. Of course, much of this may be laid to the weather but a good deal of it might be avoided. A little patience, possibly a lighter garment or two, a cool dip in the bath and a calm resolution to stay serene even though the quicksilver should fly out of the window, would accomplish wonders in hot weather. Besides, a paternal smile and kiss, and a cheery greeting make the breakfast-room ten degrees cooler, even in the hottest weather.

Angel's Work.

Not great deeds, but little kindnesses make the world bright. In a palace car entered a weary-faced, poorly-dressed woman, with three children. A look of joy crept into her face as she sat down on one of the luxurious chairs, but it was quickly dispelled as she was asked rudely to move. A smile of amusement was seen on several faces as the frightened group hurried out to one of the common cars. Upon one young face, however, there was a look which shamed the countenance of the others.

"Auntie," said the boy to the lady beside him, "I'm going to carry my basket of fruit and this box of sandwiches to the poor woman in the next car."

"Don't be foolish, dear; you may need them yourself."

"No, I'll not need them," he answered, "I had a good breakfast. She looked hungry, auntie; and so tired, too. I'll be back in a minute, auntie; I know mother wouldn't like it if I didn't speak a kind word to them."

About five minutes later the lady saw a pretty sight—the family feasting as perhaps they never had done before. The eldest child, with her mouth filled with bread and butter, said, "Was the pretty boy an angel, mamma?"

"No," answered the mother, "but he's doing an angel's work, bless his dear heart!"

Solace in Bereavement.

"THERE is a danger of permitting our bereavements to make us morbid and to impair our usefulness. A Tennessee mother writes: 'I am one of those who bear the burden of bereavement and truly these are the troubles that wear us out. I should like to have my thoughts directed into a more enlightened channel. I have had two lovely little boys—but alas! we laid the youngest to rest by the side of his little brother, whose grave has been there for the last four years. I have had much trouble in other ways; but, till now, have always been able to find consolation. . . . My little boy just taken delighted in talking of the dear Saviour and often said: 'When I get to be a big boy I will be a Christian soldier.' Just before he lost consciousness, he opened his eyes and said: 'Mamma, the soul never dies, does it?'"

Our Father above holds a mother's precious ones as hostages for her own home-coming, when she will clasp them again with no dread of parting. This assurance affords the best solace in maternal bereavement.

Christ's Young Army.

SOME well-informed statistician has estimated that there are nine million young people in the United States who rarely, if ever, attend Sabbath School and who are practically outside the Gospel fold. What an immense army for Christ they would make! Nine millions of them. Ten times greater than the hosts Xerxes led from Persia to conquer the ancient Greeks; twenty times greater than the greatest army Alexander of Macedon ever commanded; many times greater than all the soldiers the North and South put in the field during our own

Robert's Heroism.

UP above Captain Allen's mill is the finest trout fishing of Schuylkill County. There is also some of the most entrancing wild-wood and stream scenery. The summer before Mrs. 'Liza was ill, an artist and an angler had come up there together, and had concocted glowing and illustrated articles about the locality for a leading magazine. A fashion had been set, and, in August, up came in detachments of two and three, anglers and artists, and made a camp on Lal's Mountain. In their corduroy knee-breeches, their leather leggings and flannel shirts, they scoured the neighborhood.

Jerry need take no chickens, eggs, or butter to Lacy; his market was at the door. Eliza's services were enlisted for making pies, biscuits, bread, and washing fancy flannels. Captain 'Zekiel was kept busy,—now mending this, now making that; or, again, building sheds for the camp. Jerry was called upon to take the place of a recreant cook who got drunk and was discharged, having nearly set the camp and the woods on fire. And Robert was in constant demand. Would Robert guide them here or there? would he take the Britt boat and go to Lacy for groceries? would he bring their mail? He was always cheerfully on hand. The Captain and 'Liza did not begrudge his services to the strangers. None of them considered whether he would be paid. They were generous,—these people; ready to spend and be spent for others, according to their ability.

So Eliza herself was always ready to go and give aid where sickness, death, or extra work made occasion for her services, and her children were all trained to be helpful.

The summer which had begun so ill passed more swiftly and joyfully than any summer for years. The Captain and Eliza and Jerry all made some money. When October came the anglers and artists were gone, but going they left a little packet at the mill for their willing factotum. Robert found in it a new pocket-book, and therein three ten-dollar bills. Oh, joy! He looked at them in ecstasy. He devoured them with his eyes. He ran and gave one to Eliza with a hug; he gave one to Captain 'Zekiel; he gave the third to Pink. Then he stood and contemplated his family, each holding a strip of green paper, as the farmer's family in the "Vicar of Wakefield" each held an orange.

Then the barge Fair-Weather was loaded up, and made a trip, and Robert sold his jams and jellies for a good round sum, and the Captain shook his big head and said, "Hah! That was not such a bad bargain!"

The voyage was so brilliant a success, that when the Captain and Eliza, counted up the combined earnings, they found themselves better off than they had been for years. The exhausted wardrobes were replenished, and Eliza rejoiced in making much-needed new bedding, and in buying some new crockery. The interest money for the whole year was ready, and Captain 'Zekiel even went so far as to say to his wife, "Liza, do you suppose, if we had some more such summers, we could repair the mill or build a new house?"

Eliza shook her head. "It would take a many such summers to do either; and then, of what use would it be when we are under such a mortgage and liable to be sold out any day? The time is coming, 'Zekiel, when we will have to leave Lal's Mountain, and I don't know where we shall go, or what money we shall have to take us anywhere."

"Don't be down-hearted," said 'Zekiel. "I make sure we'll have better luck than you expect. It is a long road that has no turning. The Allen fortunes have been down-hill for two generations; it is time now that they began to come up. In my mind's eye, Eliza, I see a white house, with seven rooms and a porch, on that level spot a hundred yards above the mill."

"Well, 'Zekiel," said Eliza, with a sigh, "there is no harm in seeing these things in your mind's eye, if it gives you any comfort to do so. And I suppose the Lord knows what is good for us, and will let us have all that we ought. There's a verse, 'It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth.' We seem to have borne it, not only all our youth but our middle age pretty well through. Also. But I remember it is said in Pilgrim's Progress that he is happy who has his best things last."

"Perhaps we will, Eliza," said Captain 'Zekiel. "Anyway, don't you be down-hearted. Things might be worse. You might have died when you were sick, last May, or Mr. Wick might have died, and Jones might have foreclosed the mortgage."

The Captain and Eliza talked in this fashion, when they sat in the kitchen during the winter days, when there was no work in the mill, the children were all up at the red school-house, and the sun, shining across the snow, filled the kitchen with light.

The house nearest the mill belonged to young Nelson Britt. It was built in two low stories with an attic under the high peaked-roof. The attic ran across the whole top of the house, had a window in each gable, and was divided into two large rooms with a passage-way between them where the stairs came up. The windows of the attic were set in sashes that swung inward on hinges. The Britt family was large, and besides the parents children, there was an old hired man, and a young married woman of the neighborhood, who that winter helped Mrs. Britt with the work, for the sake of a home for herself and young baby, her husband having gone to Texas to prepare for their settlement there.

About nine o'clock one cold February night, when all the Britt family were in bed, some late passers-up the road discovered that the house was on fire. An instant and great uproar rose in the small settlement, and men, women, and children rushed to the scene of disaster. The house was old and all of wood—water was not to be had, as all things were frozen up. The Britt family got out their children as fast as possible, and half stupefied with smoke, the men came down from the attic, dragging the young woman, who between sleep and suffocation, was not fully conscious until she was in the sharp, open air. Then with wild shrieks she realized that her baby had been left in the bed. The men had never thought of it; she had not known what was going on until she was outside of the house, and already the single stairway was a sheet of flame.

"Ladders! Ladders!" shouted the men, while the poor young mother, screaming for her child, was held back by the women from flinging herself back into the burning stairway. "Ladders! Ladders!" But the Britt had lent their longest ladder, and the other was broken. Some rushed to the mill for a ladder. That was far too short. A cry of dismay told that the baby was doomed. Then a louder cry of surprise—for the window of the woman's attic room was flung open, and in it stood Robert with the baby in his arms. His course was evident. He had climbed up a great pear-tree growing against the opposite gable, kicked open the window of the man's room, groped his way to the other room, and found the child among the bed-clothes. Then, just in time to save himself and the babe from suffocation, he had pulled open the window. But the opened windows, creating a draught, had hastened the flames. They had rushed up to the top of the house and taken full possession of the landing and the pine partitions, so that the dark form of Robert, his handsome boyish head, and the little white, night-gowned bundle in his arms, were ruddily revealed against a background of flames. Moreover, the flames were devouring the room. He sat astride the window for a moment, while those below consulted and dashed wildly about. Then as the red tongues reached out to lick him up, he dropped over the window ledge, and hung by one hand to the sill. It was an untenable position.

"Drop, boy! We'll catch you!" screamed the men. But the stentorian voice of Captain 'Zekiel rose over all. "My son!" Hold on!" The distance was a long one, the ground was frozen like rock. If Robert fell and was not caught his case was hopeless.

"He can't hold on!" cried the women. But Robert ducked his head, and the next instant was holding by both hands. He had seized the baby's clothes by his teeth, and thus held the child, resting against his upward strained arms.

Almost every one has at least one chance in life to show what is in him, and come grandly to the front of his fellows. This was the chance of the strong Captain 'Zekiel. A few things had been carried from the burning house—among them a large table. As soon as he saw Robert at the window the Captain took in the situation, and sprang to drag forward the table. When he cried "Hold on!" he was setting it in place. "Hold it firm!" he said, and the crowd sprang to brace it on all sides. "Britt and Peters! Up here! Clasp together! Brace yourselves. Bear my weight." And Captain 'Zekiel had the two strongest fellows of the hamlet locked together, and was upon their shoulders, and standing firmly, reaching up to his full height cried, "Drop now, my son!" Robert, at the very end of his strength, dropped like a shot. The men swayed, but did not fall. Robert fell into the Captain's arms; the Captain bent forward and set him on the table. Robert bent forward, and laid the rescued baby in the outstretched arms of its frantic mother. And then the roaring huzzas of the men, and the shriller exclamations of the women, voiced their approval of The Captain's Bargain.

"I vow that's a splendid boy of Allen's" said Deacon Britt, next morning at breakfast, to the schoolmaster. "That was bravely acted last night. He ought to have something done for him."

"The time may come to do something for him," said the master, "if it does not happen, as seems to me to be likely, that he does all that is needed for himself, and something for other people. But let us not spoil the spontaneous beauty of his present deed, by talk of reward. Let him have, for a time at least, that best reward, the consciousness that he thought wisely, acted bravely and promptly, and saved a human life."

In truth, Robert seemed to plume himself very little on his action. "It was easy enough to climb the old pear-tree," he said, "he had climbed it lots of times, and got into the attic window by it too, when he was playing with the Britt boys. He heard that the baby had been left, and he couldn't help but see the only way to get at it in time. He knew his father would manage some way to get him down from the window."

In spite of this lucid explanation of the affair, Robert was the hero of the winter, and the absent father of the rescued baby wrote that if Robert would come to Texas, he would go halves with him in any place he succeeded in opening up for a home.

That was a hard winter, the severest for years. The snow lay deep upon the hills—thawed much in January, filling the creeks, then a heavy freeze came on and converted the streams into almost solid beds of ice, and more snow piled up on the hills. Then, all at once, in the last week in March, came south winds blowing softly, and suns that seemed hot enough for May, so that the streams would be flushed to their brims when the storming waters uplifted and rent the masses of ice. In the joy of warm air, sunshine, grass growing hourly green, and blue-birds and robins flitting about every bush and tree, every one was out and busy. The barge Fair-Weather had suffered from the winter, and the Captain, Robert, and Jerry were busy repairing both it and the mill-wheel. It was Saturday, and the children were all home from school. The creek was very full, and blocks of ice were sailing upon its swollen, tossing surface. The Captain was in the mill selecting some lumber; Jerry and Robert piled saw and adze on the bank; Bop and the twins careering about, leaped now upon and now off the Fair-Weather as she was moored to the bank.

"Children," cried Eliza, "come off that boat. If you fall over, you will be drowned." Bop obeyed, but the twins were the children of the family who occasionally ventured disobedience. At this instant the demon of rebellion took possession of them. They danced on the deck, and did not come. Eliza was laying out clothes to bleach on the grass. She looked at her recreant offspring.

"Pink, go bring me those twins. I shall tie them up until they learn to come when they're called."

Pink jumped upon the Fair-Weather and set out to catch or chase on shore the naughty twins. But at that minute a roar was heard; the creek tossed tumultuously; the ice gorge had given way with a rush; an avalanche of ice and water swept down against the Fair-Weather; her old cable broke; she swung from shore. Eliza shrieked for the Captain. Jerry dashed toward the bank, but experienced the disadvantages of a wooden-leg,—his leg stuck in the soft sod and held him fast. Robert not being blessed with a wooden leg, cleared the distance and flung himself upon the Fair-Weather's tiller, which had just been repaired. The Captain appeared, Jerry got his leg out of the hole, Eliza and Bop ran to the brink. The Fair-Weather was out in the middle of the stream and sweeping toward Lacy faster than she ever went before.

Mr. Murray had just come up to the Mountain, and was nearing the mill on horseback. He saw what had happened, and, turning his horse to the stream, followed on the bank the course of the headlong voyage of the Fair-Weather. Young Britt had just saddled a horse to ride to Lacy. The Captain seized that without ceremony and dashed after the Superintendent. The creek roared and foamed above its banks; the ice-blocks hurled here and there; the clumsy, crazy old barge plunged along—the twins lying screaming on the deck. Bending all their strength on the tiller were the bareheaded, handsome fourteen-year-old lad in his patched and shabby raiment, and little Pink, her auburn curls streaming out in the breeze and her thin cotton frock blown about her as she followed the motions of Robert's arms, and he kept his eyes steadily fixed as he steered the barge clear of the snags and rocks and debris that would have wrecked her crazy frame and flung all her passengers into the seething flood.

A new bridge had been built at Lacy. Would it stand the freshet and the ice-gorge? If it did stand, could Robert's arm guide the Fair-Weather between the great piers of the bridge? If he puts her through safely, could he turn her toward the bank, where the broadening of the river would greatly reduce the force of the current? These thoughts were in the heads of the two frantic men who rode along the bank prepared to fling themselves into the water, to rescue the children or perish with them if the poor barge went to pieces.

The twins sat up on the deck and increased the misery of the occasion by holding out their arms and wildly screaming "Father!" On they went. It seemed to Captain Allen and the Superintendent that it must be hours since they began to follow that barge down-stream. Other people came out to cry and wonder, and other men on horseback turned about and rode with them, and they knew that the strength of the boy must be nearly exhausted struggling with his unwieldy craft, and that the gallant little girl at his side, doing her best, was lending but small aid. They saw the twins, as if obeying an order, rise and lean also on the tiller. The children were now grouped together. The bridge was in sight. People began to throng the banks and the bridge. Some men hastily untied row-boats and got out oars and ropes to follow the barge. They were near the bridge. The water boiled under the arches in fury; the ice-blocks crashed against them and piled up on the banks. Robert fixed his gaze steadily on the widest space—the space between the piers.

"He'll make it!" roared some.

"He'll miss it!" shouted others.

The boy seemed to calculate marvellously well the force and bearing of the current. On, on, under! He had bent all his young strength upon the tiller, and through the arch, almost grazing the pier, went the barge; and then Robert bore for the nearer shore, where the widening waters went with less furious rush. Boats put out to help him if they might, but he got his craft out of the surge of the midstream, and then brought her round toward the cove and grounded the Fair-Weather at last on the submerged bank—the poor old craft settling as if in relief upon the soft, muddy shore.

The boats were about them now. The men leaped on the deck. The proud Captain saw them shaking Robert's hands and patting Pink's tumbled head, and he and Mr. Murray rode into the water until it rose above their horses' knees—they were in such haste to be a little nearer the rescued children.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Subscriber, Waterbury, Conn.—I was greatly interested in your account of Evangelist Moody's schools at Northfield, Mass. How long have they been in operation?

The Girls' Seminary was founded in 1870, the Boys' in 1881. Other buildings have been added from time to time.

MRS. E. P. Waynesboro, Va. What authority exists for the statement that the Queen of Sheba tested Solomon's wisdom by asking him to thread the diamond?

The authority of tradition alone. Abyssinians say this particular Queen's name was Makeda, while the Arabs called her Balkis. The story of the diamond is one of many legendary incidents that have been handed down from time immemorial concerning this wonderful queen.

J. S. Vienna, Ont.—What is the costliest book in the world?

The Bible is at once the most valuable and yet the most easily attained. In a pecuniary sense, the Hebrew Bible preserved in the Vatican at Rome is the most valuable of all books. It is large, weighing over 325 pounds. Three hundred and seventy years ago, a syndicate offered $125,000 for it, but it was refused. It is now estimated as being worth $375,000, but it is not in the market.

G. T. A., Hartford, Ct. (1.) Can you refer me to any literature on the subject of Sabbath observance? (2.) How should we Christians spend the Sabbath?

(1.) Literature on the subject is abundant. See Rupp's Religious Denominations in the U. S.; Mrs. Davis' History of the Sabbatarian Churches; the publications of the American Sabbath Tract Society, and Cox's Literature of the Sabbath Question. (2.) See Rev. Dr. Talmage's sermon on Sundays' Bright and Doleful, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Jan. 13, 1889, the text being "And call the Sabbath a delight." (Isa. 58: 13)

J. H. B., Battle Creek, Mich. Two persons are trying to do all the good they can in this world in soul-saving, but one, being naturally the more intelligent, is able to accomplish much more than the other. Will he, in your opinion, receive a greater reward in heaven than the other?

Christ's parable of the Talents, (Matt. 25: 14-30,) furnishes the best answer, and shows how each will be held accountable and rewarded according to his opportunities, privileges, and responsibilities. If the abilities of one Christian are greater than those of another, his responsibilities are proportionately greater. Even with equal fidelity on the part of Christians, rewards must be measured according to the standard laid down by the Saviour in his beautiful parable.

D. M., Atlanta, Ga. Is it true that the Chinese are an older race than the Hebrews? Where are they first mentioned in literature?

Some leading Biblical students claim that reference is made by the Prophet Isaiah to the Chinese where he says: (ch. 49: v. 12,) "Behold these shall come from far and to these from the North and from the West, and these from the land of Sinim." Still other eminent scholars assert that Chinese tradition, contemporary with the Flood, mentions a great overflow of the Yellow River in which millions perished. These, however, cannot be authenticated as historical facts.

J. P. R., Leavenworth, Kan.—Will you kindly advise me concerning the following supposable case: My book-keeper, to whom I am paying a liberal salary, misappropriates $500. On investigation, I find that he has been supporting his parents during the period of his wrongdoing. Am I bound by the law of the State to prosecute or am I justified in overlooking the offence and condoning it in the spirit of Christian forgiveness?

Until the law of the State shall have taken cognizance of the crime, and assumed jurisdiction through the proper officials, the opportunity for forgiveness still rests with you. The Christian policy would dictate merciful treatment under the circumstances, as you have stated them. It would be well, however, to make the pardon conditional that fruits of repentance and satisfactory evidence of reformation should follow.

F. W., Columbus, O.—Where did Columbus first set foot on American soil?

Five islands belonging to the Bahama group, claim the honor of first welcoming the discoverer, viz., Cat Island, Watling, Samana, Turk, and Mariguana. Antiquarians incline to the opinion that Watling Island was the landing-place. It is a strip of sandy soil, seven miles wide and 13 long, and has now about 700 inhabitants, all very poor and ignorant people. They are almost all colored, but have a white magistrate. Columbus, in his journal under date Oct. 14, 1492, describes the landing which took place two days earlier.

His topographical outline of San Salvador (the name he gave to the island), coincides with that of Watling Island in a remarkable degree.

F. F., Milwaukee, Wis.—Is it not reasonable to suppose that the Revised Version of the Bible is more accurate than the Old Version in its translations? If so, why does it not supersede the Old Version?

With the advantage of later archaeological and philological discoveries and earlier manuscripts than those formerly employed the Revised Version is doubtless the more accurate. The Authorized or "King James" Version only became popular after two generations. At first it was rejected almost hopelessly, even the children of that day having been indoctrinated with the love and respect for the still older version. In all probability, the next fifty years will see the R. V. in general use.

Mrs. J. D., Brooklyn, N. Y.—Why do we keep the first day of the week as the Sabbath, instead of the seventh, as directed in the Commandments?

Under the Christian dispensation, the Sabbath was altered from the seventh to the first day of the week. The seventh was observed by the Jewish Church in memory of God's rest after the work of creation and the Hebrew deliverance from Pharaoh's tyranny. The first is now observed by Christians in memory of Christ's Resurrection which took place on that day and which gave to it the name of the Lord's Day. There is, however, no law laid down in the New Testament concerning the first day, although it has been uniformly adopted by Christian nations all over the world as the Sabbath.

M. W. Jr., Fort Collins, C. H., Col.—May Christians consistently pray for wealth?

According to the old Hebrew formula, it was not sinful to ask for an increase of substance or for prosperity for flocks and crops. The Christian view of prayer, however, has modified this, and while there is no express prohibition against praying for riches, there is a direct promise that, having sought and obtained the divine blessing and pardon for sin, all things will be added. Probably the best answer to the question is furnished in the prophecy of Agur, (Prov. 30:8) wherein he says, "Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; fill me with food convenient for me, lest I be full and deny Thee and say who is the Lord, or lest I be poor and steal."

P. P. E., Trenton, N. J.—What progress, if any, has been made in the project to bring the Roman Colosseum to the World's Fair at Chicago?

None that we know of. The Colosseum which is a vast amphitheatre in the heart of ancient Rome, some 1800 years old, is probably altogether too great for purposes of transportation. It would have to be shipped in sections at an expense so enormous as to put such an undertaking out of the question. It is 157 feet high, 1000 feet in circumference, and was built by the captive Jews in Rome, after Vespasian had reduced Jerusalem and taken its citizens as slaves. Originally it was of wood, but this was replaced by stone, in such huge masses as to be awe-inspiring. Much of this stone has disappeared, being replaced at large intervals by brick-work. There were eighty arches and the amphitheatre often held 100,000 people on days when the gladiators fought with each other or with wild beasts. The last of these brutal shows was given in 525, A. D., by the Emperor Theodoric.

Mrs. S. M., Batesville, Ark.—How soon after the expulsion of our first parents from Eden did idolatry commence?

Adam and some of his descendants as late as the time of the Flood, are believed to have lived under a revealed system, in which, through their patriarchs and otherwise, they had a knowledge of God sufficient for their condition. Afterwards there arose the nature-worship, called Fetichism, consisting of the setting up and worshipping of animals, trees and stones, etc.—an idolatry invented by those who for their sins had been forsaken of God, (Romans 1: 28). There is no distinct mention in the Bible of any idols prior to the time of the Flood, but it is reasonable to suppose that idolatry was one of the abominations for which that terrible punishment was visited on the earth. The first positive indications of idolatry which appear in history are found in the worship of Sel or Sitekh (equivalent to the Hebrew Patriarch, Seth) to whom divine honors were paid by the Egyptians. Some Jewish writers interpret Genesis 4: 26 to mean that Enos, the son of Seth, was the originator of idolatry in that he paid divine honors to the host of heaven instead of to God alone.

A CHINESE PROFESSOR BEATEN.

C N intrepid convert to Christianity in China was described recently by Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, the founder of the China Inland Mission. The missionaries, he said, at one time had great hopes of the conversion of a young man who was Professor of an important branch of learning in a Chinese college. He was a man of singular ability who during his student career had won the highest honors in the University. In some way he was affected unfavorably and definitely rejected Christianity. After the lapse of several months he returned, and presenting himself to the missionary for examination, asked for baptism. His request was granted, for he was evidently a converted man. The time of ordeal for him was the day when he was to resume his lectures in college. As he entered the hall he had to pass the tablet on which was the name of Confucius, and every eye was upon him, curious to see if he would give it the usual obeisance. He passed it without a sign. "I bow the knee only to him who is the King of kings," he said. They turned him from that place though he had been the man most honored and lauded there, and beat him until the blood flowed on his white robes; but he stood in the streets of that Chinese city telling out the story of the "Man of Sorrows"—an example of Christ's love.

A FACE ON THE RAFTERS.

Much work is done for Christ that the Church does not notice at the time, but will recognize in the future; or, it may be, not until the day when the Master himself points it out on the great day of rewards, and crowns the doer with his approval. A speaker at a recent meeting in dwelling on this truth, said: "There stands in the East of Europe an old cathedral. Each year hundreds of men and women visit it from all parts of the globe; and as they stand there admiring the beauty of the great edifice, the guide bids them wait until the light, falling through a certain window, reveals a face carved in one of the rafters up in the vaulted ceiling, of such singular beauty that they recognize in that the gem of the whole building. The legend runs that when the master and architects met together to consider how best to beautify the great edifice of God, an old man crept into the room and pleaded to be allowed to do some little work, to add his share to that great building. They felt that his tottering footsteps and trembling hand were indeed unfitting him for any great service, and so they sent him away up to the roof, and told him to carve there upon one of the great rafters. He went his way, and day by day he toiled up under the vaulted darkness, until one day they missed him; and going up they found the old man lying lifeless on the scaffolding, with his lifeless eyes turned up to where there was a face looking on him of such great beauty, that the men—the architects and others—bowed their faces when they recognized the master-hand in that work. And so it seems to us it will be with much of the work done for Christ. The worker does it and passes away, but the work lives."

ARMAGEDDON.

The Last Great Battle of the World Described by Rev. George Stanley, Faber, B.D.

THE Battle of Armageddon, in which the beast and the false prophet are to be overthrown, I take to be the concluding event of "the time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation," mentioned in Daniel

12. It is the same likewise as the dreadful slaughter of the Gentiles in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, predicted in such forcible terms by Zechariah and Joel. At the close of the time of trouble foretold in Daniel 12, the infidel king is come to his end, none helping him; and at the beginning of the time of trouble, the restoration of the Jews is to commence. At the period of

The Great Battle of the Nations described by Zechariah and Joel, which synchronises with the destruction of the infidel king and the Battle of Armageddon, the Jews are represented as having been brought back to their own country. While, in the Battle of Armageddon predicted by St. John, which I apprehend to be the last event under the seventh vial, the beast, the false prophet, and the kings of the Latin earth, are to be completely routed with dreadful slaughter by the Almighty Word of God; and an end is for ever to be put to their tyrannical and persecuting domination over the Church.

Joel informs us, that the battle of the nations shall not only be fought between the two seas, but in the valley of Jehoshaphat; and St. John predicts very definitely, that this same battle shall not only be fought in a land which extends 1600 furlongs, but in a certain place of that land called Armageddon—The valley of Jehoshaphat therefore, and Armageddon, are one and the same region. Now the word Jehoshaphat signifies the judgment of the Lord, and the valley of the battle is indifferently styled by Joel the valley of Jehoshaphat, or the judgment of the Lord, and the valley of concision or destruction. It is plain, therefore, that this is not the proper, but only a descriptive, name of the place; that is, of some place or other between the two seas. Here then St. John steps forward, and furnishes us with the literal proper name of the region, which is now to be made

The Scene of the Judgment of the Lord. Armageddon signifies the destruction of Megiddo; and Megiddo is a town situate between the two seas, in the half-tribe of Manasseh, at a small distance from the shores of the Mediterranean. In the valley of this place, Josiah lost his life in his fatal encounter with Pharaoh, king of Egypt; and it appears, that this valley of the destruction of Megiddo, or, as it is termed by Joel, this valley of the judgment of the Lord, is hereafter to be the scene of a yet more dreadful conflict.

The Antichrist or atheistic king of the last days will, towards the close of his career, be troubled by tidings out of the East and out of the North, probably including, in part, intelligence of a revolt against his authority by some Jews in Jerusalem, who will have become converted. He will forthwith retrace his steps to Judea, which he had previously subdued, and will besiege Jerusalem, which he had before given to his allies the unconverted Jews. For, that certain unbelieving Jews will be converted in Jerusalem, is plainly asserted by Zechariah, and that the city will afterwards be besieged and taken is asserted both by Zechariah and Daniel. The unconverted Jews will have been restored by Antichrist, when previously making himself master of the whole land of Palestine; and why should he afterwards besiege them in Jerusalem, except on account of their revolt from his cause? for, if they had not revolted from him no reason can be assigned why he should so bitterly attack them.

A Crusade.

Troubled with such unpleasant tidings from the east and from the north, Antichrist, going forth in the height of his fury, threatens to destroy all such as should oppose him; and, he sanctifies the expedition by representing it as a holy crusade against heretics; and, with banners blessed by the false prophet, who (as we have reason to believe from the Apocalypse) will be his attendant, he devotes many to utter extermination under the blasphemous pretext of religion. His wonted success at first attends him. He besieges Jerusalem, now occupied by his enemies, and takes it. Here he exercises his usual barbarity increased tenfold by the defection of his late allies. Zechariah states that the houses will be rifled, and the women ravished, by his licentious soldiery.

Half of the inhabitants will be made captive; but the other half permitted still to remain in the city, under the control most probably of a strong garrison. Thus does he plant the curtains of his tents between the seas in the glorious holy mountain; and thus is Jerusalem, now for the last time, trodden down of the Gentiles (Dan. 11:40-45; Zech. 14.)

But the battle is not always to the strong, nor the race to the swift. At this anxious period the glory of the Lord is suddenly manifested in the midst of Jerusalem, and Jehovah himself becometh a wall of fire around her. The Almighty Word of God goeth forth, like a man of war, in the greatness of his strength; and all His saints, the innumerable armies of heaven, are with him.

His Awful Commission

is from the Most High, that His adversaries may learn by bitter experience that he who toucheth Judah, toucheth the apple of His eye. The tremendous vision halts for a moment on the Mount of Olives, which, like Sinai of old, acknowledges a present God, and with a mighty earthquake cleaves asunder in the midst. It then advances and hovers over the heads of the palsied troops of Antichrist. The Divine Word displays Himself, to the assembled nations. The faithful look up with awful wonder, knowing that their redemption draweth nigh. Every eye seeth him; and they also, his kindred after the flesh, which pierced him, now behold him in his glory. He cometh with clouds; and all the kindreds of the earth wail because of him. He descendeth his wrath: He treadeth the wine-press in the fury of his indignation: His garments are sprinkled with the blood of his enemies (Isa. 13:3; Zech. 15.)

It appears from comparing various prophecies together, that the overthrow of the Antichristian confederacy will be effected partly by natural agency. Christ will indeed tread the wine-press alone, for to his sole might will be owing: yet will he likewise use the instrumentality of others. While he miraculously smites his enemies with a dreadful plague, so that their flesh shall consume away while they stand upon their feet, and their eyes shall consume away in their holes, and their tongue shall consume away in their mouth: He will send likewise among them a great tumult from the Lord, so that they shall lay hold every one on the hand of his neighbour, and his hand shall rise up against the hand of his neighbour. Judah also, summoned to the dreadful task of vengeance by his God, shall take an active part in the destruction of his enemies: for, in that day, the Lord will make the governors of Judah like a hearth of fire among the wood, and like a torch of fire in a sheaf; and they shall devour all the people round about, on the right hand and on the left. Thus will Antichrist come to his end, and none shall help him. Thus will the beast now under his last head be taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both will be cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone; and the remnant will be slain with the sword of that Almighty Conqueror, who sitteth upon the white horse, the sword that proceedeth out of his mouth; and all the fowls will be filled with their flesh (see Zech. 12:14; Rev. 19.)

The Victory

A PARALYZED ARM RESTORED.

At a recent prayer-meeting in Jane Street Methodist Episcopal church, a fervent Christian man testified to a remarkable healing of which he had been the subject. He had been converted from a very careless life, and was endeavoring to do his whole duty to God and to his family. Having met with an accident at his daily employment, he was compelled to send for a physician, who gave him temporary relief. He told him, however, that there was no hope of his ever being able to use his arm again. The poor man was sorely afflicted at hearing such unwelcome tidings; but his great trust in his heavenly Father came to the rescue. He prayed with faith and with perseverance, to leave him the use of that arm, which was necessary for the support of those who were depending upon him. God heard his prayer. Gradually sensation returned to the limb and as he recovered his strength he was able to move it. Like the man in the Gospel he stretched it forth and the arm was made whole.

RECLAIMED.

WE once were factious, fierce, and wild,
To peaceful arts unreconciled;
Our blankets smeared with grease and stains
From buffalo meat and settlers' veins.
Through summer's dust and heat content,
From moon to moon unwashed we went;
But IVORY SOAP came like a ray
Of light across our darkened way.

And now we're civil, kind and good,
And keep the laws as people should.
We wear our linen, lawn and lace,
As well as folks with paler face.
And now I take, where'er we go,
This cake of IVORY SOAP to show
What civilized my squaw and me
And made us clean and fair to see.

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars. At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—Cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

A RECLAIMED MAN'S LOGIC.

FULL assurance of salvation is a subject which has been much debated by theologians, some of whom contend that no man can possess it. The question was settled to one man's satisfaction some time ago and in Jerry McAuley's Mission in Water Street, New York, one evening last week he gave the following sketch of the argument which had convinced him. He said: "I have been a victim of the rum monster ever since I was eight years of age; and before I had attained my twentieth year I was a confirmed drunkard. Every effort that human ingenuity could devise was resorted to by my friends. Travel in foreign lands, residence in Christian Homes and Inebriate Asylums, all proved in my case ineffectual. I had married at an early age, and tried hard to reform at that time, and partially succeeded. But it was not long before the old craving came back with redoubled force; and my wife was compelled to give me up as my other friends had done. At last after many years of misery and sin, the Holy Spirit directed my footsteps to 316 Water Street. I went in, listened to the cheering words of the Superintendent, and to the stirring testimonies of the converted heathen, and then and there I felt that I was not a hopeless case although my friends in the world had pronounced me one. "Shall I be saved to-night?" was being sung; when in my heart I answered: "Yes, Lord, to-night." From that hour I have been a new man. I know my sins have been washed away by the blood. How do I know? Why, this way. I asked the Lord for two things. One was to forgive me for my sins and the other was to save me from their power. Now here am I a living proof that he has delivered me for I have not touched a drop of liquor since. Sol am sure he answered the other prayer, too. No power but God's could have kept me out of the saloon when I had money in my pocket."

A POLICEMAN'S INTERFERENCE.

In a letter written a few days ago to the American Bible Society, Miss I. Mellinger, who is laboring in Central Turkey, relates the following incident of protection from an unexpected quarter. She says: Last year a young man was sent to a little village up among the mountains, to tell the people of the Saviour. Persecution began, and the people came to his living-place, threw his goods into the street, put him on horseback, and sent him out of the village. This year the missionaries decided that it was not wise to send another man to that place; but a young man, full of courage, who was preaching in a village not far away, determined to go there for a few days. The first evening, while he was speaking of the Saviour who died that we might live, a mob gathered to break up the meeting. Two policemen entered the room, and one stepped up to the side of the preacher and ordered the crowd to be silent and listen to what the preacher had to say, adding, "If you don't keep quiet I will make you." Turning to the young man he told him to continue, saying,

"I will protect you." After the discourse was finished the Moslem policeman spoke to the crowd. "All that you have heard," said he, "is true, and you ought to live up to it. I read the Bible; I love it, and it helps me." Then, to convince them of the truth of his statement, he repeated, word for word, the fourteenth chapter of Ezekiel. This was a great surprise, for Moslem policemen are usually not only ignorant but also wicked and unprincipled.

Miss Mellinger relates another incident that may account for this unexpected intervention. Early last year the Turkish authorities arrested a colporteur who was selling Bibles and Christian books. The arrest was illegal, but the colporteur was kept in prison several days before an order for his release could be obtained. He spent the time in talking to the policemen and officers about the prison and when he was released he left a Bible with them which they promised to read. Probably the policeman who secured a quiet hearing for the Evangelist was one of these men.

THE UNDERLINED TESTAMENT.

A CHRISTIAN gentleman who has recently been travelling in Spain, writes that the close of 1888, he was commissioned by a friend to procure a supply of Spanish New Testaments, to have certain passages underlined in red, and to hand them over to a colporteur residing in the south of Spain. This was done. The books were circulated, and shortly afterwards the individual who had undertaken this duty was obliged to leave the place, and the whole circumstance began to fade from the recollection of the other friends concerned in the transaction. Last month the first-named gentleman was led to visit this district, and at the mission station there met with a Spanish convert "much beloved by all." Observing in his hand a New Testament with verses underlined in red ink, he was led to inquire where he got it, and received from him the following singularly interesting story of his conversion. "My father," he said, "who is a mason, was working in the telegraph office in M—, and finding some papers in a basket he was allowed to remove them. Amongst the papers was this little Testament. My father brought it home and gave it to me. I began to read it with much interest, and continued reading for nearly three years, till in January last I saw Christ crucified for me, and light, and joy, and peace came into my heart. As far as I know none of my family know Christ yet."

The correspondent adds: "This little Testament has done its work, and I am so thankful to find that this soul was saved by God's Word alone, and taught by the Spirit of God to submit to Christ for pardon and everlasting life." May this incident, illustrative of fruit found after many days, encourage downcast workers to sow beside all waters, and trust him for the increase.

A SERMON IN VERSE.

A FRIEND in La Crosse, Wis., sends us a poetic version of Rev. Dr. Talmage's sermon on the text, "The one half of the greatness of thy wisdom was not told."—II. Chron. 9:6, from which we take the following stanzas:

Who finds the mission of his race,
And grapples it for other's good,
Hath little need of name or place,
So valued by the multitude.
Though much were said in recent years
Of light that shines, by Heaven's grace,
On one who leads, without compeers,
The vanguard of the Christian race,
The verbiage is dim and cold:
The half—the half has not been told.

But here on earth men fume and haste
To gorge the palate or the tongue,
Yet dare not let you touch or taste
Because the world and you are young.
Now, if I wish the truth to hear,
There is a place in all the land,
Where, free from hatred, blind to fear,
Our Champion still dares to stand,
And call men to the Shepherd's Fold,
Of which the half has not been told.

AN AGED SHEPHERD'S CONVERSION.

In a letter from Col. Lawrence who is an officer in the British Army in India is the following incident of an effort he made in company with a native Evangelist to preach the Gospel in a neglected town: "It was a village inhabited exclusively by shepherds. We told the story of the Good Shepherd seeking and saving his lost sheep. A very old man, who had been leaning on his long stick and putting his face almost in the face of the preacher that his deaf ears might lose no word, when the story was completed, said, with a look of deep satisfaction and joy in his face, 'It has fallen into my ears and cut,'—meaning the message had taken effect in his heart. He was encouraged to put his trust in Christ, and to call on Him, not Shiva, for help. He took, a firm hold of the name of Jesus. We heard afterward that the man did not forget that name, but it was upon his lips, when he died. Two men of the same villages told us that his last prayer was 'Yesu, Yesu, save me.'"

MISSIONARY LIFE IN JAPAN.

FROM Kyoto, in Japan, Bishop Harl writes to the Spirit of Missions, two first impressions of the sphere of his future labors. He evidently realizes that the work will be one of great difficulty, though he writes hopefully. It is wrong to suppose, he says, that Japan can rightly be called a heathen country, if by heathenism is understood anything reside and barbarous. "Had I been dropped down here in the night, I should have supposed on looking around me in the morning, that I was in the south of France on the shores of the Mediterranean."

"The old feudal castles, too, remind one of Europe, placed as they often are on an elevation, surrounded by moats, and constructed of masonry of the most solid character (I have seen stones in some of the walls which measured twenty-five feet in length, twelve in height, and ten in width). Every foot of available land is cultivated, as is the case in European countries, and by the constant manual labor and most abundant use of fertilizers, the soil is made to yield three or four crops each year."

"The towns are well policed, officers in uniform being seen as frequently as they are in American cities. In the larger cities, the first-class hotels, the railroad-stations and other buildings are lighted by electricity. A thoroughly systematized educational work prevails everywhere; common, middle, higher middle, and normal schools, existing in all the chief towns. Education is compulsory. There are in the empire nearly thirty thousand common schools. Newspapers are seen everywhere, and books are handled as by persons 'to the manner born.'" Unhappily, the Bishop says, books and newspapers alike are full of scepticism. It is not a rivalry now between Christianity and Buddhism, but between Christianity and Atheism.

THREE STAGES IN A HOUSEHOLD.

LETTERS to the Presbyterian Board from Peking, China, report the progress of mission work in that district. Miss McKillican says that recently Dr. Sinclair and Mrs. Ting were laboring in a neighboring village. Several men from another village visited them and were impressed with what they heard. On their return to their homes, their wives were astonished at their reports and believing that the men had fallen into a trap to delude them, decided to go themselves and find out what this strange religion was. On account of their home duties, they could not remain longer than two days, but before leaving they professed their belief in what they had heard and begged that some teaching might be done in their village. When Dr. Sinclair and Mrs. Ting arrived they found a large number gathered. In three of the homes that were visited the idols were destroyed, the people declaring they no longer believed in them. At one place the father of the family said: "I have believed in God, and have not worshipped idols for several months, but my wife and son would not listen when I tried to tell them about God. My wife went to the village to hear you, and returned ready to believe and have the idols destroyed, but it was not until to-night that my son was willing to listen, and now he also wishes to have the idols destroyed. Our ancestors have worshipped them for over two hundred years, but we now know they are false, and we wish from henceforth to worship the true God." Several of the men are now in the city engaged in the study of the doctrine.

A CONSECRATED LIFE.

The Rev. Charles Haddon Spurgeon's Labors for Christ—A Career of Devotion to the Service of the Master.

WITH a feeling of the deepest sadness, the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and godly men and women in all parts of the world, have learned of the dangerous illness of the Rev. Charles Haddon Spurgeon, the distinguished Pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle in London. For many days past, it has seemed as though the great life was about to close and the Christian world to be deprived of one who has been, under God, a noble instrument for the inbringing of many thousands of souls on both sides of the Atlantic. The well-beloved pastor, whose sermons have appeared in these columns week after week for thirteen years, has hovered between life and death, the frail thread of existence liable to be snapped asunder momentarily. Thus far, although still seriously sick, the Lord has wonderfully preserved him, and prayers ascend daily from both continents that he may be long spared to continue in his career of usefulness.

It is fitting, at a time when his name is everywhere spoken, to review the life of one who has been of such signal service in the cause of Christianity as Charles Haddon Spurgeon. The record is one that thrills the believer's heart; one in which the leading hand of God is visible throughout, from childhood to maturity. It is a record of the triumphs of faith, the Consecration of Abilities and energies, the entire surrender of self to the work of the Divine Master. Christians everywhere may take encouragement from the story of this holy life which we publish to-day.

Charles Haddon Spurgeon was born in the town of Kelvedon, in Essex, England, on June 19th, 1834. His paternal grandfather was an Independent minister at Stambourne, a man of sterling piety and greatly respected. His father was the Rev. John Spurgeon, formerly of the Congregational Church of Islington, near London, and his mother a Miss Jervis of Colchester. The home influences of the Spurgeons were well calculated to make a deep impression upon the boy. His mother was a lady of singular piety, and from her he received his first religious impulses.

When ten years old, Charles went to live with his grandparents and there received the same religious nurture he had experienced at home. While living there, an incident occurred which he often recalled in after life. The Rev. Mr. Knill, of Chester, a clergyman of much ability and a friend of the family, was paying them a visit. He took

Little Charles Upon His Knee and, holding the boy up to the gaze of the grandparents, prophesied that he would one day preach in Rowland Hill's Chapel, in London—a prediction that was in time literally fulfilled.

Under his grandparents' pious tutelage, Charles early began the study of the Scriptures, and at ten he read the portion at family prayers. On one occasion, he caused a commotion by stopping in the middle of the reading and demanding an explanation of a difficult passage in Revelation before proceeding further. Even at that tender age, his mind strove to grasp more than the mere sound and sought out the hidden meaning of the sacred Word. At school he was very successful in his studies, carrying off many prizes and acquiring high honors for a mere lad. On leaving Colchester, he entered an agricultural college at Maidstone, but stayed there only a short time, for at fifteen to become an usher in a school at Newmarket, his father's purpose being to make him a schoolmaster. But it was otherwise decreed, for a year later a change came which turned the whole current of this young life and gave to God's service one of its most brilliant and faithful workers. That change was

His Conversion, and it came about when he was sixteen. His own account of the occurrence is so simple and graphic that we reproduce it:

"I went into a Primitive Methodist Chapel, one snowy day in January," he said. "A thin-looking man came into the pulpit and read the text, 'Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth.' Then fixing his eyes on me, he said, 'Young man, you are accepting an engagement shortly afterward as school assistant at Cambridge, he found the opportunity he desired and began his religious work as a tract distributor in connection with the congregation of the church over which the late Robert Hall, a most eloquent and successful preacher, was then pastor.

But tract distributing was merely a step in young Spurgeon's pathway to higher usefulness. He felt the message on his lips and hungered for an opportunity to speak it. Soon it came. There was to be a service in a cottage at Taversham, a village near Cambridge, at which a preacher was to have been engaged. Young Spurgeon, seeing that no one volunteered, threw himself into the breach.

"It was not my first public address," he without worrying over it in advance or getting nervous.

His First Sermon.

Together they set out to Taversham, his companion being several years his senior. On the road they talked of things spiritual and, said Spurgeon, "I expressed the hope that he would feel the presence of God while he was preaching. He seemed to start and assured me he had never attempted to preach in his life and would never attempt such a thing. He was looking to me for that. This was a new view of the situation. I felt that I was fairly committed to do my best. I walked along quietly, lifting up my soul to God and it seemed to me that I could surely tell a few poor cottagers of the sweetness and love of Jesus, for I felt them in my own soul. Praying for divine help, I resolved to make the attempt."

In this devout frame of mind, the young preacher, still a mere boy, entered the thatched cottage where the farm-laborers and their wives were gathered together. After singing, praying and reading, came the sermon. It was not such a task as he had feared. He did not break down, nor stop in the middle, nor run out of ideas.

A Strange Interruption.

At last it was ended; he had passed the Rubicon, and, by God's strength, had set out on the road that afterwards led to the Metropolitan Tabernacle, the greatest audience hall in England. He took up the hymn-book, when an old dame cried:

"Bless your dear heart! How old are you?"

"You must wait till service is over," said the boy-preacher, gravely.

After the singing he was besieged by questioners.

"How old are you?" came from a dozen different pairs of lips.

"I am under sixty," was the laughing reply.

"Yes, and under sixteen," said the old lady who had first interrupted.

"Never mind my age," was Spurgeon's answer. "Think of the Lord Jesus and his preciousness."

This beginning was followed by preaching in the villages round about the old University town of Cambridge, and he soon became known far and wide as the "Boy-Preacher." In less than a year, he was called to become the pastor of a Baptist congregation at Waterbeach and thither he went, although only seventeen!

Feeling the urgent need of a more thorough preparation for the higher duties of the ministry, he tried, about this time, to enter Regent's Park College, but this would have involved the abandonment of his pastorate. He afterward gave up the idea of college. His education, brief as it had been, was unusually thorough in many ways. His work in the pulpit had commended itself to many who were more critical than the old dame at Taversham. In 1854, when nineteen, he made an address at a meeting of the Sunday School Union at Cambridge, which so deeply impressed some of his hearers that shortly afterward he was tendered the pastorate of the New Park Street Church in Southwark, and there he began

His First Important Charge

and his real pulpit work in good earnest. The congregation was a mere handful, but in six months the hearers crowded the chapel. Soon the fame of the brilliant young preacher spread abroad and people flocked to the little church in New Park Street. The press called attention to his precocious powers, and praises came pouring in on every side; but to these, Mr. Spurgeon gave no heed, working steadily and energetically and, in the same devoted and unostentatious way as when he first preached to the obscure little flock in the country. His in trouble, and you will never get out of it unless you look to Christ." And then lifting up his hands and crying out, as only a Primitive Methodist could, he exclaimed: "Look! look! look! it is only look!" I did look and saw with my mental eye the way of salvation open before me, and I was filled with joy unspeakable." Sixteen years later, preaching in the same church, Mr. Spurgeon pointed to a seat on the left hand under the gallery and said: "I was sitting in that pew when I was converted."

Following his conversion, he made profession of faith and was baptised by the Rev. Mr. Cantlow and united with the Baptist Church in the village of Isleham, near Newmarket.

afterward explained, "for I had already spoken repeatedly in the Sabbath Schools at Newmarket and Cambridge; but I had till then attempted no regular set discourse. The presiding genius of our Preachers' Association, Mr. James Vintner, whom we used to call 'Bishop Vintner,' asked me to go over to Taversham, for a young man was to preach there who was not much used to services and very likely would be glad of company. That was a cunningly-devised sentence. A request to go and preach would have met a very decided negative; but merely to act as company to a good brother who perhaps might ask me to give out a hymn and pray was not at all a difficult matter, and it was cheerfully complied with." The real object of the invitation, of course, was to have young Spurgeon preach,

THE VACANT CHAIR.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning at a Great Camp-Meeting at Lakeside, a short distance from Sandusky, O., the Text being, "Thou shalt be missed because thy seat will be empty." Samuel 20: 18.

SET on the table the cutlery and the chased silver-ware of the palace, for King Saul will give a state dinner to-day. A distinguished place is kept at the table for his son-in-law, a celebrated warrior, David by name. The guests, jewelled and plumed, come in and take their places. When people are invited to a king's banquet, they are very apt to go. But before the covers are lifted from the feast, Saul looks around and finds a vacant seat at the table. He says within himself, perhaps audibly, "What does this mean? Where is my son-in-law? Where is David, the great warrior? I invited him. I expected him. What! a vacant chair at the king's banquet!" The fact was that David, the warrior, had been seated for the last time at his father-in-law's table. The day before Jonathan had coaxed David to go and occupy that place at the table, saying to David in the words of my text, "Thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty." The prediction was fulfilled. David was missed. His seat was empty. That one vacant chair spoke louder than all the occupied chairs at the banquet.

In almost every house the articles of furniture take a living personality. That picture—a stranger would not see anything remarkable either in its design or execution, but it is more to you than all the pictures of the Louvre and the Luxembourg. You remember who bought it, and who admired it. And that hymn-book—you remember who sang out of it. And that cradle—you remember who rocked it. And that Bible—you remember who read out of it. And that bed—you remember who slept in it. And that room—you remember who died in it. But there is nothing in all your house so eloquent and so mighty-voiced as the vacant chair. I suppose that before Saul and his guests got up from this banquet there was a great clatter of wine-pitchers, but all that racket was drowned out by the voice that came up from the vacant chair at the table. Millions have gazed and wept at John Quincy Adams' vacant chair in the House of Representatives, and at Henry Wilson's vacant chair in the Vice-presidency, and at Henry Clay's vacant chair in the American Senate, and at Prince Albert's vacant chair in Windsor Castle, and at Thier's vacant chair in the councils of the French nation; but all these chairs are unimportant to you as compared with the vacant chairs in your own household. Have these chairs any lesson for us to learn? Are we any better men and women than when they first addressed us?

First, I point out to you the father's vacant chair. Old men always like to sit in the same place and in the same chair. They somehow feel more at home, and sometimes when you are in their place and they come into the room, you jump up suddenly and say, "here, father, here's your chair." The probability is, it is an armchair, for he is not so strong as he once was, and he needs a little upholding. His hair is a little frosty, his gums a little depressed, for in his early days there was not much dentistry. Perhaps a cane chair and old-fashioned apparel, for though you may have suggested some improvement, father does not want any of your nonsense. Grandfather never had much admiration for new-fangled notions. I sat at the table of one of my parishioners in a former congregation; an aged man was at the table, and the son was presiding, and the father somewhat abruptly addressed the son and said: "My son, don't now try to show off because the minister is here!" Your father never liked any new customs or manners; he preferred the old way of doing things, and he never looked so happy as when, with his eyes closed, he sat in the armchair in the corner. From the wrinkled brow to the tip of the slippers, what placidity! The wave of the past years of his life broke at the foot of that chair. Perhaps, sometimes he was a little impatient, and sometimes told the same story twice; but over that old chair how many blessed memories hover! I hope you did not crowd that old chair, and that it did not get very much in the way. Sometimes the old man's chair gets very much in the way, especially if he has been so unwise as to make over all his property to his children, with the understanding that they are to take care of him, I have seen in such cases children crowd the old man's chair to the door, and then crowd it clear into the street, and then crowd it into the poor-house, and keep on crowding it until the old man fell out of it into his grave.

But your father's chair was a sacred place. The children used to climb up on the rungs of it for a good-night kiss, and the longer he stayed the better you liked it. But that chair has been vacant now for some time. The furniture dealer would not give you fifty cents for it, but it is a throne of influence in your domestic circle. I saw in the French palace, and in the throne room, the chair that Napoleon used to occupy. It was a beautiful chair, but the most significant part of it was the letter "N" embroidered into the back of the chair in purple and gold. And your father's old chair sits in the throne room of your heart, and your affections have embroidered into the back of that chair in purple and gold the letter "F." Have all the prayers of that old chair been answered? Have all the counsels of that old chair been practiced? Speak out! old armchair. History tells us of an old man whose three sons were victors in the Olympic games, and when they came back, these three sons, with their garlands, put them on the father's brow, and the old man was so rejoiced at the victories of his three children that he fell dead in their arms. And are you, oh man, going to bring a wreath of joy and Christian usefulness and put it on your father's brow, or on the vacant chair, or on the memory of the one departed? Speak out! old armchair. With reference to your father, the words of my text have been fulfilled: "Thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty."

I go a little further on in your house, and I find the mother's chair. It is very apt to be a rocking-chair. She had so many cares and troubles to soothe that it must have rockers. I remember it well. It was an old chair, and the rockers were almost worn out, for I was the youngest, and the chair had rocked the whole family. It made a creaking noise as it moved; but there was music in the sound. It was just high enough to allow us children to put our heads into her lap. That was the bank where we deposited all our hurts and worries. Ah! what a chair that was. It was different from the father's chair; it was entirely different. You ask me how? I cannot tell; but we all felt it was different. Perhaps there was about this chair more gentleness, more tenderness, more grief when we had done wrong. When we were wayward, father scolded, but mother cried. It was a very wakeful chair. In the sick days of children, other chairs could not keep awake; that chair always kept awake—kept easily awake. That chair knew all the old lullabies and all those wordless songs which mothers sing to their sick children—songs in which all pity, and compassion, and sympathetic influences are combined. That old chair has stopped rocking for a good many years. It may be set up in the loft or the garret, but it holds a queenly power yet. When at midnight you went into that grog-shop to get the intoxicating draught, did you not hear a voice that said: "My son, why go in there?" And louder than the boisterous encore of the place of sinful amusement, a voice saying, "My son, what do you do here?" And when you went into the house of abandonment, a voice saying, "What would your mother do if she knew you were here?" And you were provoked with yourself, and you charged yourself with superstition and fanaticism and your head got hot with your own thoughts, and you went home and you went to bed, and no sooner had you touched the bed than a voice said: "What! a prayerless pillow? Man! what is the matter?" This: You are too near your mother's rocking-chair.

"Oh, pshaw!" you say. "There's nothing in that; I'm five hundred miles off from where I was born; I'm three thousand miles off from the church whose bell was the first music I ever heard." I cannot help that: you are too near your mother's rocking-chair. "Oh," you say, "there can't be anything in that; that chair has been vacant a great while." I cannot help that; it is all the mightier for that; it is omnipotent; that vacant mother's chair. It whispers; it speaks; it weeps; it carols; it mourns; it prays; it warns; it thunders. A young man went off and broke his mother's heart, and while he was away from home his mother died, and the telegraph brought the son, and he came into the room where she lay and looked upon her face, and he cried out: "Oh, mother! mother! what your life could not do your death shall effect. This moment I give my heart to God." And he kept his promise. Another victory for the vacant chair. With reference to your mother, the words of my text were fulfilled: "Thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty."

I go on a little further, and I come to the invalid's chair. What! How long have you been sick? "Oh! I have been sick ten, twenty, thirty years." Is it possible? What a story of endurance. There are in many of the families of my congregation these invalids' chairs. The occupants of them think they are doing no good in the world; but that invalid's chair is the mighty pulpit from which they have been preaching, all these years, trust in God. The first time I preached here at Lakeside, Ohio, amid the throngs present, there was nothing that so much impressed me as the spectacle of just one face—the face of an invalid who was wheeled in on her chair. I said to her afterwards: "Madam, how long have you been prostrated?" for she was lying flat in the chair. "O!" she replied: "I have been this way fifteen years." I said: "Do you suffer very much?" "O, yes," she said: "I suffer very much; I suffer all the time; part of the time I was blind. I always suffer." "Well," I said: "can you keep your courage up?" "O yes," she said: "I am happy, very happy indeed." Her face showed it. She looked the happiest of anyone on the ground.

O! what a means of grace to the world, these invalid chairs. On that field of human suffering the grace of God gets its victory. Edward Payson the invalid, and Richard Baxter the invalid, and Robert Hall the invalid, and the ten thousand of whom the world has never heard, but of whom all heaven is cognizant. The most conspicuous thing on earth for God's eye and the eye of angels to rest on, is not a throne of earthly power, but it is the invalid's chair. O! these men and women who are always suffering but never complaining—these victims of spinal disease, and neuralgic torture, and rheumatic excruciation will answer to the roll-call of the martyrs, and rise to the martyr's throne, and will wave the martyr's palm. But when one of these invalids' chairs becomes vacant, how suggestive it is! No more bolstering up of the weary head. No more changing from side to side to get an easy position. No more use of the bandage, and the cataplasm, and the prescription. That invalid's chair may be folded up, or taken apart, or set away, but it will never lose its queenly power; it will always preach of trust in God, and cheerful submission. Suffering all ended now. With respect to that invalid the words of my text have been fulfilled: "Thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty."

I pass on, and I find one more vacant chair. It is a high chair. It's the child's chair. If that chair be occupied, I think it is the most potent chair in the house.

hold. All the chairs wait on it; all the chairs are turned toward it. It means more than David's chair at Saul's banquet. At any rate, it makes more racket. That is a strange house that can be dull with a child in it. How that child breaks up the hard worldliness of the place, and keeps you young to sixty, seventy, and eighty years of age! If you have no child of your own, adopt one; it will open heaven to your soul. It will pay its way. Its crowing in the morning will give the day a cheerful starting, and its glee at night will give the day a cheerful close. You do not like children? Then you had better stay out of heaven, for there are so many there they would fairly make you crazy! Only about five hundred millions of them! The old crusty Pharisees told the mothers to keep the children away from Christ. "You bother him," they said; "you trouble the Master." Trouble him! He has filled heaven with that kind of trouble.

A pioneer in California says that for the first year or two after his residence in Sierra Nevada county, there was not a single child in all the miles. But the Fourth of July the miners were gathered, and they were celebrating with oration, and poem, a band; and while the infant's voice was heard crying, and all the miners with swarthy men began homes on the East wives and children's hearts were thrilled with as they heard the babe cry. But the music went on, and the child cried louder and louder, and the brass band played louder and louder, trying to drown out the infantile interruption, when a swarthy miner, the tears rolling down his face, got up and shook his fist, and said: "Stop that noisy band, and give the baby a chance." Oh! there was pathos in it, as well as good cheer in it. There is nothing to arouse, and melt, and subdue the soul like a child's voice. But when it goes away from you, the high chair becomes a higher chair, and there is desolation all about you. In three-fourths of the homes of this congregation there is a vacant high chair. Somehow you never get over it. There is no one to put to bed at night; no one to ask strange questions about God and heaven. Oh, what is the use of that high chair? It is to call you higher. What a drawing upward it is to have children in heaven! And then it is such a preventive against sin. If a father is going away into sin, he leaves his living children with their mother; but if a father is going away into sin, what is he going to do with his dead children floating about him, and hovering over his every wayward step. Oh, speak out, vacant high chair, and say: "Father, come back from sin; mother, come back from worldliness. I am watching you. I am waiting for you." With respect to your child, the words of my text have been fulfilled: "Thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty."

My hearers, I have gathered up the voices of your departed friends and tried to intone them into one invitation upward. I set in array all the vacant chairs of your homes and of your social circle, and I bid them cry out this morning: "Time is short. Eternity is near. Take my Saviour. Be at peace with my God. Come up where I am. We lived together on earth, come let us live together in heaven." We answer that invitation. We come. Keep a seat for us, as Saul kept a seat for David, but that seat shall not be empty. And oh! when we are all through with this world, and we have shaken hands all around for the last time, and all our chairs in the home circle and in the outside world shall be vacant, may we be worshipping God in that place from which we shall go out no more for ever. I thank God there will be no vacant chairs in heaven. There we shall meet again and talk over our earthly heart-breaks. How much you have been through since you saw them last! On the shining shore you will talk it all over. The heartaches. The loneliness. The sleepless nights. The weeping until you had power to weep, because the and dried up. Story little shoe only again, cross-then, name down in the light. No no death. Oh, heaven! beautiful heaven! Heaven where our friends are. Heaven where we expect to be. In the East they take a cage of birds and bring it to the tomb of the dead, and then they open the door of the cage, and the birds, flying out, sing. And I would to-day bring a cage of Christian consolations to the grave of your loved ones, and I would open the door and let them fill all the air with music.

Oh, how they bound in these spirits before the throne! Some shout with gladness. Some break forth into uncontrollable weeping for joy. Some stand speechless in their shock of delight. They sing. They quiver with excessive gladness. They gaze on the temples, on the palaces, on the waters, on each other. They weave their joy into garlands, they spring it into triumphal arches, they strike in on timbrels, and then all the loved ones gather in a great circle around the throne of God—fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, sons and daughters, lovers and friends, hand to hand around about the throne of God—the circle ever widening—hand to hand, joy to joy, jubilee to jubilee, victory to victory, "until the day break and the shadows flee away. Turn thou, my beloved, and be like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains."

A SPECIAL MESSAGE.

If inspiration, in the sense in which we use the word as to the writers of the Bible, has ceased, God still speaks to those whose spiritual ears are open to the "still small voice." An instance in point is narrated by Rev. William Scott, who has been preaching in Brisbane. He was preaching in a strange town on the parable of the Ten Virgins, and when he had said all he intended, he was urged by a then unaccountable impulse to add a few words. He felt he must—that he could not sit down till he had said it, although it had no particular connection with his previous remarks. And this is what he said: "If there is a poor soul here weary of life and worn with its strain, and sorry, I would say to such a one, God Almighty loves you." During the following week, he received a letter from the minister of the church telling him that a poor seamstress, on her way to drown herself, had been attracted to enter the place of worship, and had been so impressed by the sentence uttered by Mr. Scott, that, instead of going to the river, she went back to her room to pray for the first time in many years. In the same week she gave herself to the Saviour.

A JAILER'S DILEMMA.

THE last New Jersey Legislature established a new system of dealing with criminals who have served part of their terms of imprisonment. The Board of Pardons was authorized to liberate them on parole, if the head-keeper signs a certificate that they are deserving of the extension of mercy. Under political influence the Board has consented to the release of several murderers and a number of other criminals, but has required the head-keeper to furnish certificates that they are fit and proper persons to be released from prison. The keeper declares that he has seen no evidence of a change of nature in the men while they have been under his charge, and he therefore refuses to sign the certificates. The result is that the men are still in prison though their Board. The for help. One of the men lowered a pole with a hook on the end and this being made fast in the child's clothing she was drawn up while the father waited, unharmed of the bears, until a ladder was brought by which he made the ascent. He is never likely to expose his child to precisely that kind of peril again. He knows now that he is not strong enough to hold her in such a position. It will be well, too, if it renders him careful not to expose her to moral and spiritual perils in the world and, distrusting his power to keep her, commits her to the care of him who loses none who are given to him. (John 17: 12.)

THE VALUE OF A SPECK.

An error in the accounts of a Pennsylvania firm was traced to a curious cause recently. The Philadelphia Record says that a firm engaged in the iron business struck their annual balance a few days ago. The result showed a large profit on the year's trading. But when accounts were checked over afterward, a was discovered. The clerks were again and again, but the vari-right spirit. (1. 10.)

A WONDERFUL MIRAGE.

SOME citizens of Rochester, N. Y., witnessed a beautiful phenomenon a few days ago. The Post-Express of that city says that several persons who were on the tower of the Power building shortly before noon, were struck by the beauty of a strange scene visible over Lake Ontario. They sent for some friends who came and shared with them the pleasure of watching it. It was a mirage of unusual distinctness. The lake appeared to be less than half a mile distant, and St. Michael's Church which is a mile and a half away to the northeast, seemed to be less than a quarter of a mile off. The lake was apparently only a few hundred yards from the church, and beyond the lake the shore of Canada appeared plainly in view. Along the shore a railway train, composed of sand-cars, was seen moving near a sand bank. The top of the bank was crowned with green trees, which stood out clearly and distinctly. The mirage extended from directly north to the eastward, and was visible for over an hour. The spectators were not deceived as to the character of the scene they witnessed. They were aware that it was unsubstantial but they knew that it was a reflection of another scene actually existing, but far away. It is so with the objects of the Christian's faith. He is often taunted with believing in shadows but he walks by faith, not by sight, and is sure that he will come to "a city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God." (Hebrews 11: 10.)

A BABY AMONG BEARS.

AMONG the visitors to Lincoln Park, Chicago, last week were a gentleman from Minneapolis and his wife and three-year-old daughter. They were much interested in the animals caged there and especially in the bears which are kept in a pit fifteen feet deep. The child had some cakes which she threw to the bears and was much amused at their adroitness in catching them in their open mouths. Her father was holding her over the pit that she might better see the antics of the lumbering beasts, when she gave a little jump in her delight at seeing one of them fall over backward in a vain attempt to catch a cake. It loosened her father's hold and she fell down among them. The sight of his golden-haired darling among the bears stupefied the father for a moment, but only for a moment. He put his hand on the parapet and vaulted over into the pit after her. She had fallen on the back of one of the shaggy monsters and rolled off unhurt. He snatched her from under the nose of a big bear who was examining her and called aloud made it look like been so added in the account. The therefore poorer by the value of three thousand pounds of iron than had at first appeared. For so much had that worthless fly-speck counted in their estimate of the worth of their property. The shrinkage involved by the discovery was small compared with the wealth of the firm. The day is coming, however, for them and for every man when the shrinkage will extend to all the figures by which worldly wealth is now represented. The one supreme question will be, whether Christ has been won and all other gains will be counted as of no more value than the speck on that firm's balance sheet. (Phil. 3: 8.)

A WEIRD PERFORMANCE.

A NUMBER of well-known musical people and newspaper men met in one of the parlors of the Brunswick Hotel, New York, last week in response to invitations to a musical reception. Two upright pianos were in sight but when the hour arrived at which the musical programme had been scheduled to begin, no performers had put in an appearance. At length the gentleman who acted as host pressed an electric button, and on the instant there came from one of the instruments the notes of the march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The ivory keys of the piano worked up and down as they do when a musician presses them. It was as if an invisible hand were working the keys, and the effect was weird and uncanny. But there was nothing uncanny about the performance. Within the pianos had been placed machines which worked by electricity, and by means of springs and metallic points, attached to the keys, produced the music. A heavy strip of paper perforated with holes and slots passing beneath the keys, regulated the notes. The invention belongs to an automatic piano company. It is another and somewhat unexpected development of the tendency of our time to substitute machinery for the living being. The same tendency is unhappily affecting some of our churches, which are becoming mechanical, individual members standing aloof and leaving the work to be done for them by paid choirs and societies. They forget that "God is a spirit and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." (John 4: 24.)

CHRIST AT JACOB'S WELL

S. S. Lesson for August 2nd, By Mrs. M. Baxter. John 4: 5-26. Golden Text, Rev. 22: 41.

JESUS was on a journey from Judæa into Galilee, "and he must needs pass through Samaria." There were other routes, but by the law which governed the life of Jesus, "I do always those things which please him" (John 8: 29), no other was possible to him; His Father chose his way. Coming near to the city of Sychar, he remained outside the city by Jacob's well, while his disciples went into the city to purchase provisions. Solitude was never unwelcome to the Master, and just in measure as we come to know him we learn to prize the opportunities which God gives us, of being alone. Jesus was "wearied with his journey," another reason why he should welcome solitude; but he was interrupted. "There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water."

The Heathenish Idea

that things can happen by chance could never have entered the mind of Jesus. A single hair of the head, a solitary sparrow, had their place in the ordering of his Father. Instinctively and immediately he traced his Father's hand in all which happened, and knew that he had permitted this woman to come just then to the well. And he who never gave utterance to an unprepared word introduced himself by a single request, calculated to disarm anything like opposition, "Give me to drink." His keen eye had read, before he addressed her, all the depth of unrest and dissatisfaction which fermented in that unhappy soul; and his own fatigue found rest in the uncalled for love which sought to win this unpromising subject to God and purity. He was not staggered by the retort, "How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria?" In his next word to the Samaritan woman, there is not a trace of wounded feeling, no self-pity, no sense of being hardly used. He forgot himself that he might win her. "If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is which saith to thee, give me to drink, thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water." It is little that any of us can give him; he has ever more to give us than we to give him.

The woman's conceptions were necessarily limited to the things of time and sense, she noticed that Jesus had nothing to drink with, and sought to discover his credentials and antecedents. Who was he? Was he greater than 'our father Jacob?' But one point was won, the woman's attention was gained, she was 'ac' to face, though she knew it not, with God's Messiah, "The Saviour of the world," and he patiently set himself to teach her. Every one that drinketh of this water shall thirst again, but whosoever drinketh of the water which I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water which I shall give him shall be in him a well of water, springing up unto everlasting life."

Living Water, Everlasting Life!

These things were entirely beyond this woman's horizon. These were elements of eternity in the gift of God; she was getting out of her depth, she found herself in the presence of her superior; all was real and trustworthy in that face, in that presence in which she stood. She now, in her turn, makes a request, and so commits herself. "Sir, give me this water, that I thirst not, neither come all the way hither to draw." (R. V.) She knew not what she asked, but she wanted something. God can deal with a hungry soul; it is the rich he sends empty away. (Luke 2: 53.) But he must make his own terms: if he is to answer prayer, wrong things must be set right.

Go, call thy husband, and come hither." His finger was upon the sore; with a prophetic eye, he had read her very heart, and knew the plague-spot in her life. She only said joined, "Thou hast well said I have no husband; for thou hast had five husbands and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband, this hast thou said truly," instead of defending herself or excusing herself she instantly surrendered and said, "Sir, I perceive that thou art A Prophet."

Yes; it was indeed a Prophet to whom she spoke; and as a Prophet, Jesus meets every soul who comes to him for living water. "The Lord revealeth his secret to his servants the prophets." (Amos 3: 7.) Ananias and Sapphira could not deceive Peter (Acts 5: 1-11), and still less could this woman of Samaria deceive Jesus. It was a moment of crisis; she did not attempt to escape from the eye which read her through and through; and though much had to be done, she was still in the place of the listener and the recipient.

The natural man has always resources of his own which he falls back upon, the Samaritan woman was not behindhand in this. Sinful woman as she was, she had her ideas about religion with a strong party bias; "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain, and ye say that in Jerusalem men ought to worship." The woman was a lost woman, but she could be a sectarian for all that. Many persons of impure life often imagine that their zeal for an external church is zeal for God. Jesus swept away the ground from under her feet: "Woman, believe me, the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem worship the Father. Ye worship ye know not what: we know what we worship, for salvation is of the Jews. But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him."

The Jews had a certain superiority over the Samaritans, they knew what they worshipped. But Jews and Samaritans alike were resting in the form, and God was seeking after worshippers who would worship him in spirit and in truth. In many a congregation, in many a quiet chamber, God is seeking for the rare sight—a worshipper in spirit and in truth! one who, pressing through denominations and prejudices and emotions, seeks and finds contact with the living God! "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." Worship in the spirit is a divine thing, heaven-begotten, it is not dependent on what we feel, but on what we receive of God, it is creature bowing down before, submitting to, yielding himself up to his Creator, and it is that Creator coming down to, accepting quickening filling, dwelling in his creature. It is

In "The Inner Man,"

"the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible," (1. Pet. 3: 3), strengthened with might by the Holy Ghost, that God can dwell, (Eph. 3: 16-19.) The woman of Samaria knew nothing of this; her religion consisted of an earnest partizanship for the Samaritan sect which fed all the carnal combativeness of her nature, and which in no way brought her near to God or awakened her consciousness to her life of sin!

But something in the Stranger brought to her mind the hope of Israel, the coming Messiah, and this sinful, impure woman had a conception of the Messiah which was far more just, far nearer the truth than the Galileans who wanted to make Jesus a king, or the mother of Zebedee's children (Matt. 20: 20, 21), who sought political power and government offices for her sons in a kingdom to be established in this world, "I know that Messiah cometh, which is called Christ; when he is come, he will tell us all things." There was a yearning after something real and true and holy in that sinful heart, and the Master saw it. "He shall tell us all things" revealed a hunger after heavenly truth, after the real and tangible in the things of God; there was hunger in that soul, and under all the sin, all the wickedness and unwomanliness, the eye of her in parables, he revealed himself in the most unmistakable way; "I that speak unto thee am he." And without a doubt and without a fear, this unpromising subject yielded her allegiance to her Lord, "left her waterpot, went her way into the city," and forthwith became a witness, a missionary, a preacher of her newly found Messiah!

LESSON POINTS

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

HERE cometh a woman of Samaria. These women of Samaria are always coming. They confront us everywhere. Some real or imaginary difference of condition or circumstances acts as a barrier and hence we have no dealings with them. We rather avoid them for fear that some untoward circumstances may accidentally conspire to penetrate this barrier and actually compel us to throw off this artificial reserve, and then our hearts might betray us into a brotherly interest. Poor mortals! How we try to delude ourselves that through the agency of some Home Missionary or Steward's Poor Fund, we are doing our whole duty, while we ineffectually endeavor to repress the irrepressible monitions of an accusing conscience. Come, let us confess the truth and acknowledge that we do not feel at ease concerning our manner of treating these Samaritans and let us take the matter to Jesus and ask him to give us gentleness, tenderness, love and sympathy in place of stubbornness and pride.

"Edith Willis," said Ella, as the two girls were walking leisurely home from school, one pleasant day in early Autumn, "what will the girls say, when they hear that you have invited Maggie Kelly to your party?"

Edith was silent for a moment and then raising her soft blue eyes to those of her companion, she replied:

"Ella, when Mamma told me to invite Maggie, I asked her the same question. She told me it made no difference what the girls said, who thought Maggie quite beneath them, because she was poor and wore some dresses that others had discarded; and she asked me if I would like to hear what Jesus would say. So she took down her Bible and read to me these words, 'And the King shall answer and say unto them, verily, I say unto you, inasmuch as you have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'"

God is a spirit and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth.

How many are making the mistake of their lives in worshipping God not in spirit and in truth, but from selfish motives! And yet many imagine that somehow or other God will be deceived and reward them according to their outward manifestations, rather than according to the motives of the heart.

An old Presbyterian minister was preaching before a number of his fellow ministers. He described the last great day of account, the Judgment Day, when every one would be judged, not only by his deeds, but by his motives. He represented the Judge asking "What did you preach for?"

"I preached, Lord," said one, "that I might get a good living that was left me by my father, which, if I had not entered the ministry, would have been wholly lost to me and my family."

Christ addresses him: "Stand by, thou hast thy reward."

The question is put to another: "What did you preach for?"

"Lord, I was regarded as a learned man, and I preached to keep up my reputation as an excellent orator and an ingenious preacher."

"Stand by, thou hast thy reward."

The Judge puts the question to a third: "What did you preach for?"

"Lord," said he, "I neither aimed at the great things of the world, though I was thankful for the conveniences of life which thou gavest me, nor did I preach that I might gain the character of a wit or of a scholar, but I preached in compassion to souls and to please and honor thee; my design, Lord, in preaching, was that I might win souls to thy blessed majesty."

The Judge called out: "Room, men; room angels. Let this man come and sit with me on my throne; he has owned and honored me on earth, and I will own and honor him throughout all the ages in eternity."

Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely. Richard Baxter said: "I thank God for the word 'whosoever.' If God had said there was mercy for Richard Baxter, I am so vile a sinner, I would have thought he meant some other Richard Baxter, but when he says whosoever, I know that includes me,

THE DOCTOR'S QUEST.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Aug. 2. Rev. 22: 17, "Whosoever will let him take the Water of Life freely."

STANDING before a large glass jar and eagerly examining its contents, were two men whose faces wore the thoughtful look of hard students. The room was lined on one side with books in dwarf book-cases, while on the other was a long table covered with chemical appliances and more glass jars like the one at which the two men were intently gazing. It was a room built by itself in a garden apart from the house which could be seen beyond the trees from the windows. It was the laboratory of Dr. Percival, a young physician whose studies had been continued after he commenced practice in his native town.

"What is your aim in all these experiments, Percival?" asked the physician's friend, turning away from the bottle and seating himself on the edge of the table. He was Dr. Fielding, the clergyman of the parish and the only man in the town who was admitted to the laboratory. "What is it you are trying to discover?"

"I am almost ashamed to tell you, Fielding," Dr. Percival replied. "I would not tell you if you were a physician or a lawyer, lest you should think me demented, and send me to an asylum. Being a clergyman, you are harmless and I will trust you. I have found in my practice the truth of a theory urged by a brilliant genius I met in Germany. It is, that a special constitution may recover health, whatever may be the disease by which it is assailed, if a special remedy be administered. Better than fighting the disease is to discover what is the general need of the patient and to supply that need. Nature will attend to the disease herself, if she obtains what she requires to recruit her energies. She needs different help with different men, but always the same help with the same man."

"Yes," said the clergyman, "I have heard of that theory, but I thought it was exploded."

"It is rejected by the leaders of the profession, but I am convinced there is a basis of truth in it. Now for the next step. Suppose that there is some remedy which would apply to all the various cases. May not all these special remedies which suit special cases have a common principle? Van Helmont sought it in water, believing that it contained the vital principle. What if that secret can be discovered? There is immortal fame for the discoverer, and indefinite prolongation of life to his fellow-men."

"Pshaw! the old dream of the elixir of life. I am surprised at a man of your intelligence spending your time on such a will-of-the-wisp."

"I knew you would be, but I must go on. It will be discovered yet."

"Never," said the clergyman, solemnly. "You always repulse my efforts, Percival, but I would fain point you to what is no chimera, but a glorious reality, and the very thing you seek—the water of life. Christ offered it to all who came to him and the promise still holds good. Whosoever will may take of it freely."

"Now you are talking nonsense. You are talking of life beyond the grave. That, there may, or may not be. I know not and care not. What I am seeking is life here. Endless life! Life such as we enjoy on a beautiful morning like this, which we are wasting in-doors. Come, let us take a brisk walk and enjoy it, while we may. Pity that the opportunity is so short."

The two men went out together, both sad and depressed until the exhilarating morning air and exercise quickened their pulses and raised their spirits. It was the last walk they had together, for the clergyman was summoned away later in the day to the death-bed of his brother who was in Europe. He consented to take up the work his brother's death had left unfinished and he did not return to America for many years. The next time that he and Dr. Percival met was in an old University town on the other side of the Atlantic. Then the clergyman was shocked at his friend's changed appearance.

"I have seen much trouble," Dr. Percival said. "I am very poor; I am despised as an empiric; money and fame are both gone. Worse than that, death has robbed me of my dear wife and my precious child. I have no one left now of all my loved ones. Candidly, Fielding, I scarcely care to live. If I had within my power that water of life I sought so ardently, I would not take it. I have come to ask you to tell me of that other water of life you used to talk of and how I may obtain it. All my hope is fixed on that. Can I get it?"

"Whosoever will," said the clergyman,

STAGES IN THE ADVENT.

Christ to Come first in the Air to Summon his Waiting People and Afterward to the Earth to Punish his Enemies.

BY HENRY MADISON.

IN our Lord's advent there will be three stages or periods of time as this stupendous work of his will cover an interval of one thousand years or more. In the first stage of the advent he comes to claim his bride, the first-fruits as they are sometimes called. He comes to take her in to the marriage supper of the Lamb, for the Apostle says in Rev. 19: 6-9: "And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunders, saying, Alleluia: for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth, let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready, and to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white: for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints."

This First Appearing

of the Lord will be invisible to the unbelieving portion of the world, even as the Transfiguration on the Mount was (Matt. 17: 1, 2). It will also be instantaneous; this we learn from what he said unto his disciples in Matt. 24: "As the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. Then shall two be in the field: the one shall be taken and the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill: the one shall be taken and the other left. Watch therefore: for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come?" The five wise virgins or first-fruits represent the bride; they and they only, go into the marriage, for they are watching, they are ready, as it is written in Matt. 25: 10, "And while they (the five foolish virgins) went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut. Afterward came also the other virgins, saying Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily, I say unto you, I know you not." They could not perish, although they were foolish ones, but they must be punished, so they were shut out from the earlier entrance into the marriage supper of the Lamb, and had to pass through the great tribulation and be murdered by the beast.

Yes, we must watch and pray, if we want to escape the great tribulation: for only those who are ready will be allowed to go into the marriage supper of the Lamb. Therefore, Jesus said unto his disciples in Mark 13: 37, when referring to this great tribulation, "What I say unto you, I say unto all Watch." This tribulation will be a fearful one, for Jesus says in Matt. 24: 21, 22, "Then shall be great tribulation such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved: but for the elect's (the Jew's) sake, those days shall be shortened."

In Zechariah 13: 8, 9 we learn that two-thirds of the Jews will perish during

The Great Tribulation,

and if the time (it will last three and one-half years) was not shortened there will be no flesh saved. I read in Zechariah 13, "And it shall come to pass, that in all the land, saith the Lord, two parts therein shall be cut off and die; but the third shall be left therein. And I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined."

It will indeed be Jacob's day of trouble for the devil will energize the beast, who will be a man, and he will make war with the saints (the Jews) and try to exterminate them! This beast as he is called, is Antichrist, and Satan will enable him to work miracles and do great wonders, so that he may deceive many, and induce them to worship him as God. "And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed. And he causes all both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or on their foreheads; and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name."

This is Jacob's day of trouble, this is their punishment for rejecting Christ when he came in the flesh. He said unto them when he was on this earth, "I (Christ), am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive" (John 5: 43). They would not receive Jesus when he came, but they will receive Antichrist when he comes. And he will make a covenant of seven years with them as it is written in Daniel 9: 27. "And he (the beast) shall confirm the covenant with many for one week (a prophetic week means seven years); and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even unto the consummation." (That is to say he will cause his image to be put into the holy place and compel them to worship the image under penalty of death) until Christ comes and casts him and the false prophet into the lake of fire.

There will be thousands of others destroyed by the beast as well as the Jews for I read in Revelation 13: 7, "And power was given him over all kindreds and tongues and nations." The firstfruits, all those who are watching, will escape this great tribulation, but all careless Christians will have to go through it, therefore Jesus says, "What I say unto you, I say unto all, watch." (Mark 13: 37). "Watch ye therefore and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man" (Luke 21: 36).

Second Stage.

We now come to the end of the great tribulation when "Christ shall appear with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them, of all their ungodly deeds, which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him," (Jude 14, 15.)

This coming of the Lord is very different to the first stage in his Advent, for that was invisible and instantaneous. It was as sudden and quick as the lightning, whereas the second stage of the Advent will be visible to the whole universe. "For then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven." "And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. And the remnant were slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse, which sword proceeded out of his mouth, and all the fowls were filled with their flesh."

This is the day of the Lord, that dreadful day, "when he shall come and smite the nations: and rule them with a rod of iron." This is the day, when "he will tread the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God." "And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men and every bondman, and every freeman, will hide themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains: and say to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand." (Rev. 6: 15-17).

In Judea only one-third of the Jews will be able to stand before the Son of Man when he cometh to judge the nations, and to tread the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. This one-third will have had to pass through the great tribulation and have been refined in the furnace as silver is refined, for the fullness of the Gentiles will have come in, and their day of grace will have passed away for ever.

If you will not accept salvation now during your day of grace before the Lord comes to destroy the beast and to set up his kingdom in Palestine, there will be no way of escape for you, for you will be given up to a fearful delusion so that you will believe a lie, and you will fall down and worship the beast in order to save your miserable lives: for it is written in Rev. 14: 9-11, "And the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation."

This day is spoken of in Scripture, as Jacob's day of trouble, and after it is over the kingdom of heaven is established upon earth. This kingdom will be an earthly one, and it is called the kingdom of heaven for Jesus will be the king and he will reign in Jerusalem, for is it not written in Zech. 14: 3-4, "Then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle. And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives which is before Jerusalem on the east, and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west."

FALL OF THE EMPIRE.

Napoleon in Exile.*

ON the whole, the time which Napoleon passed at Elba was not unhappy. After so many emotions he needed some repose. A delightful climate, the sea-views, the language of the people, which was his mother tongue, the battalions of the Old Guard, the fanatical devotion of his attendants, who were ready to shed the last drop of their blood for him—all this was not without charm. Napoleon regarded himself as spending the season at Elba, so to say, and had a presentiment that some day or other he would leave it. Moreover he experienced a delicious pleasure in watching the mistakes the Bourbons were making; and to read the French journals gave him infinite joy. It was all very well for him to say, as he sometimes did, that as a philosopher weaned from human grandeur, he wished to live hereafter like a justice of the peace in an English shire. At bottom he was tired neither of war nor glory; and the ambitious sovereign of the Island of Elba, in his pretended retreat, resembled neither Diolecion in the gardens of Salomo, nor Charles V. in the convent of St. Just.

Napoleon's Return.

On Saturday, February 25, 1815, the Island of Elba presented its customary aspect. No one had as yet the least notion of the resolution Napoleon was about to take. Nothing is talked of at Porto Ferajo but the ball to be given in the evening by the beautiful princess Pauline Borghese, the Emperor's sister. This fete is very brilliant. All the officers are present as well as the notabilities of the Island and some visiting foreigners. Napoleon is very gay; his easy and genial conversation betrays no preoccupation. He stays until a late hour and then takes Generals Bertrand and Drouot home with him to tell them his news. He says: "We will start to-morrow." Bertrand and Drouot kept the secret faithfully. The Emperor held his levee as usual the next morning and afterward was present at the parade and at church. Up to four in the afternoon the troops knew nothing. The roll of the drums summoned them to dinner; and when that was over they were ordered to repair to the wharf with their arms and baggage. At five the signal for embarkation was given, and some four hundred of the Guard with their officers went on board the brig Inconstant, which carried twenty-six guns. The remainder of the troops amounting to about seven hundred embarked on the schooner Caroline and five other small vessels. The wharf was full of people. The inhabitants bade an affectionate adieu to the soldiers whom they esteemed and loved. Napoleon's mother and the Princess Pauline were at the chateau windows. Napoleon appeared and was cheered, his countenance meanwhile beaming with joy and confidence. He went on board the Inconstant and the flotilla got under sail with a south wind blowing. Night fell; by daylight they hope to have rounded Capraja and to be beyond the French and English cruisers which operate from that side.

Napoleon Recognized.

The solemn moment is approaching. As yet the Emperor had met no troops to bar his passage. The white flag and the tricolor have

*From Marie Louise, the Island of Elba and the Hundred Days. By Imbert de Saint Amand. Translated by Elizabeth Gilbert Martin. This volume which belongs to the charming series of works on the famous women of the French Court is of surpassing interest, not so much on account of the weak woman whose name it bears, as because of the light it sheds on the last days Napoleon spent on European soil. His emotions before the battle of Waterloo, the description of the battle itself, and the struggle he fought to hold his position on the throne after his defeat are all described with a graphic and dramatic pen. not found themselves face to face. Not a soldier belonging to the armies of Louis XVIII. has joined the little phalanx from the Island of Elba. No one can assure the Emperor that they will not fire on him. Even among the Bonapartists there are a good many officers who are unwilling to violate the oath so recently taken to the King. A terrible conflict goes on in their hearts between the memory of past glories and the sentiment of present discipline. If an officer orders a volley, will the soldiers obey? The whole question is there. Napoleon, daring as he is, and accustomed to risk all for all, has never, in his whole adventurous career, engaged in a more doubtful game. A little longer, and what will he be? A triumphant Caesar, saluted by his legions, or a corpse riddled with balls?

About one o'clock in the afternoon some Polish lancers, who had been sent ahead to see how the land lay, try to open a parley with the battalion of the 5th Line. Commandant Lessard assures them that if they renew the attempt he will fire on them.

Napoleon draws near. He descends from his horse. At the sides of the road mute and attentive peasants watch the scene about to take place. The two battalions are not more than a pistol-shot apart. The silence is absolute: profound emotion almost stops the breath.

Napoleon goes forward all alone. His legendary profile defines itself against the sky. "Present arms!" commands the head of the royal battalion. The guns are revelled at the man of Austerlitz, who, impassible, continues slowly to advance. Arrived in front of the battalion, he raises his hand to his cap and salutes; then, in a strong voice:

"Soldiers of the 5th," he cries, do you recognize me?"

"Yes, yes," replies some one.

Then he adds: "Soldiers, behold your general: behold your Emperor. Let any one who wishes to kill him, fire!"

At these words the soldiers, instead of firing, throw themselves down on their knees. They kiss Napoleon's hands; they call him father; they utter frenzied acclamations. Their shakos wave from the tips of their sabres and bayonets. "Everything is over," said Napoleon to Bertrand and Drouot, "In ten days we shall be at the Tuileries."

Before Waterloo.

Napoleon turning back on the English army at Quatre-Bras, Wellington evacuated the position and retired to Mont-Saint-Jean, near Waterloo. The forest of Toignes extends behind Mont-Saint-Jean. The English general drew up against it. The hilly character of the ground, which nature has fortified, permitted him to maintain a formidable defence. The troops on both sides were worn out with fatigue. The temperature betokened a storm, and the air was heavy, with thirty degrees of heat. In the afternoon of June 17th, the sky, which had been covered by thick clouds, discharged them in torrents of water. At the end of a few minutes the whole region was changed into a hopeless marsh. The rain kept on all day, all night, all the next morning. A solemn and terrible night was that of June 17-18, which has been called "The Vigil of Waterloo." The two armies face each other in that feverish expectation which precedes decisive battles. No shelter against the drenching rain. They sink fast in mud above their knees. No moon, no stars. The darkness is profound, impenetrable. The men lose themselves in quickest hedges. They stumble against each other and fall head over heels down ravines. Curses mingle with the roaring of the wind. The French army believed itself already betrayed.

What must be passing in Napoleon's heart? What is he going to risk, this great gamester, on his final throw? More than his life; his crown and his liberty: more than his crown and his liberty; the fortune of France,

NEGLECT OF OUR OWN AFFAIRS.

THE writer of the Canticles mourns, "They have made me the keeper of vineyards, but my own vineyard have I not kept." So there are Christians now who spend their chief time in looking after others while their own vineyard goes to waste. They are raising very fine grapes on the other side of the fence, but the property does not belong to them nor the grapes. We know Christians who are lean as skeletons in religious experience, who are running hither and thither looking after Sunday Schools, calling conventions, attending meetings. They are in everlasting sweat about other people, but have no anxiety about themselves. They cut the wool off somebody else's sheep, and spin it on somebody else's wheel, and weave it in somebody else's loom for somebody else's back. Meanwhile their own souls are shivering to death. So there are women busy collecting money for benevolent institutions and managing public affairs, while their own children go with faces unwashed and stockings undarned, and minds uneducated, and souls unsaved. Busy everywhere but in their own vineyard.

Now, the first thing for one to do is, to take care of his or her own heart. How was it that the old saints, with less opportunity than we have, were better men? They had more time for contemplation. Christians now seldom sit down to think. It is drive, and push, and pull. Their only quiet time is when they are on an express train going at thirty-five miles an hour, watch in hand, wondering why they don't go forty. Just before communion they feel called upon for especial self-examination, and so take the ten minutes in which they are walking to church to think what miserable offenders they have been. Now you have no right to give so much time to your neighbors' crops that you let your own suffer. Besides, if our own piety be thin, our work will be inefficient. If we have been much with Christ, and have deep personal experiences, we will do more good in one month than with a shallow experience we could do in ten years. One-half the Christian effort of to-day is mere gab. The world sees straight through it, while some man who says but little feels much, gets hold of the heart of an audience, and rouses, and melts, and subdues, and agonizes it at will. Christians seeking no advancement in personal piety are often very demonstrative, as steamboats at the wharf blowing off steam are so noisy you cannot hear yourself speak. A man of deep religious experiences is always effective. We care not how poor his ance, or how awkward his gestures, or how shabby his clothes. By taking good care of our vineyard, we learn how to help others in the care of their vineyard. If you cannot raise grapes in your garden, you cannot raise them in mine.

CORRECT SPEECH.

IT is amazing how many of the best Christian laymen are so deficient in grammatical accuracy as to excite the mirthfulness of the young people. We speak not for ourselves. We sometimes positively enjoy the brawny smashing of the English language by some old Christian man who never saw a grammar in all his life, but whose heart is so full of holiness that he can sway a religious meeting and carry everything before him. But we consider it a positive shame, when a grammar will cost only fifty cents, and one hour's study a day for one year would make an ordinary mind capable of understanding the structure of our English language, that so many of our young men and middle-aged men go blundering through their prayers and exhortations, thus depleting their influence for good by one-half. The little children of this day are having so many opportunities of perfecting themselves in the study of grammar, that when in our religious assemblages they hear men distorting and outraging the language at every step, putting "them" for "those," and "is" for "are," and "I seen" for "I saw," and "I done it" for "I did it," and "they was," for "they were," the young people turn their heads away and say within themselves: "That man cannot teach me anything, for I know more than he does now." It would be well for ministers of the Gospel to purchase fifty or a hundred English grammars and distribute them among those who take part in religious service. If the pastor has the confidence of the people they would gladly take his suggestion. Laymen go on from year to year with this little "dead fly in the ointment" of their public services, because the fly has never been pointed out to them.

HEALTHFUL RECREATIONS.

WE might make our homes a hundredfold more attractive than they are. You will never keep your boy away from outside dissipation until you make your domestic circle brighter than any other place he can find. Do not sit glum and with half-condemnatory look amid the sportfulness of your children. You were young once yourself. Let your children be young while they may.

Do not put on a sort of supernatural gravity, as though you never liked sportfulness. You liked it just as much as your children do. Some of you were full of mischief you have never indicated to your children or your grandchildren, and you never got up in the morning until you were pulled out of bed! Do not stand before your children pretending to be specimens of immaculate goodness. Do not, because your eyesight is dim and your ankles stiff, frown upon the sportfulness which shows itself in the first lustre of the eye and in the bounding foot of robust health. Do not sit with the rheumatism wondering how the children can go on so. Thank God that they are so light of spirit, that their laughter is so free, that their spirits are so radiant. Trouble comes soon enough to them. Dark days will come soon enough to them, and heart-breaks and desolation and bereavement will come soon enough. Do not try to forestall it. Do not try to anticipate it. When the clouds come on the sky it is time enough to get out the reef-tackle.

Introduce into your parlors those innocent games which are the invention of our own day, and those that have come down from other days: chess and charades and battledore and tableaux and calisthenics and scores of others that young people can suggest and those that are suggested to you, many of them having on them not one taint of iniquity. And then you will want to take your family out with you sometimes. Beware, O man, if you never take your family with you to those places where you go for amusement. It is always a good sign when I see families going together to places of amusement.

I go further and commend to you field-sports. I hail the croquet ground, and the sportman's gun and the fisherman's rod, and archery and lawn tennis, and scores of other amusements belonging to the fields. The fact is, there is something so unhealthy in city life that when the taker of the census says there are in the city four hundred thousand people, there are only two hundred thousand, since it generally takes about two men to amount to one man, there is something so unnerving, so exhausting in our metropolitan life. We want more fresh air, more sunshine.

MODERN JONAHS.

UNBELIEVERS have often told us that the story of the prophet swallowed by a great fish was an absurdity. They say that so long in the stomach of the monster, the minister would have been digested. We have no difficulty in this matter. Jonah was a most unwilling guest of the whale. He wanted to get out. However much he may have liked fish, he did not want it three times a day and all the time. So he kept up a fidget, and a struggle, and a turning-over, and he gave the whale no time to assimilate him. The man knew that if he was ever to get out he must be in perpetual motion. We know men that are so lethargic they would have given the matter up, and lain down so quietly that in a few hours they would have gone into flukes and fish-bone, blow-holes and blubber. Now we see men all around us who have been swallowed by monstrous misfortunes. Some of them sit down on a piece of whale-bone and give up. They say: "No use! I will never get back my money, or restore my good name, or recover my health." They float out to sea, and are never again heard of. Others, the moment they go down the throat of some great trouble, begin to plan for egress. They make rapid estimate of the length of the vertebrate, and come to the conclusion how far they are in. They dig up enough spermaceti out of the darkness to make a light, and keep turning this way and that, till the first you know they are out. Determination to get well has much to do with recovered invalidism. Firm will to defeat bankruptcy, decides financial deliverance. Never surrender to misfortune or discouragement. You can, if you are spry enough, make it as uncomfortable for the whale as the whale can make it uncomfortable for you. There will be some place where you can brace your foot against his ribs, and some long upper tooth around which you may take hold, and he will be as glad to get rid of you for a tenant, as you are to get rid of him for a landlord. There is a way out, if you are determined to find it. All our sympathies are with the plaintiff, in the suit of Jonah versus Leviathan.

LEARNED SCEPTICS.

AFTER all, Christianity cannot be a very weak and pusillanimous affair when so many of our strong rulers are not ashamed to advocate it. We are on the way to the time when kings shall be nursing fathers and queens nursing mothers to the church. We shall after a while have the best brain enlisted on our side, and the day will come when a man's sanity will be doubted if he questions the truthfulness of Christ's religion. We do not want sceptics any longer to pat us patronizingly on the back, saying, "Poor deluded souls! They mean well enough!" We do not want the fire-fly born in the swamp to lecture the full harvest-moon on the subject of optics. There are enough men of brain and official position on our side to make it respectable. Indeed, we suspect that if by post mortem examination the head of the learned sceptic was explored, it would be found that there is a soft spot somewhere in it, into which his egotism had soaked, leaving dampness and mold to gather. A man who, amid all the accumulated evidences of the ages, can doubt the existence of God, is mentally deficient somewhere. He may be supremely talented in other respects, but he is lacking in that department.

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. Henry M. Bissell, the famous missionary, is dead. He was in his seventieth year and has been laboring in India for more than forty years. One of his sons is a missionary in the Sandwich Islands and his daughter is a missionary in India.

The Congregational institution known as Chicago Theological Seminary, reports a large accession of students. It has now one hundred and sixty-seven on its books and its faculty numbers fourteen. Twelve years ago it had forty students and six professors.

Rev. John M. Macaulay, S. T. D., a well-known New York minister of the Reformed Church died on July 4, in his seventy-eighth year. The church of which he was pastor was the one which in 1632 built the first house of worship ever erected in New York City. Dr. Macaulay was pastor of it from 1838 to 1862. Subsequently he lived abroad for seven years and later he resided at Woodside, N. J., preaching for a small church there which has thriven under his care.

Mr. George W. Wheeler of the Central Union Mission, Washington, D. C., desires to acknowledge the receipt of the following sums sent him for the support of Mr. J. McLain Brown's work as a missionary in Tokyo, Japan, a sketch of which appeared in a recent number of this journal: Mrs. K. K. Centerville, $1; E. Lobdell, $1; Mrs. Libbie Townsend, $2; A. S. Stewart, $2; Mrs. Annie E. Wicks, $5; Elizabeth Hunter, $2; W. Thompson Tell, $3; Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Close, $5; Japan Mission Circle, Morristown, N. J., $5.15; M. E. MacKay, $5.

The great International Congregational Council opened in London, July 14. On the previous day, the American delegates received an enthusiastic welcome at a public breakfast. Dr. Dale's opening address was on the Divine Life in Man. Business sessions have been held every day, and public meetings in the evening. Among the most prominent American speakers, are Dr. A. E. Dunning and Dr. N. Boynton, of Boston; Dr. Cyrus Northrop, of Minnesota; Dr. Gooch, of Chicago; Dr. Washington Gladden, of Columbus, O.; Dr. J. C. McLean, of Oakland, Cal. and Prof. L. G. Stearns, of Bangor, Me.

Mr. James H. Cannon, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Evangelist has had a most successful time of service at the Allen St. Memorial Church, New York, of which Rev. William Hamilton is pastor. During the three weeks of the services no less than one hundred and fifty persons were led to seek the Saviour. Mr. Cannon had the help of several students from Yale, Princeton and Wesleyan Colleges. The Emory Praying Band of Jersey City, rendered efficient service. On Sunday last Mr. Cannon conducted the evening service at Asbury M. E. Church in the absence of Dr. J. S. Stone.

Another edition of Dr. Josiah Strong's valuable work entitled Our Country has been issued. This is the one hundred and fortieth thousand that has been called for by the public. It is printed from new plates and contains a new chapter on Religion in the Public Schools. We are glad there is so large a demand for the book as it contains a mass of information which every pastor and Christian worker ought to have. Persons who belong to neither class would do well to read it, too, for it might induce them to enter a field which now, as in the Lord's time, is white to harvest and in which the laborers are few.

St. John's Guild, of New York, has issued its usual appeal for funds to carry on its beneficent work among the poor of the city. Already 30,000 tickets of admission to the Floating and Sea-side Hospitals, have been distributed this season among the Dispensaries and Hospitals and private physicians of the city, and many more could be used if funds were forthcoming. This Guild has been the means of saving the lives of many sick children and mothers in former years, and it hopes this year to extend its work still further. It deserves the hearty support of Christians of all denominations. Subscriptions may be sent to Mr.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

The Ohio Convention—Fatal Storm—A Noble Missionary—Jewels for the Master—The Crops—Foreign and General Notes.

FROM a dozen states comes the news of disaster by storm during the week. In Bergen County, N. J., dwellings were struck and barns fired by thunderbolts. Along the Hudson River, railroad depots, cottages and farm-houses were damaged. In New Hampshire, Connecticut, Maine, Missouri, Iowa and Kansas, storms, accompanied by high gales, did great damage to the crops. In some sections, trees were uprooted, houses unroofed and live stock killed. John Dillard was instantly killed and his wife fatally injured at Sedalia, Kansas. A singular freak of the lightning was noted near Lewiston, Me., where a man named Webster had the soles of his shoes torn off, but escaped uninjured. A cyclone swept over West Superior, Wis., blowing down many buildings, among others a large structure in course of erection. Fifty men were in the building at the time, and five were killed outright and all the others more or less injured. The storm was preceded by a dead calm, which was followed by an outburst sudden and furious.

The Indian Troubles.

EVER since the opening of Spring, there has been trouble among the restless Navajoes, of Arizona. They have raided the stock-ranches and warned the herders to leave. Their neighbors, the Moquis, encouraged by their example, a few weeks ago became so warlike that troops were sent to suppress them and the leaders were arrested and imprisoned at Fort Wingate. But the Navajoes are much stronger than the Moquis, and can put from 3,000 to 4,000 warriors in the field. They are well armed and have been demoralized by liquor which has been sold to the tribe in large quantities by traders and gold-hunters, the latter trying to gain permission to dig in the Carisso mountains, which are reported to be rich in gold deposits. The Navajoes are the most independent of all the tribes and, being themselves a race of cattlemen, they resent the settlement of stock-raisers in that part of the Indian country. The latest news is that they are determined to resist the arrest by government troops or the state authorities of any Indians concerned in the recent raids. All Indians arriving at government posts are being disarmed as further trouble is expected.

A Noble Foreign Missionary.

LAST week THE CHRISTIAN HERALD told of the and conversion life-work of Tell Sono, a Japanese lady of high-caste family, who is about to start for her native land with the purpose of establishing mission schools in Tokio. To-day we give the portrait of another noble Japanese woman, Miss Koto House, who, since coming to the United States, has been converted to Christianity and naturalized as a citizen. Koto is the daughter of a Samurai or high official in the service of the first daimio of the Empire, and was born at Nagoya about twenty-two years ago. Her father was at one time a lord of five cities, but several years ago he lost his estates which had been in the family twelve hundred years. Miss Koto was adopted in childhood by an American, and brought to this country ten years ago, afterward returning to Japan, where she secured a large house in the suburbs of Tokio and opened a school for young girls. This school she has since maintained. She founded the first woman's club in Japan for providing the sick and poor with clothing. Since returning to this country, she has been more than ever active in schemes for the education and moral elevation of her countrywomen at home.

Ohio's Midsummer Battle.

A long political fight has just closed in Ohio, ending in the renomination of Hon. James B. Campbell by the Democrats for Governor. There was little opposition in the Convention his rivals having apparently exhausted their strength. Should Gov. Campbell succeed in defeating Major McKinley, it is believed that he will then be in line as a Presidential possibility. The campaign will no doubt be one of unusual vigor and is regarded as national in aspect rather than local, since national issues depend upon the result. Governor Campbell, whose portrait is given in this column, was born in Middletown, Ohio, in 1843 and served during the war in the Union army. He was a member of the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses.

Jefferson Davis' Remains.

THE widow of the late Jefferson Davis has sent a letter to the Committee of the Richmond Chamber of Commerce, in which she yields her husband's mortal remains to the care of Virginia, where, she declares, "they will rest among his friends who stood firm in defeat as they did in the day of the Confederate States' existence." She prefers Richmond as the place of interment. It is proposed to erect a mausoleum on the grounds of the Davis mansion, on Twelfth and Clay Streets, Richmond, in which the remains will be deposited.

Pushing the World's Fair.

THE Foreign Committee of our World's Fair Commission is now in England for the purpose of presenting to the British government the plans and details of the Exposition, and enlisting the support of foreign manufacturers in the movement. The members have been handsomely entertained in London and have already met the English Commission appointed to prepare the national exhibit at Chicago. The Lord Mayor will next week give them a luncheon, at which they will meet the leading merchants of London. There is now a prospect that commercial interest, awakened by the visit, may call for a much finer exhibit on the part of England than at first contemplated.

Gave up their Jewels.

HISTORY tells us that the patriotic matrons and maidens of ancient Rome, flung their gems and golden necklaces into the treasury at a time when war was pressing heavily on the resources of that country. An equally spontaneous but far nobler sacrifice was made at the Christian Alliance gathering at Round Lake, N. Y., a few days ago. It was the closing day of the session and a large audience had gathered in the great auditorium where the Rev. A. B. Simpson of the Gospel Tabernacle, New York, President of the Alliance, made an eloquent appeal for consecration to the work of the Lord, and especially for aid in supporting the missions established by the Alliance in the slums of the great cities and other unholy places. His call for $1,000 to support these missions met with a remarkable response. He had asked them to "give of their pride" and "of the adornments of their perishing bodies," when Miss Louise Shepard, a well-known young lady of New York and formerly a leader in fashionable society, but now a devoted worker in the Alliance, stepped up to the platform. She drew three glittering diamond rings off her fingers, and placed them on the desk, saying, "I have no further use for them; they are useless anyway. Let their value be devoted to the Master." To these gems she added $250 in cash. Her example proved infectious and Col. Burkhardt of Kentucky, came forward and stripping off his gold watch and chain, deposited them alongside of the rings. Men and women crowded each other in their anxiety to add to the glowing pile of costly baubles, some even surrendering their wedding and engagement rings, others their watches, still others taking the diamond ornaments from neck or hair and some putting upon the pile crisp $100 bills. Miss Shepard, astounded at the generous outburst that had followed her act, could only weep. It was an affecting scene, and when the Rev. Mr. Simpson announced that over $1,500 had been raised and no more was needed, those present felt that the Spirit had stirred the audience to generous impulses.

The Partition of the "Dark Continent."

RATHER than involve both countries in war and sacrifice lives needlessly, England and Portugal have come to the conclusion to arbitrate their rival claims to the African territory now in dispute. The present proposition is that England shall purchase for eight millions sterling, the Portuguese possessions in Africa, in the same manner as she bought the control of the Suez Canal during the Disraeli regime. The very fact of such a proposition being entertained by the Marquis of Salisbury, the English Premier, would seem to indicate that Portugal holds indisputable evidence of the priority of its territorial claim.

Old World Doings.

France's great national holiday, commemorating the fall of the Bastille, was duly celebrated throughout the Republic by processions, speeches and other patriotic displays. President Carnot decorated three Americans, Mr. Van Bergen, Dr. Nachtel and Mr. Schweitzer, with the cross of the Legion of Honor in recognition of the day.—Paris has been harrowed by the rumored assassination of President Carnot, which fortunately proved untrue, although there was some reason for the alarm. While the President was attending the opening of a new thoroughfare, the Avenue de la Republique, a wild-looking man rushed through the crowd and fired a pistol point-blank at him, shouting as he did so: "I'll prove there are more Bastilles to be demolished." The President was unhurt and the lunatic was arrested.—Emperor William has bidden his British relatives farewell and returned to Germany, having first paid a brief visit to Norway.—A Commercial Treaty between Germany and Russia is now talked of.

A Crisis Coming in Chili.

THERE is every indication that the end of the long war in Chili is at hand. A large army of Congressionals under the command of Colonel Canto, is said to be marching upon Santiago to engage the force of Balmacedists under Gen. Velasquez, the leader of the Dictator's armies. Colonel Canto, the commander-in-chief of the Congress army, although young, is a veteran in war. He has distinguished himself in many skirmishes and several important engagements and is credited with being the only commander who is able to cope with the wily Velasquez. There are many conflicting rumors about the condition of the insurgent army, one being that the troops are half-starved and rebellious. Thus far, the foreign element in Chili has favored the Congress cause. A Congress iron-clad, the Magellanes, engaged several government vessels recently and defeated them at a point off the coast, south of Iquique.

Fanaticism in Mexico.

A DISGRACEFUL scene occurred at the laying of the corner-stone of a Methodist Church in Durango, Mexico, on the 5th inst. The American Consul, the Rev. S. S. Kilgore, and the Rev. R. C. Elliott were present, the two latter officiating. Several Catholic priests were among the crowd that attended. While a hymn was being sung, some one in the crowd threw a stone and instantly the peasantry filled the air with similar missiles. Several of the Americans were hit. Dr. Kilgore faced the mob and made an appeal for liberty of worship, but he was struck on the face by a pebble and a moment later was knocked insensible by a boulder of rock. The police then dispersed the crowd but no arrests were made. The American residents of Durango have decided to call upon their government for protection.

THE WAY AND THE WALK.

"Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them."
Ephesians 2:9, 10.

I SHALL call your attention to the near neighbourhood of these two phrases, "Not of works," and "Created in Christ Jesus unto good works." The text reads with a singular sound; for it seems strange to the ear that good works should be negated as the cause of salvation, and then should be spoken of as the great end of it. You may put it down among what the Puritans called "Orthodox Paradoxes," if you please; though it is hardly so difficult a matter as to deserve the name.

Now, there is a contention always going on about the doctrine of good works: and instead of taking one side or the other, we shall try to see whether there really is anything to quarrel over if we keep to the Scriptures. We insist upon it, with all our might, that salvation is "not of works, lest any man should boast." But, on the other hand, we freely admit, and earnestly teach, that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord." Where there are no good works, there is no indwelling of the Spirit of God. The faith which does not produce good works is not saving faith: it is not faith at all in the Scriptural sense. I have taken these two points, to bring them forward for the help and comfort of beginners.

I. First, then,

The Way

of salvation is negatively described as "Not of works." To this many take exception; but that we cannot help; the Scripture is plain enough. My text would be, to such persons, very objectionable—"Not of works." They are ready to rail at Paul for speaking thus evangelically. They hate the doctrine of salvation all of gift, and not in the least of merit—a doctrine which we love. We preach salvation "not of works"; we repeat the teaching again and again, and mean to repeat it continually, till we die. Salvation is of the Lord's mercy, and not by works of the law.

If we were to preach to sinners, dead in trespasses and sins, that salvation would be by their own works, we should be setting aside the way of salvation by grace.

There Cannot be Two Ways

of salvation for the same people. If we take to the one, we practically deny the other. It cannot be questioned that a guilty man, if saved at all, must be saved through the mercy of God. If, then, I teach men that they can be saved by works, I have practically told them that salvation by grace is a myth, a mistake, a mischievous error. Justification by religious performances, and meritorious deeds, is nothing better than the old Pharisaism with a Christian name stuck upon it. It is not worth revealing by the Spirit of God, for it is to be seen by the light of man's own candle.

Next, to preach the way of salvation by works is to propose to men a way in which they have already failed. If you are to be saved by works, you must begin very early: you must begin before you sin, since one sin decides the matter. But already you have commenced to break the law of God. I am not addressing persons who have yet to start upon the way, for they have started already.

You are a good way on the road, one way or other; and since you began in the way of works, what a failure you have made of it already! Is there anyone here who can claim that he is already saved by works, as far as he has gone? Has anyone among you been without sin? Look at your lives; examine your consciences; observe your words, your thoughts, your imaginations, your motives; for all these come into the account. Is there a man here that doeth good, and sinneth not?

And, next, I think it will be admitted by all, that the way of salvation by good works would be self-evidently unsuitable to a considerable number. I will take a case. I am sent for on an emergency, and it is the dead of night. A man is dying, smitten suddenly by the death-blast. I go to his bedside, as requested. Consciousness remains; but he is evidently in mortal agony. He has lived an ungodly life, and he is about to die. I am asked to speak to him.

A Word That May Bless Him.

Shall I tell him that he can only be saved by good works? Where is the time for works? Where is the possibility of them? Almost while I am speaking, his life is struggling to escape him. He looks at me in the agony of his soul, and he stammers out, "What must I do to be saved?" Shall I read to him the moral law? Shall I expound to him the Ten Commandments, and tell him that he must keep all these? He would shake his head, and say, "I have broken them all; I am condemned by them all." If salvation be of works, what more have I to say? I am of no use here.

If salvation had been by works, our Lord could not have said to the thief, dying at his side, "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." That man could do no works. His hands and feet were fastened to the cross, and he was in the agonies of death. No, it must be of grace, all-conquering grace; and the modus operandi must be by faith, or else for dying men the Gospel is a mockery. The man must look, and live. Is it not clear that the gospel of works is unsuitable in such a case as that? Now, a gospel which is is not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. The gospel was not sent into the world to be a patent medicine that could only be purchased by the wealthy, or a spell that could be uttered only by Latin scholars. The gospel of salvation by grace, through faith, is suitable for every class of persons that we have to deal with. Go through your convict settlements; go through your jails; and just see what you can do with a doctrine of salvation by good works. You will come home disappointed, however earnest may be your address. But go there, and tell of free grace and dying love, and pardon bought with blood, and eyes that stream with tears, confessions of sin, and cries for pardon, will tell you that you have not spoken in vain.

Further, dear friends, if we go and preach to men salvation by works, we are preaching to them a way of salvation impossible to all because of the perfection of the law. What are the good works that can merit heaven? What are the good works that can ensure eternal life? These are

which some seem to imagine. They must be perfectly pure, continuous, and un-spotted. "The law of the Lord is perfect." It condemns a thought, and even the glance of an eye, as an act of criminality. "Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." The law of God in ten commands means much more than the bare words would imply: it deals with the whole range of moral condition, motive and thought. Dream not that its sweep includes only external acts; it does include externals, but, in very deed, the ten commands are spiritual, they go right through the heart, and search the inward parts of the spirit. The more a man understands the law, the more he feels condemned by it, and the less does he indulge the dream that he, as he is, shall ever to keep it intact.

Two Certain Evils.

I am afraid that, if we began to preach salvation by works, we should encourage pride in some, and create despair in others. Many would think that they had done pretty well, as compared with other people; they would therefore, right speedily wrap themselves up in a false hope. But others, knowing that they had not done well, as compared with other people, would think that there was no hope for them, and so would sit down in despair. What practical purpose could this serve—to be making some more proud, and others more wicked, through the influence of despair upon them? But the very worst matter is, that it would be taking them off from Jesus. Our business, my brethren, is to hold up Jesus Christ. To what end did he die, if men could be saved by their own works?

To talk to unbelieving men about the possibility of salvation by their own works would keep them from eternal life. To believe in Jesus is of the new life, and there is no other door. If we, in any way, set you hunting about for another way, we shall cause you to miss the only one entrance, and that will be to your soul's eternal loss. As we dread this, we more and more resolve to hold up the Cross, and the Cross alone, and again and again we cry, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." God forbid that, by our essays upon virtue, or "the enthusiasm of humanity," we should distract you from hastening to the Lord Jesus, that he may give you rest, life and holiness!

II. But now we come to this second and most important part of the subject, The Walk of Salvation.

Those who have believed in Christ, and have been the subjects of the Spirit's work, are now "created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that they should walk in them." God desires that his people should abound in good works. It is his great object to produce a people fit to commune with himself: a holy people, with whom he can have fellowship in time and in eternity. He wishes us not only to produce good works, but to abound in them; and to abound in the highest order of them. He would have us become imitators of himself as dear children, possessing the same moral attributes as the Father in heaven possesses. Is it not written, "Be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect?" Oh, that we came within measurable distance of this blissful consummation!

Note in the text, first, that there is a new creation. You are not new-created to sin—this cannot be imagined. The new creature sinneth not, for it is born of God. The new life is a living and incorruptible seed, which liveth and abideth for ever. The old nature sins, and always will sin; but the new life is of God, and it strives daily against the sin of the old nature, and perseveres, and pushes forward towards everything that is holy. The old nature goes after the flesh, for it is fleshly; but the new nature seeks the things of the Spirit, for it is spiritual. If you have been born again at all, you have been born unto holiness. If you have been new-created, you have been created unto good works. If this be not so with us, our religion is a mere pretence.

The Source of Life.

This new creation is in connection with Christ, for we read in the text, "Created in Christ Jesus." We are the branches; he is the Vine out of which we grow. Your life, and all your fruit-producing power lie in your union to Christ. You are not merely new-created, but you are created in Christ Jesus. What a wonderful thing that is—that you and I should not only be creatures in the world, but new creatures in Christ Jesus! There cannot but be fruit on that branch which is vitally joined to that fruitful stem, Christ Jesus, who did always those things which pleased the Father.

Our good works must flow from our union with Christ by virtue of our faith in him. We depend upon him to make us holy. We depend upon him to keep us holy. Love to Christ burns like a fire in the breast that has conceived it; and, as it burns, it makes the heart to glow, and to become transformed to its own nature. You have seen a piece of iron put into the fire, all black or rusty, and in the fire it has gradually become red with heat; and, as it has reddened, it has thrown off the scales of rust, until at last it has looked to be itself a mass of fire. The effect of the love of God, shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost, is to burn off the rust and scales of sin and depravity, and we become pure love to God through the force of the love of God, which takes possession of our being.

Christ-likeness.

Moreover, that love moves us to patient imitation of Christ. Do you know what that means? "The Imitation of Christ" is a wonderful book upon the subject, which every Christian should read. It has its faults, but its excellences are many. May we not only read the book, but write it out anew in our own life and character by seeking in everything to be like to Jesus!

So, then, dear friends, these good works must be in the Christian. They are not the root, but the fruit of his salvation. They are not the way of the believer's salvation; they are his walk in the way of salvation. Where there is healthy life in a tree, the tree will bear fruit according to its kind; so, if God has made our nature good, the fruit will be good. But if the fruit be evil, it is because the tree is what it always was—an evil tree. The desire of men created anew in Christ is to be rid of every sin. We do sin, but we do not love sin. Sin gets power over us sometimes to our sorrow, but it is a kind of death to us to feel that we have gone into sin; yet it shall not have dominion over us, for we are not under the law, but under grace; and therefore we shall conquer it, and get the victory.

The Test.

And, lastly, this should be our daily exercise:—"That we should walk in them." Good works are not to be an amusement, but a vocation. We are not to indulge in them occasionally: they are to be the tenor and bent of our lives. "Oh," says one, "that is a hard saying!" Do you say so? Well, then, this displays, and sets in clear light, the first part of my subject. You see how impossible it is that you should be saved by these good works; do you not? But if you are saved—if you have obtained a present salvation, if you are now a child of God, if you are now assured of your safety, I charge you, by the love you bear to God, by the gratitude you have to his Christ, give yourself wholly to everything that is right, and good, and pure, and just. Help everything that has to do with temperance, and righteousness, and truth, and godliness; and "let your light so shine before men, that they may see you: good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

A CONSECRATED LIFE.

singleness of purpose and complete consecration to the work shut out all other considerations. From first to last there was not an atom of vanity or conscious pride over his achievements in the pulpit. He was doing the Master's work in all humility.

TABERNACLE.

But the little chapel had now become all too small for the throngs that assembled there at every service, and it had to be enlarged. Pending the change, Mr. Spurgeon preached

In Exeter Hall,

and so vast were the crowds who went there to listen that the streets were blocked. The Park Street Chapel, even in its reconstructed state, again proved too small, and a second time the young pastor had recourse to Exeter Hall while repairs were being made. In the fall of 1856, a fund was started to build a new and much larger edifice, and meanwhile the proprietors of Exeter Hall refused to hire the Hall continuously to the same congregation, as such an arrangement disappointed other parties. Surrey Music Hall was next engaged, and a disastrous accident occurred on the first attempt to hold services there. Seven thousand persons had gathered in the Hall and the preacher was about to begin when some one in the audience raised

The Cry of "Fire!"

In an instant there was a terrible panic! Hundreds rushed to the doors and the crowds, densely packed together, vainly strove to get out of the building. Many of those so wedged were thrown down and trampled under foot. Seven persons were killed outright and twenty-eight more or less seriously hurt. Throughout the excitement, Mr. Spurgeon remained in the pulpit, bravely endeavoring to check the panic and to calm the fears of the frantic multitude. He succeeded at last, but valuable lives had been sacrificed in the stampede.

After preaching three years in Surrey Music Hall, Exeter Hall was again chosen, and the building fund was pushed energetically. The foundation stone of the Metropolitan Tabernacle was laid on Aug. 16, 1859, by Sir Morton Peto, and two years later, the great building, which is capable of seating over six thousand persons, was finished and open in 1861, free of debt! The total amount expended was in the neighborhood of $150,000. The largest contributor to the fund was a gentleman of Bristol, who had never seen or heard Mr. Spurgeon, and who sent his check for five thousand pounds.

For twenty years Mr. Spurgeon's ministry has been continued at the Metropolitan Tabernacle uninterrupted. During that period his fame as a preacher has steadily increased and his field of Christian usefulness has widened to a grand horizon. His audiences have been limited only by the accommodations of the Tabernacle, its doors being regularly besieged at every service by crowds of whom only a part can obtain admittance. On one occasion he preached at the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, to fully 23,000 persons and at another time, while the Tabernacle was being repaired, he conducted services at Agricultural Hall, Islington, for several weeks, the audience at every service being estimated at over 20,000.

Naturally gifted with a fine physique and possessing a voice of vast penetrating power, whose clear, bell-like tones can be heard distinctly in every nook of the great buildings where he has preached, Mr. Spurgeon has been able to successfully undertake oratorical tasks at which most preachers would have recoiled. The first impression the stranger receives on listening to the Tabernacle orator, is that the man himself seems insignificant in contrast with the vast building and the great throng of worshippers it encloses. He is very stout and short—his height not exceeding five feet three inches—and on the elevated platform which constitutes the rostrum in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, he seems almost diminutive. The moment he opens his lips, however, the hearer feels that he is in the presence of a

A Powerful Orator.

The people in the two great galleries that surround the pulpit hear as well as those persons who sit beside the pulpit. This one man standing there, surrounded by so many thousands—a mere atom, apparently, on the sea of human faces—speaks out over all with an intonation so clear, penetrating, ringing and musical that not a syllable is lost. His delivery is slow and the enunciation perfect. His voice has been resembled to a silver string tuned to a high C, full of vibration yet without being metallic.

The secret of Mr. Spurgeon's success as a preacher, however, must be traced in a very large degree, less to his gifts of voice than to his downright earnestness; the transparent simplicity of his character, his common sense and his marvellous flow of homely Saxon, for he rarely uses polysyllables or words taken from the Latin when sturdy Saxon will suffice. His talk goes straight to the heart of the listener and his quick sympathy for every effort for humanity's welfare evokes instant approval. To these Christian characteristics he adds the faculty of thrilling description, pointed anecdote, keen wit, dramatic climax and all-convincing, everyday logic, which enforces and illustrates the truth in a way that no other living preacher can hope to emulate.

The Orphanage

Mr. Spurgeon's schemes for the good of his fellowmen, and particularly for the relief of the unfortunate, have been manifold. One day, in 1866, he was surprised by receiving a letter from a lady (Mrs. Hillyer) quite a stranger to him, in which the writer announced that she wished him to become the trustee of a fund of $100,000, for the purpose of founding an Orphanage. Very naturally, he concluded that the offer was either a mistake or a hoax, but investigation showed it to be genuine. Two and a-half acres of land in Stockwell were secured as a site for the Orphanage in 1867, and, instead of building one large structure, a number of small homes were erected with a view to locating the orphan children in families, rather than massing them together on the asylum or poor-house plan. 500 orphans are regularly cared for, educated and trained at the Stockwell Institution. All this fatherless flock is fed, clothed, trained and started in life through the contributions that flow in from Christians in all lands. At times the Orphanage larder has run bare, but Pastor Spurgeon's strong faith has never failed, and God has put it into warm hearts to supply the deficiency. Never has the supply failed to come on time to feed the hungry orphans. We give on another page an illustration showing the entrance gate of this magnificent charity—probably the noblest of its kind in the world.

But there are other equally laudable enterprises of a philanthropic character connected with the Metropolitan Tabernacle. These include the Colportage Association, an Almshouse for seventeen aged women, a number of mission stations and Sunday Schools, a mission to the blind, besides Ladies Benevolent and Maternal Societies, and others which space prevents us from giving in detail in these columns. Mr. Spurgeon is himself a very focus of activity; indeed, his church has been compared to a hive of bees and the example of energy is infectious. The entire congregation vies with its pastor in its efforts to do good.

The Pastors' College.

Another of Mr. Spurgeon's pet philanthropies is the Pastors' College, an institution founded in 1856, before the erection of the Tabernacle. The idea of starting young pastors and encouraging them until they found their true spheres of labor occurred to Mr. Spurgeon while he himself was struggling, during the earlier years of his ministry. Later, when he had won popularity, and when his sermons had secured a large sale both in England and America, he undertook the expense of sustaining from his own income a number of young students who had shown marked merit and devotion as soul-winners. His excellent wife economized as much as possible, and he spent on this work from three to four thousand dollars a year from the sale of his sermons. At first the students met in the rooms in the Tabernacle basement, but, in 1864, a new college building was finished and opened. Over five hundred students have there been educated and have entered upon ministerial duties in many different countries. Among them are some who have become famous workers for the Lord, including Edward G. Gange, Archibald G. Brown and William Cuff.

Mrs. Spurgeon's Mission.

In a sketch of Mr. Spurgeon's life it would be invidious to pass over without more than a mere reference the noble share borne by his wife in his life battle. She was a Miss Susannah Thompson, of London, and was married to Mr. Spurgeon in January, 1856. The issue of the marriage has been two sons, Charles and Thomas, both of whom are now faithful ministers of the Gospel.

Mrs. Spurgeon has sustained and encouraged her husband amid all his trials, and has often made success possible when the outlook was darkest. For years of her invalid life, she has devoted much of her time to a fund in behalf of poor ministers, an enterprise in which she was aided by a host of friends as well as by her publishers. The book fund is one that has brought cheer into the home of many a poor pastor without a library. Thousands of volumes and hundreds of pounds have been distributed in this manner, and the work still goes on and grows every year. A portrait of Mrs. Spurgeon is given in another column.

Mrs. Spurgeon tell this story: "Upstairs in a little drawer were some carefully hoarded crown-pieces, (coins about the size of our silver dollars and worth $1.25 which owing to their weight and clumsiness are rapidly going out of circulation in England). These, owing to some foolish fancy, I had been gathering for years, whenever chance threw one in my way. These I now counted out, and found they made a sum exactly sufficient to pay for one hundred copies of one book. If a twang of regret at parting from my cherished but unwieldy favorites passed over me, it was gone in an instant; and then they were given, freely and thankfully, to the Lord; and in that moment, though I knew it not, the Book Fund was inaugurated."

The publishers aided her by a grant equal to her own; then friends, who heard what she was doing, came to her aid, and now, instead of sending out one volume, she is able to make up a large parcel of eight or nine good-sized volumes to cheer the hearts of solitary laborers for the Master in small towns, country villages, and distant hamlets.

Not the least interesting of the illustrations accompanying this article is that which represents the humble dwelling in which Mr. Spurgeon was born, at Kelvedon, in Essex. Is it still standing, and is pointed out to visitors as the place in which England's greatest preacher first saw the light. His first intuitions of sacred things were developed there, and there his infancy was passed. Since that time, the boy who played in and about the lowly cottage may be literally said to have become a world-preacher, his discourses being read wherever the English language is spoken. In his daily mail are letters from the uttermost ends of the earth, many of which contain glad news of souls brought to the Redeemer through the agency of his sermons, over twenty-two hundred of which have been printed since he entered the Christian ministry.

A Letter From Pastor Spurgeon.

Amid the demands of his multifarious correspondence, which embraces every quarter of the globe, Mr. Spurgeon still finds time to remember his friends on this side of the Atlantic who read his sermons weekly in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The following letter, which we recently received from the gifted Tabernacle pastor, shows how cordial and sincere his friendship is for American readers and how deep an interest he takes in their spiritual welfare:

WESTWOOD, BEULAH HILL,
UPPER NORWOOD, MARCH 25, 1891.

DEAR SIR:—I have been greatly cheered by hearing that many persons in out-of-the-way places have been led to Jesus by reading my sermons in your columns. What greater reward can come to a preacher than to know that souls are saved through his word?

I thank those who have read the sermons to little gatherings which else would have been without a sermon, and I equally thank those who have sent the sermon where it was so much needed. Some must give the word, and others must make up that great army of them that publish it. By the wide scattering of your paper the Gospel goes to lone habitations and frequently reaches those who have wandered from their homes because of their follies. Possibly they will read a sermon in a newspaper, who might never have looked at it had it come to them in another form. Ask your readers to pray for a blessing on these words of mine wherever they may go. Very heartily do I greet the army of readers, both yours and mine. May they be a very gracious people, and find for themselves a precious God! In basket and in store may they be blest, and specially in soul and spirit may our Lord enrich them! "Until the day break and the shadows flee away," may the Comforter abide with them!

I should be very grateful if they would also, now and then, think of one so far away as I am. I carry on many works for the Lord, and I have no supplies for money but such as the Lord sends me in answer to the prayer of faith. What I have most need of is strength to bear up under great strain of labor, thought, and oppositions. I try to uphold the banner of the truth, and the battle wages fiercest around the standard-bearer. Oh for more grace! Brethren pray for us. If all your thousands of readers would give me a loving thought I should inherit a great blessing.

Yours very heartily,
C. H. SPURGEON

HOW JESUS RESTED.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning August 2nd. Mark 6: 31; 4: 38, 39.

JESUS rested after toil. The nature he took upon him was human nature, with all its weakness and its liability to weariness and exhaustion. The three years of his ministry were years of arduous labor. Long journeys on foot, preaching to the people, working miracles of healing, teaching and training the men who were to preach the Gospel after his death filled his days with exhausting work.

He rested after sorrow. He had just been told of the death of John the Baptist. His tender heart must have quivered under that blow. He owed much to the revival of religious thought and feeling which John's preaching had produced. The nation had been stirred from its spiritual lethargy, and the men who were near John came to Jesus after their first teacher's death, prepared to receive the message Jesus brought. The tragic death of the Forerunner must have suggested thoughts of the cup which could not pass from him until he drank it?

He rested "in a desert place." The rest he sought was recuperative. He needed strength to renew his labor. It was not amusement nor diversion he sought, but quiet and refreshing communion with the Father. He did not go alone. He found rest with the disciples. Neither in solitude nor in worldly society could he get the kind of rest he needed.

His rest on shipboard. The peaceful rest of a weary man. He slept though the storm raged. Neither the wind nor the roaring of the waves disturbed his slumbers. "How is it you are so calm?" was the question a wife asked her husband, an army officer, who maintained his serenity while sailors and passengers around him on board a sinking ship were in panic. "Are you terrified?" he said, drawing his sword and holding it pointed at her breast. "No," she said, "for I know the sword is in the hand of one who loves me." Jesus was not alarmed by the storm, but could sleep amidst its raving.

His rest was broken by a cry for help. What the storm could not do, the prayer of his followers did. He awoke. He sometimes seems to sleep now, when his people are in difficulties. As the storm rages around them and it seems as if they would be engulfed, they wonder that he does not interfere. He lets them learn their helplessness. He lets them realize their danger. But, at the crisis, their cry receives prompt response. His rest was not torpor nor indifference. Rather the rest of a wearied mother whose ear recognizes instantly the cry of her child. "They who have believed do enter into rest."

BENEFICENCE OF THE CIRCLES.

It may be useful to some of our readers who wear the silver cross to know what the circles of King's Daughters in various parts of the country are doing. While every circle has, naturally, its own local objects of interest, there is sometimes an overplus as to the disposition of which suggestions may be welcome. The following are some of the enterprises taken up, as appears from reports sent to the Silver Cross: From Raleigh, N. C., we hear of hospital establishment, the baby of an insane mother cared for and an invalid's chair placed in a railroad depot. From Wilmington, N. C., a room has been furnished in the City Hospital and an effort being made to pay for the support of its sick occupant. The bulk of the money so far, has been raised by the sale of candy which the members of the circle make and a merchant of the city sells for them. From Des Moines, Ia., we learn that situations have been found for two girls, and five families supplied with clothing. In Quebec, Canada, a circle of little girls have been pasting pictures in old copy-books and sending them to the children's wards in the hospitals. In Morristown, N. J., a magic lantern with Bible slides has been bought for the Indians at White Earth Reservation, and the support of a Sioux boy at Hampton Institute has been undertaken.

These are a few of the forms that the benevolence of the King's Daughters is taking. Various as they are, the same principle of Christian love underlies them all and he who sees all the kindness that is done in his name assuredly sees these and will reward them.

THE WORK AT MINNEAPOLIS.

THE Christian Endeavor Convention decided to hold its sessions next year in New York. It will surprise no one if its delegates should by that time number twenty thousand. The record of the past year, the reports of rapid increase and the spirit which prevailed at Minneapolis, all indicate the elements of strength, vitality and progression. An organization whose power for good has been tested in every section of our own land and in other lands and in twenty different denominations, is one that must grow with ever increasing speed. Pastors and churches will avail themselves of its help with confidence, and will love it and use it more and more as they realize its power. The remarks which the Minneapolis Convention has drawn from the secular press, show that its significance is appreciated by the world. Heretofore Christ's army has appeared a divided host incapable, by reason of mutual jealousy, of united and concentrated action. Now the world has seen a battalion fifteen thousand strong, representing an army of over a million, acting together in unison in a common cause. The spectacle means much both to the church and the world.

The spirit which pervaded the Convention throughout, was one of love to the Master and all who love him. The favorite topic was the winning of souls and the best methods of advancing Christ's kingdom on earth. The watchword, which became the key-note of the proceedings, came, as was fit, from the founder of the organization, whose portrait appeared in this journal last week—Rev. Francis E. Clarke, D.D., whose initials are now used to signify "Father Endeavor Clark." The two most prominent features of the movement," he said, "are Fidelity and Fellowship." Fidelity to the local church, and fellowship in common methods of service. "I believe," he cried, and the Convention heartily applauded—"I believe in the communion of saints." One after another, pastors and laymen took up the sentiment and briefly but emphatically declared for union and brotherly love. Telegrams and letters of congratulations came from all the lands in which Christian Endeavor Societies exist, but from which no delegates had been sent. From Japan, from Liberia and other far distant lands the same expressions of hearty good-will were received and to these were added the words of a Chinese delegate, who said, "Chinee come slow but he come sure."

The proposal was made by some enthusiastic delegates to take up a collection to send Dr. Clark around the world to form a chain of Christian Endeavor Societies, which should belt the globe. That it would have been easily done, was evident from the reception of the proposal; but it was thought that the scheme would violate the rule of the organization that no officer should receive pay for his services, and it was therefore withdrawn and the various societies were advised to give the money instead, to the Mission Boards of their respective churches.

THE EDITOR of this department will be glad to receive information from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are members of Societies of Christian Endeavor, King's Daughters, the Epworth League, or Young Men's or Young Women's Christian Associations as to the progress of work in their respective localities and practical suggestions on the best methods of increasing their efficiency and usefulness. The publication of such communications will be helpful to other organizations as "iron sharpeneth iron."

OUR GENTLE LEADER.

"I will lead them in paths that they have not known." (Isa 42: 16.)

LED by Jesus, oh, what joy,
Pure and sweet, without alloy,
'Tis to know that we are led,
While life's thorny path we tread,
By a gentle Saviour's hand
Toward the glorious heavenly land!

Let him lead us where he will,
For with him we fear no ill,
And no harm can e'er betide
While we're walking at his side,
With our hands securely clasped
In our Saviour's loving grasp.

When he leads us, we well know
'Tis the way that we should go;
And although the path be drear,
We will follow without fear;
Follow him, we shall be blest,
For he leadeth into rest.

Blessed Jesus, we will be Led and guided all by thee;
And if we are called to go
Where dark waves of sorrow flow,
Keep us meek and patient still,
Mold us to thy perfect will.

"Vera," in the Christian Standard.

THE LILIES' LESSON.

THEY were yellow-tinted, like sunshine,
Amber, their red gold bells,
And the larks sang their carols near them
To brighten the Summer dells.

The tall lily-grass around grew,
In tiny islands of green
Where the lilies so golden waving,
The gnarled old trees between.

Lilies still golden in shadow,
Lilies more golden in light;
Lilies to link with the morn, noon,
With the starlit purple night.

Lilies to smile in their golden hue,
Our Lord's sweet lesson to teach,
That we should be kind and loving,
Ah! thus did the lilies preach.

Lilies, to say by their gleaming,
Growing wild in meadow lot,
"Let your light, to, e'er shine forth,
To do good forgetting not." —Selecta.

HOW MY BOY WENT DOWN.

IT was not on the field of battle,
It was not with a ship at sea;
But a fate far worse than either
That stole him away from me.
'Twas the death of the ruby wine-cup,
That the reason and senses drown;
He drank the alluring poison,
And thus my boy went down.

Down from the heights of manhood
To the depths of disgrace and sin;
Down to a worthless being,
From the hope of what might have been.
For the brand of a beast besotted,
He bartered his manhood's crown;
Through the gate of a sinful pleasure
My poor, weak boy went down.

Alas for my hopes, all delusion!
Alas for his youthful pride!
Alas! who are safe when danger
Is open on every side?
Oh, can nothing destroy this great evil?
No bar in their pathway be thrown,
To save from this horrible maelstrom,
The thousands of boys going down?

THE LIGHT THAT IS FELT.

CTENDER child of summers three,
Seeking her little bed at night,
Paused on the dark stair, timidly:
"Oh, mother, take my hand," said she,
"And then the dark will all be light."

We older children grope our way
From dark behind to dark before;
And only when our hand we lay,
Dear Lord, in thine, the night is day,
And there is darkness nevermore.

Reach downward to the sunless days
Wherein our guides are blind as we,
And faith is small and hope delays;
Take thou the hands of prayer we raise,
And let us feel the light of Thee.

John G. Whittier.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells of the Water-Carriers of the East, the Street Venders and their Cries.

So much interest had been awakened among the children by these talks of Uncle John, that on a recent evening, when the old traveller seemed to be in a discursive mood, he found himself surrounded by a group, which included several young folks from neighboring families. Tom and Ted had seen fit to invite them that evening, in the expectation of another story.

The day had been a rainy one. The weather had kept the children indoors and there had been some lamenting in consequence of the deprivation of the usual outdoor romp. Little Milly, by right of conquest, perched upon Uncle John's knee and asked:

"Uncle, do you like rain?"

"The rain is God's blessing to the thirsty ground, little one," he answered, smiling, "if it were not for the rain, we would have no flowers; the trees would die, and the grass would wither. We could have no bread, as all the corn and wheat would fail to ripen. Neither could you have any clothes, because the cotton would not grow, and the sheep would get no herbage. We should love the rain, and here, especially, since it comes down so gently, we should welcome it."

"Doesn't it come down gently everywhere, Uncle John?" asked Ted.

"By no means," said Uncle. "There are parts of the earth where it rains but once a year, and then it comes in a deluge and people have to go into safe shelter lest they be drowned. The rivers rise and flood the fields and valleys, and every little stream is a raging torrent. But the people in these tropical lands bless the rain, and hail the rising of the rivers with joy, because when the waters go back the ground is enriched and the crops spring up almost magically."

"And what do the people do in the long time when there is no rain?" asked Max Wheeler, who was one of the group.

"They have to depend on wells and springs," was the reply. "Yet, sometimes even these fail and then there is a water famine. Understand my dears, that in Palestine, Egypt and Syria, they have not water supplies, such as we have here. They dig huge wells and reservoirs, but they do not conduct the water through the streets in pipes, nor has each family a well in its house, with faucets like those in your papa's, at which you can draw water at will."

"And do you ever have to buy water, Uncle?" interpolated little Milly, from his knee.

"Yes, darling; and very glad to get it, too. Now, here is a picture of two water-sellers in Alexandria. These girls you see carrying the jars, go through the streets and cry out in their young, musical voices 'Ya Aatee Allah' ('Behold the gift of God'). This is the water-carrier's cry everywhere in Egypt, and it always reminds me of Christ's words to the woman at the well of Samaria: 'If thou knewest the gift of God and who it is that saith unto thee, give me to drink, thou wouldest have asked of him and he would have given thee living water.' The woman, of course, did not understand the Master's words, until her eyes were opened, and then she saw what a precious gift Jesus meant to confer on her.

"In some Eastern cities, one hears the water-carriers crying, 'Oh! ye thirsty! Oh ye thirsty!' They keep calling this constantly and every little while adding, in the same voice, 'God will reward me' or 'Blessed be the water.' When a passerby stops to get a drink, he usually gives the water-carrier a small piece of money. But even if he drinks free, she does not prevent him, but simply repeats her call, 'God will reward me.' Sometimes a veiled lady will stop and get a cool draught from the pitcher and give a piastre to the carrier, when the latter will break out in a flood of thanks for the gift and then replacing the pitcher upon her shoulder, continue her walk, calling 'Oh ye thirsty.'

"But it is generally a boy or a man who is the water-seller. Sometimes, instead of a pitcher such as the younger girl is holding in the picture, a much larger pot is carried, sufficient to contain a day's supply for a family. These pitchers and water-pots are made of sun-dried or fire-baked clay and sometimes prettily decorated. The designs are numerous and very ancient; indeed, in early Scripture times, the water-pots were much the same in shape as those used in the East to-day.

"Do they always carry it in pitchers?" asked Tom.

"No; when on a journey through a land where water is scarce, travellers carry it in skin bags or bottles, which are made for this use, and these prevent evaporation and keep the water pure and sweet for many days.

"But water-sellers are not the only interesting street-vendors in the East. I have seen in the streets of Damascus — you know, Tom, that is said to be the oldest city in the world — and in other Oriental cities, fruit and flower-sellers who had their peculiar cries, quite different from those of the street peddlers here. You boys are sometimes awakened from your morning nap by hearing men crying on the street corners: 'Bananas! Oranges! Sweet Florida Oranges!' Well, if you were Syrian boys and girls, you would hear instead the lemon-seller calling, 'God will make them light, oh lemons!' or the orange-vendor calling 'Sweet as honey, oh oranges!' or the flower-girl on the street corner or by the market place crying 'Odors of Paradise! Oh flowers of Henna!' or the melon-seller, who says: 'the comforter of those in distress, oh melon-seeds!'"

"What's that? They don't say that, do they?"

"Indeed they do," replied Uncle John merrily. "Everybody in the East talks in a florid style, that is, using picturesque and fanciful language, instead of expressing themselves quite plainly like ourselves. For instance, a Mohammedan flower-seller holds up a blossom and cries, 'The rose is a thorn—it bloomed from the sweat of the Prophet.'

"How pretty!" exclaimed the children.

"Last week, you may remember, I spoke about the sellers of figs and sweets. They have similar cries. Each tells of the excellence of his wares. But none are so numerous as the water-carriers. Every mosque has its water-fountain in the courtyard, where the Mohammedans wash their hands before saying prayers. All through the East water is the principal beverage, and in times of scarcity I have known it to be sold at enormous prices. In the desert, a cupful of gold pieces has sometimes been given for a drink of water."

"How I should like to go to those countries, and hear the water-carriers sing in the streets," said little Ted.

"You may some day, my boy," said Uncle John. "When I was a little fellow, like you, I was ambitious to travel, and I have seen many lands and strange people since then. Some day you, too, may go to the East. But wherever you go, you will always find that water is valued as one of the highest gifts of God to man. But the water that comes from the earth or the clouds only satisfies us for a little while; we soon grow thirsty again. Pray the Good Shepherd to give you to drink of the Water of Life, and with that draught all other blessings will come."

Precocious Children.

Don't strive to make your little ones wise too soon. Soon enough they will know all of mere worldly wisdom that is worth the knowing. Try to open the young mind and heart to spiritual things, rather than overburden it with secular things, which it is almost sure to forget before the days of childhood have passed. How many of us remember all the lessons of our youth, that were crammed into our boyish and girlish heads by over-zealous teachers or parents? Few,

GIRL WATER-CARRIERS IN THE ORIENT.

(See "Uncle John's Talks.")

indeed! As a rule, a boy or girl recalls but a fraction of what is learned before the age of twelve.

Home tuition is the best for childhood; the mother the best teacher. Mother's boys are the best boys. Interwoven with the alphabet are lessons of love, of purity, of sweetness that influence all the after-life and go to make the character. Gentleness, generosity, reverence for elders, the knowledge of a Saviour and of God's holy laws are all best instilled at mother's knee. And in after-life, this tuition is never forgotten. The prayers by the bedside; the hints of orderliness, the nobility of truthfulness, the touching melodies of "the better land,"—these are more than Latin roots and fractions and tell far more on character in the long run of the years. These never make children precocious. And when mother's task is ended and the last of her flock:

The baby, has gone to school, ah me!
What will the mother do?

the house grows quiet and hushed. They have slipped from her to other, and who shall say better or safer teachers? Almost all the great men of every generation owe their nobility of mind and force of character to their mothers. How essential, then, that this maternal training should be conscientious and thorough, as under God's own eye, since it is for time and eternity?

About Servants.

IT is quite natural that every nation should believe itself the best supplied in the matter of domestic servants. We know, of course, that when the American girl chooses to set her hand to house-work, she is the queen of the home, bright, clever, original and unapproachable in many ways that go to make life pleasant. She is at the same time the most independent of all, as becomes the daughter of a great Republic, where all are equal. There are countries where servants are differently regarded. In Japan, for instance, servants are excellent if chosen with discretion and treated with some little consideration. Japan is par excellence the land of politeness, and this extends even to the kitchen. You treat your cook or your housemaid there with well-bred courtesy, and she expects it as a right. If she has a weakness, it is for fees, but aside from this, she is invariably a soft-voiced, pleasant sort of a person, whom it is really nice to have about the house, and who strives to make you happy by doing her best on all occasions. In the Japanese cities it is not uncommon for the mistress to take her servants into family conversations regarding any of the thousand things that come up for discussion in the home. Even then, the respect due the mistress is shown by the attitude of the servant, who sits on her knees while she chats.

In Havana, a quite different state of things exists. Mistresses are afflicted with servants who leave on the slightest provocation and just at the moment when most needed. Many complain of their cooks and maids being plunderers. It is customary in Cuba, except in country places, for all the cooks to go home at night, and this plan works wretchedness to the employer in many ways. Sometimes the family is left without a scrap for the next meal—not a roll nor an orange, even, for breakfast. They must wait the good pleasure of the cook, who may not return, as the whim takes her. One lady tried eight cooks in three months before she was suited. So independent are these domestics, that a cook frequently goes out for a stroll between the courses of dinner, and the family and guests have to wait till she returns before the next course is served. Yet a true Cuban will tell you, despite all their faults, that she has the very best servants in the world.

The Farther Shore.

I HAVE read the Word, I have studied long.

On visions unseen by mortal eyes
I have dreamed of the land of light and song
And the shining mountains of Paradise,
And rich with the flush of a thousand springs
Is the land where flowers fade no more,
But my richest fancies fail to bring.

The joys that belong to the farther shore,

Up to that country my longing flies,
Where is rest for the weary, long and sweet,
Where the pearly dews of Paradise
Gently shall bathe the pilgrim feet,
I think of the psalms and crowns of gold,
Of the loved who will stand by the jasper sea,
But richer than pen or tongue have told,
Are the joys of heaven awaiting me.

Church Kindergartens.

A NEW idea is suggested by an experiment tried by the Rev. G. L. McNult, pastor of the Plymouth Congregational Church, East Oakland, Cal. On assuming pastoral duties some time ago, he discovered that there were in his congregation a number of mothers with children too young to take to church, yet with no one to leave at home to care for them. This set him to thinking, and he opened one of the church rooms as a sort of kindergarten, during the hours of worship on Sunday forenoons, where the young children of those desiring to attend service were placed, until the exercises were over. In the interval, they were instructed in the rudiments of religion by means of stereopticon pictures and the little tots showed great interest in the Bible scenes on the canvass. The St. Louis Mid-Continent calls the attention of pastors similarly situated to this matter which would be a pleasure to the very young folks, a relief to the mothers, and would be the means, besides, of instilling at the tenderest age, when the heart is probably most susceptible to outward impressions, the love of sacred things.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

THE boats landed the little crew upon dry ground, and the Fair-Weather was made fast by cables, and no less than three carriages were promptly offered to convey the children back to their distracted mother. And as Captain Allen drove out of town with his three children, and Robert mounted on the Britt horse rode close behind, with the Superintendent at his side on the roan, there was a deal of "Hooray!" and "Good luck!" and waving of hats to congratulate the young captain on the safe conclusion of his short and perilous voyage.

After thus dealing with himself, he returned to the kitchen, where Eliza was hugging her four children in turn, having condoned the disobedience of the twins, and Jerry was getting their best supper of ham and eggs and fried potatoes, and Mrs. Britt was standing with tears in her eyes, and in one hand a great loaf of cake—which had just been baked for her own tea, and was brought over as an offering to Robert,—and in the other hand her one sole jar of pineapple preserves to further grace this festive occasion.

During the evening all the neighbors came in, one after another, and to all the Captain with growing joy told his tale. He could never be weary of describing how Robert had managed the Fair-Weather, how the boy had not been one whit afraid, how he had remembered every snag and every twist and turn, and what muscle he had exhibited! And he patted Robert's back, and held out his arm with pride in its development, and gloried in the possession of such a son.

Meanwhile, the unhappy Superintendent was consumed with envy. Why was not this boy his? Why could he not claim the little hero? "Allen, Allen," he groaned aside, "you keep him here, and some day, if you would give him up, I could make a millionaire of him, perhaps."

"Would I give up a boy who has just saved all my family!" cried the Captain. "Liza, you didn't think when I brought home such a Bad Bargain, that stormy night, that he'd save your three children from drowning, eh?"

The Superintendent clenched his hands. Why, why had he not been the one to rescue the little boy from relatives who were going to send him to the poorhouse? "Robert," he whispered, "I'll give you a watch to mark this day."

"Oh, no, please. I couldn't wear a watch when we are so poor, and father hasn't any," said Robert, flushing.

In July the tourists of the preceding summer came back. Jerry was engaged as camp cook; Robert as before was constantly in requisition. The camp was on the creek, about half a mile above the mill, and on the opposite side, at an especially wild and beautiful spot. As there was so much going to and fro between the camp and the Allens' home, the young men of the camp asked the Captain to build a bridge across the creek, placing it just above the wheel, and extending from the creek side of the mill to the opposite bank. The bridge was made by setting four or five logs firmly upright in the stream-bed among the rocks, laying broad planks from log to log, and supplying the slight structure with a single hand-rail. For agile and steady-headed people it was safe enough, now that the creek was low for summer, and the Allen children ran across it with the celerity and security of cats.

There was a day in August when the school-house congregation had their Sunday-school picnic. Everybody went, both small and great; it was the gathering of the year. This year the place chosen was five miles away, and the start was made early in wagons laden with children, baskets, and grown people.

Mrs. Liza and her children all went. Captain Zekiel did not go, he must stay to look after the little work at the mill. Robert did not go. One of the artists at the camp was painting Robert as "The Young Woodman," and was in haste to get the picture done, so Robert had to spend the morning posing with an axe, and a log, and a tame squirrel, one of Jerry's numerous pets, perched on his shoulder while he fed it. Robert set off up to the camp with his usual bright face. "I'll come back at noon, father, and cook our dinner. I'll make you an omelette, just as Jerry makes at the camp."

The Captain was left alone at the mill. When the sun-dial near the bee-hives marked noon, the Captain had a visitor. It was not Robert. A big, bloated, red-faced, untidy woman came in at the mill door—and somehow, when the Captain saw her, his heart sank. "Be you Captaining Allen?" said the woman. The Captain nodded.

"Long about ten years ago, last spring, April it was, you picked up a little boy on the road-side down in Lacy, and you fetched him home and took care of him, didn't you?"

The Captain nodded again. Dumb terror gripped his heart.

"He's my boy, and I've come to take him away," said the woman with assurance.

"Your boy?" shouted the Captain.

"Yes; he's my boy, I wouldn't have left him so long, only I've had a dreadful run of hard luck. I was sick a long time and out of my head—and in a hospital—and a poorhouse—and I'm one of them as never has no good luck happen to them. But now I've come to get my boy. Where is he? You just tell him that his mother, his lovin' mother's come to get him."

"His mother!" cried the dazed and wretched Captain; "you his mother? If you were his mother, why did you leave him? What did you leave him for, I say?"

"I didn't go to leave him, Captaining," said the woman. "I felt mortal sick, and he was little and tired, and I says to him, 'Sit there, honey, till I come back.' And I laid out to get some medicine and a little glass of something to strengthen me. And I got worse, and out of my head like, and I lost my way, and couldn't find where I left him, and I wandered, and—I got carried to a hospital sick—and so it went on; and now, at last, I says, 'I must have back my boy, my sweet, pretty boy,' so I found my way back, and inquired, and it was told me, Captaining Allen of the mill had took the boy, and so I come up here to you, and much obliged I am to you, indeed—and not to trouble you any longer with him. Seeing he's mine, I'll take him along back with me to day, so call him to go with his mother."

"You shan't have him," bellowed the Captain; "he's been my boy this ten years. I'll hold him against the world."

"Is he bound to you? Did you get papers made out?" demanded the claimant eagerly.

No; the Captain had not gone through that formality. He had found the child, and kept him, and the boy had grown into his heart and life.

"He's mine," said the woman. "I can prove it. I mean to have him. He's coming with his mother. Who else will support me in my old age, if not my son?"

"You torsook him. I've raised him. You are not fit to have him. You are drunken. I smell liquor on your breath this minute! You shan't have him. If you come up here thinking to get money from me for the boy you're all out. I haven't any money; I'm as poor as Job's turkey, but I'll not give you the boy. We'll have the matter before the court. We'll see if the boy is to be taken from decent folks and lugged off to the city slums by a woman like you!"

"I'll have him," said the woman, excitedly; "I will. Where is the boy? I'll tell him his mother needs him, and he must come and do for me like a good son."

Then over the Captain's troubled mind rolled the great horror of having this woman, this foul, leering, drunken creature, see the clean, simple, handsome, generous, loving boy, and claim to be his mother. What an awful revelation for the lad reared by the just, sensible, womanly Eliza, to be called son by this dreadful creature! He changed his tone; he must get her away before Robert came. Deacon Britt was the nestor and arbiter of the hamlet; he had been a justice of the peace; he was a firm friend of Robert and the Allens; he should give his counsel. "The boy isn't here," said the Captain, "he's away; but you come up with me to Squire Britt's, and tell your story, and give your proof, and we'll see how to settle it. Come along quick, I'm in a hurry; I've work to do."

But the woman was full of drunken cunning.

"I won't go until I see the boy. Go on with your work. I'll wait for him. What does a woman feel waiting to see her own dear, pretty boy after ten years, and she a good, loving mother as ever lived!"

The Captain clenched his hands and gritted his teeth. In his fury he felt like picking up a stick and cleaving the woman's head. "I'd sooner kill you than let you have him!" he roared in a transport of fury.

"A nice man you are to bring up a boy," cried the woman, who belonged to the unstampable. "I want my child! Where is my boy! My son, my son, come to your mother!"

Alas! the Captain, looking across the stream, saw Robert, joyous, running down the path toward the bridge. Beside himself with distress, he foolishly cried, "There he is—hush! hush! hold your tongue, I say!"

"Oh, there he is; that's my boy, is it, running to meet his own mother?"

Robert's foot was on the bridge. "Robert," shouted the Captain, "stay where you are! Do not come on this side of the creek!"

Robert was not of those pleasing young people, who being told to do something, do quite the contrary, and then ask what the order meant. Nor did he belong to that other variety, who meet a command with, 'why' and 'oh, no' and 'I won't.' If his father said, "Don't cross the bridge," very good; Robert did not cross the bridge, though his foot was on it. If his father wanted him to stay on that side of the creek, very good; he could stay there, why not? He sat on the grass, and taking off his old chip hat, let the cool breeze fan his heated face.

"I'll call him over," said the woman, angrily.

"If I tell him to stop where he is, he'll do it, if you call till you drop," retorted the wrathful Captain.

"Then I'll go over to him," said the woman. "I'll go over and follow him to the camp, or clear round the world. I'll have my son. A pretty thieving man you are to keep parted a mother and her boy!"

She started for the wide back-door of the mill, on the threshold of which rested the first plank of the bridge.

"Don't go! Don't cross! Stop, woman, I say!" cried the Captain.

Not that he feared for her; his family crossed there dozens of times daily. It was Robert for whom he feared.

The woman went on. The bridge was narrow and high over the howling creek for an unsteady head. Moreover, for the part near the mill, the planks were wet and slippery, being constantly spattered with drops from the wheel. The woman had gone a few steps when her feet slipped, her drunken brain reeled, her hand relaxed its grasp from the rail, and she plunged headlong into the rocky bed of the creek. The creek was low. The water, deeper where she fell, rolled her round once or twice and bore her into a shallow.

Robert, seated on the farther bank, saw a strange woman essay to cross and then fall. He flung himself to the rescue, a few strides, where the creek was shallow. A few swimming strokes in the middle, and he had reached the woman and lifted her head above the water. Meanwhile the Captain had hurried down the other bank and plunged into the water below the wheel and came to the two.

"She's fainted, or something," said Robert. "She couldn't drown in that minute in the water."

The Captain lifted her by the waist, her head hanging against his arms.

"Take up her feet, Robert," he said, "and we'll carry her into the kitchen."

Robert wrapped the ragged wet garments about her knees, lifted her feet as his father said, and they struggled up the bank with their heavy, dripping burden and laid her in the kitchen on the wide soft lounge which was Pink's bed at night. They took off her wet dress and shoes and stockings. Robert took a towel and rubbed her head, arms and feet.

"Get mother's camphor-bottle, father, and bathe her face," he said, returning to his authority as chief nurse of the Allen home.

The Captain followed orders.

"She isn't dead; her heart beats," said Robert, "and I see a little quiver here in her throat. Father, the doctor goes about noon every day to see old Mrs. Long; go and see if you can catch him to come here and I'll keep on rubbing her."

The Captain hurried off in silence. He feared to leave the boy alone with the woman, lest she revive and speak, but the whole succession of events prostrated his understanding. He could mercy do each thing as it came up. A doctor was needed. Well, he would call the doctor. Had he been the means of getting the woman into the creek? No; surely not. He had called to her not to cross the bridge. True, he had felt ready to kill her,—but would he have done it? Evidently no. He went into the water to save her.

Thus his brain ran on as he hurried to Mrs. Long's, and luckily found the doctor.

Robert, left alone with the wreck of humanity on the lounge, regarded her with horror. Her soiled, torn clothing, her bloated frame, the face set in unconsciousness, but bearing marks of years of drunken sin,—these sickened the boy, whose native refinement was great and who had been reared in cleanliness and innocence by Eliza Allen. He went to the blue chest, got out a clean sheet and laid it over the figure on the lounge. Then he got a brush and smoothed her hair and twisted it up as well as he could. Next he put a few drops of ammonia in water, and slowly poured them into the woman's mouth. This seemed to revive her. She opened her eyes and regarded Robert with a heavy stare that seemed to see nothing. There were mists before her eyes.

"Brandy," she whispered, "give me some brandy."

"We haven't any," said Robert. "I'll make you some tea." Eliza had a little kettle over a lamp. He lit the lamp, put a few tablespoonfuls of water in the kettle and hastily made some strong tea. He sweetened it and began to feed it to her. She swallowed feverishly. Then said:

"Gin, boy; gin! A drop of gin, or brandy, or—, or—"

"We haven't any; here take this," said Robert, and he put a drop or two of ammonia into the tea. "Take this."

She took it, but groaned, and closed her eyes. Then Captain Allen came with the doctor. The doctor was a skillful man, learned in accidents among the mines and lumber-camps of the county. He began to handle the patient, pressing here and there, lifted her eyelids, then raised her up. She turned white with a cry.

"She was only in the water a minute or two," said Robert.

"Pitched off the bridge, did she?" said the doctor. "Dizzy; she had been drinking. Who is she?"

"We don't know, we never saw her before," said Robert.

"She came into the mill—she wanted to cross the creek on the bridge, and I told her to keep off," said Captain Allen.

"What did she want? what did she say?" asked the doctor.

"She wanted to see some one—on the other side," said the Captain.

"She is evidently a sort of tramp," said the doctor, "but tramps never come here; we are all too poor and honest."

"I know," said Robert; "she must have heard of the camp; they are rich there. She no doubt wanted to go there to beg. That is why she would cross the bridge."

"No doubt," said the doctor, and he went out of the door with the Captain; Robert followed them. "There is nothing to do for her, but I will leave an opiate in case she begins to suffer overmuch. She will last only a few hours; not past six o'clock, probably. Her back is broken. She must have struck a big boulder as she went under. Her legs are dead already, quite paralyzed. Let her lie where she is, as she is—to torture her by moving her would be cruel. I'll drive round by the poorhouse, and speak to the poor-master to come round here this evening for the body." Then the doctor mounted his vehicle, which was a "buckboard" on a pair of stout, low wheels, and rode off.

The woman lay as if insensible. The Captain could stand it no longer. "I promised," he said, "to get out boards for the young gentleman for a new shanty. I must go to work. You watch her, Robert. Don't be frightened if she talks queer to you, and says odd things. It will be raving, you know. She may mix you up with others. Don't heed her talk."

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

H. M., Trenton, N. J.—Is the Epworth League a branch of the Society of Christian Endeavor?

No; it is a separate organization. The Epworth League is identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

V. C., Aspen Grove, N. C.—Is the "History of the Jews," by Josephus, published now?

You can purchase the works of Josephus in almost any book store, including his "Antiquities of the Jews," which is doubtless what you refer to.

D. L., Keokuk, Ia.—What is the meaning of the word agnostic?

The name signifies: "We do not know." Agnosticism is Theological Know-nothingism, and the term was first used, by Professor Huxley. The Agnostic stands between the Theists and the Atheists, saying to both: "You profess to know too much. We assert that we do not know and cannot know about God."

M. A., Philadelphia.—I have just commenced teaching a Bible Class of married men. We do not propose following the Lessons, but take different parts of Scripture to study. Can you tell me of some book that will help us in the study?

The best plan is to take up the Lesson, which is more widely discussed than any other religious topic in the world. Ten million persons study it simultaneously all over Christendom. If you do not take the Lesson, then procure a Bible Commentary, which can be bought of almost any bookseller.

V. L., Leavenworth, Kan.—In what part of the Jordan was Jesus baptized?

The exact scene of the baptism is disputed. The Evangelists imply that it took place at Bethabara, "beyond Jordan," and St. John distinctly asserts that "these things were done" there. Others hold that it took place at a point near Jericho, and when Dr. Talmage, during his recent journey to the Holy Land, baptized a believer in the ancient river, he chose the latter spot. Eminent Biblical students say that the oldest MSS. extant declare that the baptism of Christ took place near Bethany. Lachmann and Tischendorf favor Bethany; Origen and others, Bethabara.

J. M. B., Chambersburg, Pa.—Of what country was the Prodigal Son, and to what Church did he belong?

The parable of the Prodigal Son was intended by our Saviour to be of universal application. It did not refer to a native of any country, nor a member of any church or sect in particular, although the parable was told to the Jews. Prodigals are found in every land. The object of the parable was three-fold: (1) to show the folly and sinfulness of riotous living, and the duty of repentance; (2) the sinfulness of indulgence in a selfish and jealous disposition, as illustrated in the case of the elder son, and (3) the readiness of our Heavenly Father to welcome us back and forgive us, if we come to him in the right spirit.

J. M., Nutley, N. J.—Is it right for a follower of Jesus Christ to belong to a secret society which is for the purpose of mutual benefit?

Provided the Society presents no features that are objectionable on the ground of morality, and leads to no practices inconsistent with Christian life and character, there would seem to be no reason why it should be opposed on religious grounds. The element of secrecy, however, is one that often operates as a cover for much that is to be deplored. Certain Christian denominations have denounced some secret societies as leading to habits of intemperance, while others have opposed them because they introduce in their ceremonials irreligious rites in which no Christian can conscientiously participate.

H. H. C., Marshall, Texas.—(1) What is the plural of apteryx? (2) Are all names of families in zoology accented on the antepenult? (3) Is the Comte de Paris living? (4) History says of James I. of England, "Strictly speaking, his claim to the throne was not perfect." Why not, since he was the nearest living descendant of Henry VII? (5) How happened it that Henry II. of France had two sons named Francis?

(1) Aptera, the generic term, may be applied as the plural. (2) See a dictionary or a manual of zoology. (3) He is living, but in retirement? (4) Which history says so? (5) It was not unusual for royalty and the heads of noble houses to give to more than one son the name they wished their successor to bear, so that in the event of the death of the elder son, another, bearing the same name, might come to the throne or the title. As illustration: In the Warwick family, it has been the boast of the house that for generations almost all the Earls have been named Guy? To perpetuate this, more than one son receives the name of Guy, although, having three or four other names, he may not be so designated unless called to succeed to the earldom through the death of an elder brother. Doubtless Henry II. meant thus to provide that his successor to the throne should be called Francis, after Henry's own father, Francis I.

T. H., Lexington, Ky.—What is the best book published in reply to Ingersoll?

Several have been written controverting this infidel lecturer, one that has attained a very wide publicity being the series of ten sermons by Rev. Dr. Talmage, which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD early in 1882. In these discourses, Dr. Talmage took up, seriatim, the principal assertions of the infidel and answered them. Another book is that issued by several Chicago clergymen jointly. Dr. Joseph Parker, of London, has also preached a number of sermons in reply to Ingersoll and able answers have been contributed to the North American Review by ex-Premier Gladstone, of England, Rev. Henry M. Field, of New York and Judge Black. The best of all answers is the Bible itself, which Ingersoll has purposely distorted to suit his agnostic views.

G. K. J., Philadelphia.—When we die, do we go straight to heaven, or do we lie in the grave until Resurrection Day and then go?

There is no direct and explicit statement on the subject in the Bible. There are, however, many passages from which we may infer that the spirit has a conscious existence in the interval between death and resurrection. The Apostle Paul would scarcely have desired "to depart and be with Christ" (Phil. 1: 23) if he had not believed that he would be with Christ immediately after death. If he had thought that his soul would sleep with his body in the grave until the resurrection, a man so intensely desirous to serve Christ as he would have recoiled from death. Then, too, Moses, who, we are told, died and was buried, (Deut. 34: 5 and 6) appeared on the Mount of Transfiguration with Elias. (Matt. 17: 3.) It is difficult, also, to understand the Parable of Dives and Lazarus (Luke 16: 19-31) on any other theory than that the disembodied spirit is in conscious happiness or misery in the interval between death and resurrection.

O. McN., Boise City, Idaho.—How did the different nations of the world measure time, and how do their adjustments compare with our own?

Chronology, or the division of time, is of two sorts—mathematical and historical. The earliest form of chronological computation was by "generations," or the lives of leading persons in a nation. The Greeks measured time by Olympiads or periods of four years each. The Romans dated events from the building of their city. The Mohammedans dated from the Hegira, or Flight of Mohammed, in 622 A. D. Long after the birth of Christ, the Romans and Greeks used their old systems of time measurement. Until the end of the 15th century, France computed by periods of fifteen years which were called "indications." The adoption of the Christian chronology did not generally begin till about 527 A. D., and it is now universally used wherever Christ is worshipped. China, Babylon and India had complex systems of their own. The Hebrew system reckons from the Creation, estimating 4,000 years between that event and the birth of the Saviour.

Miss T. G. M., Wyckoff, N. J.—Did Adam and Eve actually eat fruit in the garden of Eden, or is the saying a parable?

The only source of information is the Bible narrative and it contains no intimation that it is to be understood otherwise than literally. Theologians who have preferred to regard the narrative as a parable or allegory have usually been led to do so by the suggestion that the eating of fruit which was "good for food," and "pleasant to the eyes," and was moreover within reach, was an offence too venial to have been justly visited with a punishment so severe and far-reaching. The objection, however, is not well founded, because it ignores the main point involved. The gravity of the offence consisted, not in the act itself, but in the fact that Adam and Eve in committing it were consciously and wilfully violating God's explicit and emphatic command. They were punished for disobedience. If we suppose that it took some other form than the actual and literal eating of fruit, the principle was the same. There is therefore no valid reason for rejecting the Bible narrative or putting any other construction on the words than their literal meaning.

A DISSATISFIED MOSLEM.

The following incident is related of the beginning of the work, Miss Taylor is doing among Mohammedan girls, at Beyrout, in Syria. Seeing, how they were neglected Miss Taylor asked the mothers, if they would let their daughters come to a school if she opened one. Fifteen of them promised. The mothers came at first to hear what the children were taught. Then they trusted her. On the second day, she took her Bible, and told the mothers, she would teach them a little prayer. She read it to them, and asked them if they thought it was a right one. They said they saw no harm in it, and she has taught them the Lord's Prayer ever since, and has read the Bible with them, and expounded it to them. They became truthful and honest after being some time in the school.

The effect of the establishment of this and other schools for Moslem girls, was to provoke the Moslems themselves to jealousy, and they set up schools of their own, but many of the children were still sent to Christian schools. An old Mohammedan, however, feeling ashamed that foreigners should come and teach their children in a Moslem land, got his daughter to remove her two girls from Miss Taylor's school and send them to the Moslem school. One day he thought he would go and see how they were getting on. As he was going in, he heard the teacher raging at the children and invoking a curse upon their grandfathers. He thought to himself that he was the grandfather of two of them, and they were not sent to school to learn evil tempers and to curse their ancestors. They could learn that upon the streets. So he had them sent back to Miss Taylor's, remarking that they had not women of their own fit to train children. What was needed was character, and he was glad to have his granddaughter sent where upright character was formed under moral and religious training.

A PREACHER EMANCIPATED.

ALTHOUGH it is not uncommon to hear of a sermon being blessed of God to the emancipation of hearers it is out of the usual course to hear of a preacher owing his emancipation to one of his own sermons. Yet that is the story Rev. W. E. Cousins tells in the African, Dr. C. E. Welch's Missionary Magazine. He says that a small church at Androakely, in Madagascar had for its pastor a very pious and eloquent man named Rainitondro, who was a slave. He has been an earnest Christian worker for years, but he was much hindered by the claims of his master upon his services. For two years he prayed earnestly that he might have more freedom to carry on his pastoral work, but he seemed, as he thought, to have prayed in vain. At last, however, the evangelist in charge of this group of churches told the Prime Minister about the good work Rainitondro was doing, and soon after this he was sent for to preach in the Palace Church. The Queen was so pleased with him that she determined to pay his owner the sum at which he valued the man so as to redeem him, that he might be able to devote all his time to the work of his church. Rainitondro was duly sold to the Queen by whom he was emancipated and he is now school-teacher as well as pastor, and he appears to exercise a strong influence for good in the district.

BUNCE'S BREAKFAST.

How Filial Love Succeeded in Mending a Broken Life.

ATURDAY night had come and the streets were crowded with busy people buying provisions for Sunday's dinner, and bonnets and hats and bits of finery, which would duly appear in church next day. The men had received their week's wages, and promises made earlier in the week of what should be done "when father gets his money" were being fulfilled—that is, some of the promises were; others were not; but then they had been made conditionally, for there were some homes in which all promises having a money basis were necessarily of an uncertain character. Father would get his money—all that he had earned; but if he happened to have been off drinking for one day, there would be only five days' wages for him to draw, instead of six, and perhaps, too, that would not arrive at home intact.

In a cross street, not so brilliantly lighted as the one in which the stores were, several covered passage-ways gave admission to a row of rear tenements. Quiet Paradise Place certainly was, but unspcakably dull. The houses were let as a whole, or by the single room, to suit the convenience of tenants, who, as a rule, not exactly from desire for convenience, adopted the single-room arrangement.

James Bunce lived in one of those houses, and hired three rooms, of which one was kitchen and sitting-room by day and his son's bedroom at night. A second was Bunce's bedroom, and the third, originally intended to be a wardrobe, and having no window in it, was a bedroom for Bunce's daughter Jennie, twelve years old.

"Hallo, Jennie; ain't father home yet?" said a boy, who had just come in.

The girl addressed was a very pretty child, but her face wore the look of care and premature womanliness which comes on the faces of some motherless girls. It looked very pathetic on Jennie's face which seemed formed rather for smiles than for sadness. She was bending over an old frock and using all her ingenuity to fill up a large hole with a patch.

"No, Tom; I guess he's at the grocery. He'll be pretty bad when he does come, I'm afraid. You'd better undress and get to bed before he comes. If he cuts up rough you'll have it, if you're around."

"Not I, Jennie; it's no worse for me than you, and I guess I can stand it if you can." The boy flung himself, dressed as he was, on the heap of rice-bags which served him as a bed, and clasping his hands behind his head, lay watching his sister at her task.

"Say, Jennie," he said at last, "ain't there any way of keeping father home to-morrow? Couldn't you get all his money off him to-night? Seems to me he's been getting worse ever since mother died."

"That's so," Jennie assented. "I don't know what's to be done. What are the bar-rooms like, Tom? I suppose they're better than our places, ain't they? Father seems to hate the sight of home now."

"Oh, yes, they're fine enough—looking-glass all around and shiny shelves and glasses and little images and a good stove and lots of lights. They're splendid!"

"You won't ever go there, Tom, when you're a man?"

"Not I. I've seen enough of it with father. Why, if he didn't go there, Jennie, you'd have a good frock, and I'd have good shoes, and perhaps we'd go to school. No; I'm a temperance man, I am."

"That's right, Tom. You hold on to that, and some day you'll earn as much as father, and have a house of your own to live in."

"Then I'll take care of you, Jennie; but you haven't said whether there's any way of keeping him at home to-morrow."

"I don't know as there is, Tom. Maybe if we got him a good breakfast and made the place tidy a bit he wouldn't go. How much money have you got?"

"It's thirty cents now. I got five cents to-night for holding a horse," and the boy rose to show his hoard.

"I've got a quarter, Tom. What do you say to buying a breakfast with it? We could do it for that. But it's a shame to have your money off you when you're saving for your shoes."

"I don't mind, Jennie; you can have it if you think it'll keep tather out of the saloon."

It was a risk, for it was all they had, and the investment was doubtful. There was no certainty that Bunce would be bribed to stay in his home, after all. They decided to try it, however, and Jennie slipped out to make the purchases. As she passed the grocery, she heard her father invited "to oblige the company with a song," and Bunce responded with "Home, sweet home." She hurried on with a sad heart, for there was a huskiness in her father's voice foreboding that in an unpleasant sense there would be "no place like home" that night for her. The little parcel which the half dollar bought was carried home and hidden away, and presently Bunce's stumbling feet were heard on the stairs. The next hour was a bad time for the two children, Bunce having apparently left his good-humor behind at the saloon. At last, grumbling and swearing, he shuffled off to bed, and was soon snoring loudly.

Early the next morning Jennie spread an old apron of her mother's on the rough table to do duty as a table-cloth, and laid out the breakfast in the most attractive form she could think of. She stepped back to take a final view of it, and being satisfied, roused Tom to get his judgment.

"That ought to do the business, Jennie. It looks good; you got a lot for the money." Then they sat down and ate a crust of bread and drank some water.

Bunce waked up with what is technically known as "a head on him." To Bunce himself it seemed less like a head than a palpitating, throbbing bundle of nerves. The first thing must be a drink, and, half dressed, he shuffled into the kitchen and seized his hat and coat to go to the saloon for a whiskey-sour. He was in a limp, flaccid condition, a pitiable object. His glance fell on the table and the unusual preparations. That was the moment the children had waited for.

"Father," said Jennie, timidly advancing to do the honors as hostess, "here's a nice breakfast—hot coffee and a mutton chop. It's all ready; come and sit down. Tom and I have had our breakfast."

Bunce looked bewildered. First he glanced at the breakfast, and then at Jennie's upturned face, and then at Tom, whose eyes were pleading eloquently. Bunce wanted to go, but he had not arrived at the stage of utter indifference to his children. He could forget them in the saloon, but he had been a good father once, and had not lost all his paternal feelings. He could not resist Tom's earnest seconding of his sister's invitation: "Have some before you go, father; it'll spoil if you don't, and Jennie got it all herself to surprise you." So he sat down with a perplexed face. He had no appetite, but the hot coffee suited him, and after a deep drink of it, his wits seemed sharpened. He began to realize the situation. "How did you get this, children?" he asked. "You seem to be fond of your poor father, after all."

"Of course we are," said Jennie, kissing him; "and you're fond of us, ain't you, father? We've nobody but you to love us now."

Tears came into Bunce's eyes as he looked at the two children dependent on him for love and guidance. It was true they had no one but him, and he knew he had been like a broken reed and no support at all for them. He kissed them, and told them he did love them, and then went on with his breakfast.

Jennie had her mother's Bible ready on the mantle-shelf, and when Bunce was through, she pleaded with him to stay and hear her read a chapter. Now she did not go to school, there was no one to hear her read, and she might be forgetting. Bunce sat and listened while Jennie read about the prodigal son, and another chapter. It seemed comfortable there, and the reading carried his mind back to old times, when he was not "drunken Bunce," but a smart, bright lad at home, with a good father and mother, and later to the time when he and his young wife used to go to church regularly, and were so proud of their two children. Conscience was beginning to work, and Bunce, though he sat silent, was mentally busy. He thought he had some back-bone left yet, and surely his children were more to him than the men in the saloon. But it would be a hard fight, and maybe it was not worth making, if he was sure to be beaten in the end.

"I must go now," Bunce said at last. "I'll soon be back, though." The children's hearts sank. They had heard that promise many times. Jennie put her arms around his neck, and begged him to stay. Tom held his hand and said, "Don't go to the saloon this morning, father; we'll do anything for you if you won't go out."

"I must go," said the man. "Let me get up Jennie, I can't stand it any longer. I ain't going to the saloon. I'm going to sign the pledge!"

A HYMN IN A SALOON.

SOME special religious meetings were being held in a town, the people of which were notorious for their drinking habits. They were chiefly working shoemakers in receipt of good wages, most of which found their way to the saloons. They came to the services in large numbers attracted by the music and singing, which were unusually good. But one night, there was some kind of celebration among them in connection with their trade. The saloons were full and the hall in which the meetings were held was comparatively empty. "I never saw a town," says the Evangelist, who conducted the meetings, "where the love of music was so general. There was singing late that evening in every saloon, but it was generally of a wicked and often of an obscene kind. In one of them a man, when his turn came, staggered to his feet and commenced the familiar words, which he had heard at our meetings, 'We shall have a new name in that land.' It was the first time a song of that nature had been heard in the saloon, and his companions were struck dumb for a moment or two with the incongruity of the thing; then one of them broke the silence by saying, 'Look here, it is no use your singing that, you will never be anything but Drunken Joe all your life.' They came back to the meeting the next night, and Drunken Joe was there. He told me, had come 'meaning business.' He was scared. He said, 'A man told me last I should never be anything, but Drunken Joe all my life. I have always meant to reform some day, but when he said that I learned what our people thought of me, I thought it over myself, and I began to believe, they were right. I cannot afford to have it go on any longer, for if I do, I shall die as Drunken Joe. I'm going to quit now, if it isn't too late already. What do you think?' I assured him it was not too late. He was in earnest and he gave his heart to God that night. It is more than two years ago, now and Joe has held fast. He is a marked man, too, for he is the leader of a little band of Christian men, whom he has been the means of rescuing from a depraved life."

MONEY OR THE BIBLE.

AN eccentric Christian gentleman of large wealth, living in the suburbs of London was celebrating his birthday recently. All his servants were summoned to the library with the intimation that the old gentleman intended to make each servant a present to commemorate the day. "I have a number of Bibles here," he said, "well-bound and well printed. I will give one to each of you, or any who prefer it, may have the value of the Book in money. The groom chose money, as he could not read and the Bible would be of no use to him. He could, as his employer suggested, get some one to read it to him, but still he preferred the money and the old gentleman handed it to him. The gardener wanted some money for a specific purpose, and he, too, received his present in that form. The cook said she never had time for reading and would take the money. The chamber-maid already had a Bible and also preferred money. The other servants for a variety of reasons made the same choice. Only one, the errand-boy chose the Bible. He said he had been going to Sunday School, and wanted a Bible. He was a poor boy and he looked rather longingly at the pile of little gold coins from which the old gentleman was taking one at a time to give to each servant who decided for the money; but he was quite sure that the Bible was what he wanted. The Book was handed to him with the remark, "You have chosen wisely, my boy. You are of the same mind as the great king who said that God's word was more to be desired than gold. Read the book and you will find it so." The boy took the book and went away with the other servants, who laughed at his simplicity. There was no laughing, however, when the boy opened his Bible and found between its leaves a bank note for five pounds (about $25), which the old gentleman had placed there and which was worth ten times as much as the gold coins each of the other servants had received.

A RENEGADE'S INFLUENCE.

INVITATIONS were being sent out for a supper and dance by a party of fast men. "Let us ask Rogers," suggested one of them. "He would not come," said another, "or if he did it would be to preach and pray, and spoil the fun." The first speaker, however, persisted, saying that Rogers had given up "non-sense of religion and was a good fellow again." Unhappily his statement was only too true. Rogers had been among the converts at a revival, but had lapsed into worldliness after a few months of loud profession. He accepted the invitation and was one of the most reckless men there. During the evening he danced with a lady who said to him, "Do you know that your being here to-night decides a struggle I have had? I meant to quit this life after to-night and see if I could not get religion. It was pretty hard to do, but I knew you had done it and I heard you say at a meeting that you were happy without that kind of pleasure. I thought if you were happy I could be happy too, and I meant to try. But I see you can't get along without the old pleasure; so I shall not try." At the end of that dance Rogers quitted the party and went home. "Is it possible," he cried, "that I have not only lost my own soul but have caused the loss of another!" The appalling responsibility so weighed upon his mind that he sank into despondency and in his despair committed suicide. "No man liveth unto himself."

TEN MINUTES.

WE are but minutes—little things!
Each one furnished with sixty wings,
With which we fly on our unseen track:
And not a minute ever comes back.

We are but minutes; yet each one bears
A little burden of joys or cares;
Take patiently the minutes of pain—
The worst of minutes cannot remain.

We are but minutes; when we bring
A few of the drops from pleasure's spring,
Taste their sweetness while yet we stay—
It takes but a minute to fly away.

We are but minutes—use us well;
For how we are used we must one day tell:
Who uses minutes has hours to use—
Who loses minutes, whole years must lose.

Hot Weather Necessities.

Notice the large square package in the front rank. That's where it belongs—ask any woman who has used it. See what it does. It saves work, saves strength, saves health, time, and temper. It saves wear and tear, too—and that's money. Delicate summer clothes don't have to be rubbed and wrenched when they're washed with Pearline. Everything is washed easily—and safely. Pearline doesn't do any more in warm weather than in cold, but you seem to need it more then. It's a necessity. But it's a luxury, as well. Try it in the bath, and you'll think so.

Beware

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, do the honest thing—send it back. JAMES PYLE, New York.

AMONG THE WOMEN OF INDIA.

THE experiment of introducing Bible-women in Christian work in India is proving very successful. Miss Abbott, who is superintending the work in Bombay for the American Board, relates an incident which shows how they are received. She says: "Early in the year, as we were leaving a house, we found a Hindu woman awaiting us with an invitation from her mistress for us to cross the street and visit her. We found a large house, in which many families apparently were living. We had a hearty welcome from the landlady, and after seating us in a large hall she screamed at the top of her voice to the different women, telling them to come and see the Madam Sahib. A company of twenty-four, a few men among them, were soon seated about us, and in our chat I very soon spoke of Christ and his love. The face of our hostess immediately lighted up, and she turned to the women, saying, 'She is going to tell us of Christ.' I said: 'Bai, you know about Christ, I am sure?' 'Yes,' she answered, 'I had a very good son; he went to a mission school and then to Wilson College, and he often told me of Christ; but now he is dead, and for a long time no one has told me of these things. When I saw a lady going so often to a house across the street, I said that must be a lady that tells about Christ, so I called you in.' We have visited her once a week ever since, with but few exceptions. Sometimes we have a large company, and sometimes we are taken upstairs to a more private apartment, where seven or eight women gather to hear the sweet story. It must be that some of these are not far from the kingdom. We have also gained entrance into four other Brahman houses during the year, new places."

"Three women who had been laboring as Bible-women through the year, and another was employed for part of the time. The work has progressed in a more systematic way, and I am sure greater good has been accomplished."

A CHINESE SUFFERER FOR CHRIST.

A PENALTY Chinamen sometimes have to bear for becoming Christians is illustrated by the following incident contained in a letter recently received from Mr. D. B. Thompson, of Kui-chau: "I was catechising in the chapel some who wished to be baptised, and a young man was among them who had been to the meeting and bought a Bible and a hymn-book. We knew him quite well, but not of any special circumstances in his case. I said to him, 'Well, my brother, what have you got to say? How long is it since you began to love the Lord? Get up and tell us.' He stood up and said, 'It was on a Friday night; I was in the street chapel. I heard you speaking about Jesus being a friend that would stick closer than a brother. Now, I wanted such a friend; and when you told us how good and kind and true he was, I just went home, blew the light out, so as not to let anybody see me, and I asked the Lord Jesus to be my Friend. And he is my Friend. I love him; and that hymn, 'Jesus loves me, this I know,' is what I like.' Then he added, 'I want you to pray for me, because I have been put out of my situation.' This is a frequent result to those who trust in Christ and become Christians, and connected with us. But he got a little place of his own, and is getting on very well, shuts up his shop on Sundays, and comes to the worship. This young man was interested about his wife—quite a young girl—about eighteen. We got her to come and live at our house, and to-day, through the influence and life of the native helpers, she has become a Christian, has been baptized, and is a living a consistent life."

A PERSIAN CONVERT MARRIED.

In a letter to the Church from Miss C. G. Montgomery, who is laboring at Hamadan, Persia, is the following account of the marriage of a convert: "Last year we needed some sewing done; a young girl was recommended to us, and we engaged her. After being with the girls some time, and seeing them at their lessons, she expressed a desire to learn to read, so at once began to take one lesson every day. After awhile she became a day scholar, and at last wished to be taken into the house as a boarder. She remained about a week, when some Mussulmans found it out, and made a fuss, threatening her father with punishment if she were allowed to remain. Then she was forced to leave, but she had learned the truth, and continued to read the New Testament with her brother, who was in the boys' school. Then a young man who had remained unmarried, because he could not find a Christian wife, heard of her, and got his friends to arrange a marriage for him. They were first married according to Persian law and custom; but afterwards, one evening, when station meeting was at Dr. Alexander's, they came there, and Mr. Hawkes remarried them with the Christian ceremony. At once the young wife began to teach another woman in the house to which she went to read the New Testament, and she brings her to prayer meeting very often. Thus the circle widens, the light shines from one to another. May the day be hastened when the True Light shall shine in every heart and every home in Persia."

SELF-SUPPORT IN JAPAN.

AN INCIDENT of a Congregational Convention in Japan is reported to the Missionary Herald by Rev. O. H. Gulick, which deserves notice. It is only a question of a small sum of money, but it is significant as an indication of the sincerity of the converts. Mr. Gulick says that at the Convention of preachers and evangelists recently held, a report was made by Mr. Kogita—a last year's graduate from the theological department of Doshisha—now evangelist at Yatsushiro, who has led his people on to the high resolve that they will henceforth be self-supporting. Heretofore this church has received monthly aid of twelve or thirteen dollars from the Missionary Society for the support of their evangelist. Now Mr. Kogita and his people have decided that they, numbering seventy or eighty persons, with the blessing of God upon a spirit of consecration, can, and will, support their own work without aid from abroad. During the past year they have paid off a debt of sixty or seventy dollars that remained to complete the purchase of their church building. "This movement for self-support is," says Mr. Gulick, "the most joyful event reported this year, and is an omen of great promise to our churches and our work."

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—Cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

A KING'S DAUGHTER.

Margaret Bottome and the Work she is Doing for the Master—A Life of Service.

JUST seven years ago, a woman sat meditating in the parlor of an uptown residence in New York. To a strong, earnest face, lighted up by kindly eyes, glowing with expression, there was added a sweet sadness that bespoke a sympathetic temperament. She had just parted from several ladies with whom she had been conversing as to the best methods of organizing for Christian work among the women of New York. She, as well as many others, had been doing effective individual work for the Master for many years; but all felt the need of an organization which would give force and direction to the work.

The lonely thinker was Mrs. Margaret Bottome, the wife of a Methodist clergyman of New York City. She had read the Sacred Word and interpreted it in her own earnest eloquent way, in the parlors of the wealthy as well as in the attic homes and tenements of the poor, and she keenly felt the inadequacy of that little unorganized band of women to deal with the problem of Christian service in the great city. The fashionable world would have willingly made much of her, but she cared little for its adulation. She kept resolutely on with her work, waiting and praying for a time when she could be of greater use to the Master.

Mrs. Bottome possesses all the qualities of a leader of women—such qualities as go to make great generals and commanders among men. To executive capacity and firmness, she added the optimistic faculty of taking a cheerful view of things, thus enabling her to surmount obstacles that would impede less generous and helpful natures. Frequent conferences with minds which, like hers, were active and interested in the cause, soon decided her to take action looking to the formation of an organized movement. She knew there were thousands of noble women throughout the country ready to enter gladly into such a movement, under intelligent direction. As for the field it was literally "ripe to the harvest." Were there not on every side hundreds crying for succor—the poor, the unfortunate, the homeless, the naked, the sick, the ignorant; it was a field whose scope was absolutely boundless. How to occupy it—how to enlist the pure hearts and active sympathies of the women of America, to set them to work intelligently in it, and above all, how to glorify the Master in the highest degree, by the service so rendered—this was the complex problem she had to solve. "One half the world little knows how the other half lives;" could this upper half be transformed into an army to do battle against the evils besetting the lower?

To Mrs. Bottome, primarily, and to a group of other pious women in conjunction with her, is due the organization of The King's Daughters, a society which now numbers its branches by thousands all over the land. One afternoon in the month of January, 1886, nine ladies met at 47 West 22d Street, New York City. All were devoted Christian women and a majority were actively engaged in the Master's work at that time. Their hostess, Mrs. Margaret Bottome, a sweet-faced matron approaching middle life, had already become noted for her singular piety and consecration, and also for the manner in which God had blessed her efforts at turning the minds of many worldly people in New York and elsewhere from the frivolities of this life to the things of the better kingdom.

The ladies who met on that occasion, after discussing the various methods of doing effective work and comparing notes and experiences, finally accepted Mrs. Bottome's suggestion to organize a Society whose scope and field would embrace the doctrine contained in the motto: "Faith, Hope and Charity." Mrs. Bottome was chosen President, Mrs. M. L. Dickinson, Secretary, and Mrs. Hamersley, Treasurer. The others who were present and who pledged their prayers and efforts for the success of the new venture were: Mrs. Theodore Irving, Mrs. F. Payson, Mrs. C. P. P. DeField, Mrs. J. F. Ruggles, Miss S. B. Schenck and Miss G. H. Libby. When a plan of organization had been definitely sketched out, the next thing to be done was to agree upon a name for the new Society. One after another was suggested and rejected in rapid succession.

"I propose that the title should be 'The King's Daughters,'" said Mrs. Theodore Irving.

Mrs. Irving was the wife of an Episcopal clergyman, and after his death, conducted a private seminary for young girls in Montreal, Canada, where she organized a Society under the same name, but totally dissimilar in its workings. For a long time she was thought to be the originator of the name, but she has since disclaimed the honor, for it was discovered that an association bearing the same name had already existed in Massachusetts. The suggestion of the name by Mrs. Irving, however, was made in good faith, and the fact that other organizations had already borne it, has in no wise militated against its popularity in the present instance. Many believe that the original suggestion for the name may have been found in the Forty-fifth Psalm, verse 9, in which David, telling of the majesty of Christ's kingdom, says: "Kings' Daughters were among thy honorable women."

Mrs. Bottome has since then discovered another fact which shows the designation to have been applied at a date still more remote, to a somewhat similar organization in Virginia. In that State, there existed a Society of Kings' Daughters nearly a generation ago, and long anterior to the Montreal organization founded by Mrs. Irving.

These and other investigations added interest to the situation. Soon "The King's Daughters" became known far and wide for the energy of its membership, the steady growth of its numbers and the intense devotion that characterized the organization as a whole. The details of the general scheme of organization are mainly the result of Mrs. Bottome's executive brain. The general governing power is vested in a Central Council, consisting of the following ladies: Mrs. Bottome, President; Miss Kate Bond, Vice-President;

Mrs. M. L. Dickinson, General Secretary; Mrs. G. H. Kirby, Treasurer; Mrs. Isabella Charles Davis, Corresponding Secretary; Mrs. J. F. Ruggles, Recording Secretary; Miss Margaret Barker, Mrs. Seth Low, Mrs. David H. Greer, Mrs. William B. Skidmore, Mrs. C. DeW. Bridgman and Mrs. A. S. Barnes. The Council has the power to fill its own vacancies, and is legally incorporated, as well as the main body.

"Circles," as the different branches of the order are designated, are governed on the same plan as the Central Council. There is no special work laid down for any Circle, and the members are left free to choose their own field of Christian usefulness, recognizing only one responsibility—that of thoroughness for the Master. All the branches are in the closest and most harmonious relations with the Central Council, accepting its decrees and submitting to it regular reports of their undertakings. The model of government is liberal and harmonious, and one well calculated to encourage everywhere the desire to accomplish the greatest possible good. Besides which the King's Daughters serve their Lord and Master. There is hardly an ill that afflicts the poor, hardly a burden under which the lowly and humble suffer, which the Daughters are not ever ready to ameliorate and to lighten. They are in very truth "ministering angels," whether as such they come to the sickroom, the workshop, the market or the street. In business or pleasure, indoors and outdoors, by day and by night, they find their mission work ready. To feed and clothe the destitute, to comfort the sorrowing, to nurse the sick, to enlighten the ignorant and to point out to those sunk in sin and misery the loving Christ and the attractions of his service—these are among the tasks which it is their daily pleasure and duty to fulfil.

Among the different circles and branches, Mrs. Bottome moves like a guiding spirit, diffusing by her presence a feeling of enthusiasm among the members, and kindling the fires of energy and activity everywhere. She has the entire confidence of the members, who regard the beloved foundress of their order as a mother rather than as a chief officer, and whose ambition it is to emulate her high spiritual nature and entire devotion to the Master's service.

There are no longer any geographical limits to the Order of the Kings' Daughters, which has expanded beyond all expectations, within the six years since its organization. Many thousands of the best women in America, representing every Protestant denomination, belong to the Order, and it has been a potent factor in the development of new and valued Christian activities in connection with church work. In the larger cities especially, where the organization finds its ranks steadily swelling, the churches now recognize it as a most able adjunct, in city, home and foreign mission work, as well as in stimulating the energies of practical Christian workers in other and more familiar fields, including the home circle itself. The problem of industrial education has also been taken up by the organization, as well as the training of nurses, the medical education of intending missionaries, the providing of Christmas and Thanksgiving dinners, the furnishing of rooms for impoverished families, the buying of shoes for the children of the poor, supplying garments for destitute families in the South, and a thousand other ways of helping their fellow-beings and at the same time advancing Christ's kingdom.

Where'er the sick and faint
Bear their burdens, make their plaint,
Where the stricken human soul
Cries to God to make it whole;
There The King's own children go,
Seeking but His will to know,
Pressing on through flood and flame,
"For His sake, and In His Name."

Mrs. Bottome is wholly devoted to her work, and has grown very dear to every "Daughter of the King." In a recent greeting to the organization, she wrote in the following encouraging strain:

"Whatever your outward circumstances may be, as 'Daughters of the King' our chief joy is the glory within. As the years go by, I am more and more impressed with the one word we have emphasized from the first, 'within.'—'The King's Daughter' is all glorious within. In traveling, during this year, in monarchical countries, where the lines between royalty and those not of royal blood were so sharply drawn, I often said: 'I am so glad that we are of a royal line, all children of The King; and the royal robes are not to be laid aside at death; our royalty goes with us—it is within. Let us make most of the most important things as the Christian days go by. Christ is all and in all. And above all gifts let us make the most of the gift of his dear Son. And above all gifts that we can give is the Christ-like spirit. O, to be so like him that it will be easy for those around to believe in him; to be living pictures—living epistles. This is the need of the weary, hungry world to-day.'"

MARGARET BOTTOME.

There is not a State in the Union, hardly a city or town, where the Silver Cross is unknown to-day, and where the organization, started so humbly by nine godly women a few years ago, has not its thriving branches.

the regular membership fee of one dollar a year, every member pays ten cents per annum to the Central Council, through its treasurer. A one hundred dollar contributor is ranked as a "donor."

There are many ways, simple in themselves, yet graceful and effective, which Mrs. Bottome and her associates have devised for keeping the fraternity of the organization intact and the relations of the many branches of The King's Daughters harmonious. One of these devices is the organization badge, a beautiful little Maltese cross of silver, finely chased and bearing the letters I. H. N.: "In His Name." This is emblematic of the purpose of the organization, whose members are banded together "In His Name" as common workers in the cause. The cross also bears the year of the Society's institution, "1886." To the badge is attached a purple ribbon, the royal color, which appropriately carries out the significance of the insignia.

THE PRESENT AGE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached at the Chautauqua Assembly on the banks of Monona Lake, near Madison, Wis., last Sunday morning, July 26th. His text was: Esther 4:14: Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?

ESTHER the Beautiful was the wife of Ahasuerus the abominable. The time had come for her to present a petition to her infamous husband in behalf of the Israelitish nation, to which she had once belonged. She was reluctant to undertake the work, lest she should lose her own life; but her uncle, Mordecai, who had brought her up, encouraged her with the suggestion that probably she had been raised up of God for that peculiar mission. "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" Esther had her God-appointed work; you and I have ours. It is my business to tell you what style of people we ought to be in order that we may meet the demand of the age in which God has cast our lot. If you have come expecting to hear abstractions discussed, or dry technicalities of religion glorified, you have come to the wrong place; but if you really would like to know what this age has a right to expect of you as Christian men and women, then I am ready in the Lord's name to look you in the face. When two armies have rushed into battle the officers of either army do not want a philosophical discussion about the chemical properties of human blood or the nature of gunpowder; they want some one to man the batteries and swab out the guns. And now, when all the forces of light and darkness, of heaven and hell, have plunged into the fight, it is no time to give ourselves to the definitions and formulas and technicalities and conventionalities of religion. What we want is practical, earnest, concentrated, enthusiastic and triumphant help. What we need in the East you in Wisconsin need.

In the first place, in order to meet the special demand of this age, you need to be an unmistakably aggressive Christian. Of half-and-half Christians we do not want any more. The Church of Jesus Christ will be better without ten thousand of them. They are the chief obstacle to the Church's advancement. I am speaking of another kind of Christian. All the appliances for your becoming an earnest Christian are at your hand, and there is a straight path for you into the broad daylight of God's forgiveness. You may have come here to-day the bondsmen of the world, and yet before you go out of these doors you may become the princes of the Lord God Almighty. You know what excitement there is in this country, when a foreign prince comes to our shores. Why? Because it is expected that some day he will sit upon a throne. But what is all that honor compared with the honor to which God calls you—to be sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty; yea, to be queens and kings unto God? "They shall reign with him forever and forever."

But, my friends, you need to be aggressive Christians, and not like those persons who spend their lives in hugging their Christian graces and wondering why they do not make any progress. How much robustness of health would a man have if he hid himself in a dark closet? A great deal of piety of the day is too exclusive. It hides itself. It needs more fresh air, more out-door exercise. There are many Christians who are giving their entire life to self-examination. They are feeling their pulses to see what is the condition of their spiritual health. How long would a man have robust physical health if he kept all the days and weeks and months and years of his life feeling his pulse instead of going out into active, earnest, everyday work?

I was once amid the wonderful, bewitching cactus growths of North Carolina. I never was more bewildered with the beauty of flowers, and yet when I would take up one of these cactuses and pull the leaves apart, the beauty was all gone. You could hardly tell that it ever had been a flower. And there are a great many Christian people in this day just pulling apart their Christian experiences to see what there is in them, and there is nothing attractive left. This style of self-examination is a damage instead of an advantage to their Christian character. I remember when I was a boy I used to have a small piece in the garden that I called my own, and I planted corn there, and every few days I would pull it up to see how fast it was growing. Now, there are a great many Christian people in this day whose self-examination merely amounts to the pulling up of that which they only yesterday or the day before planted.

O my friends! if you want to have a stalwart Christian character, plant it right out of doors in the great field of Christian usefulness, and though storms may come upon it, and though the hot sun of trial may try to consume it, it will thrive until it becomes a great tree, in which the fowls of heaven may have their habitation. I have no patience with these flower-pot Christians: They keep themselves under shelter, and all their Christian experience in a small, exclusive circle, when they ought to plant it in the great garden of the Lord, so that the whole atmosphere could be aromatic with their Christian usefulness. What we want in the Church of God is more brawn of piety.

The century plant is wonderfully suggestive and wonderfully beautiful, but I never look at it without thinking of its parsimony. It lets whole generations go by before it puts forth one blossom; so I have really more heartfelt admiration when I see the dewy tears in the blue eyes of the violets, for they come every spring. My Christian friends, time is going by so rapidly that we cannot afford to be idle. A recent statistician says that human life now has an average of only thirty-two years. From these thirty-two years you must subtract all the time you take for sleep and the taking of food and recreation; that will leave you about sixteen years. From those sixteen years you must subtract all the time you are necessarily engaged in the earning of a livelihood; that will leave you about eight years. From those eight years you must take all the days and weeks and months—all the length of time that is passed in childhood and sickness, leaving you about one year in which to work for God. Oh, my soul, wake up! How darest thou sleep in harvest-time and with so few hours in which to reap? So that I state it as a simple fact that all the time that the vast majority of you will have for the exclusive service of God will be less than one year!

"But," says some man, "I liberally support the Gospel, and the church is open and the Gospel is preached; all the spiritual advantages are spread before men, and if they want to be saved, let them come to be saved; I have discharged all my responsibility." Ah! is that the Master's spirit? Is there not an old Book somewhere that commands us to go out into the highways and the hedges and compel the people to come in? What would have become of you and me if Christ had not come down off the hills of heaven, and if he had not come through the door of the Bethlehem caravansary, and if he had not with the crushed hand of the crucifixion knocked at the iron gate of the sepulchre of our spiritual death, crying, "Lazarus, come forth"? Oh, my Christian friends, this is no time for inertia, when all the forces of darkness seem to be in full blast; when steam printing-presses are publishing infidel tracts; when express railroad trains are carrying messengers of sin; when fast clippers are laden with opium and rum; when the night-air of our cities is polluted with the laughter that breaks up from the ten thousand saloons of dissipation and abandonment; when the fires of the second death already are kindled in the cheeks of some who, only a little while ago, were incorrupt. Never since the curse fell upon the earth has there been a time when it was such an unwise, such a cruel, such an awful thing for the Church to sleep! The great audiences are not gathered in the Christian churches, the great audiences are gathered in temples of sin—tears of unutterable woe their baptism, the blood of crushed hearts the awful wine of their sacrament, blasphemies their litany, and the groans of the lost world the organ dirge of their worship.

Again, if you want to be qualified to meet the duties which this age demands of you, you must on the one hand avoid reckless iconoclasm, and on the other hand not stick too much to things because they are old. The air is full of new plans, new projects, new theories of government, new theologies, and I am amazed to see how so many Christians want only novelty in order to recommend a thing to their confidence; and so they vacillate and swing to and fro, and they are useless, and they are unhappy. New plans—secular, ethical, philosophical, religious, cisatlantic, transatlantic. Ah, my brother, do not adopt a thing merely because it is new. Try it by the realities of a Judgment Day.

But, on the other hand, do not adhere to anything merely because it is old. There is not a single enterprise of the Church or the world but has sometimes been scoffed at. There was a time when men derided even Bible Societies; and when a few young men met near a hay-stack in Massachusetts and organized the first missionary society ever organized in this country, there went laughter and ridicule all around the Christian Church. They said the undertaking was preposterous. And so also the work of Jesus Christ was assailed. People cried out, "Whoever heard of such theories of ethics and government? Who ever noticed such a style of preaching as Jesus has?" Ezekiel had talked of mysterious wings and wheels. Here came a man from Capernaum and Gennesaret, and he drew his illustrations from the lakes, from the sand, from the ravine, from the lilies, from the corn-stalks. How the Pharisees scoffed! How Herod derided! How Caiaphas hissed!

MEETING BESIDE THE HAYSTACK.

And this Jesus they plucked by the beard, and they spat in his face, and they called him "this fellow!" All the great enterprises in and out of the Church have at times been scoffed at, and there have been a great multitude who have thought that the chariot of God's truth would fall to pieces if it once got out of the old rut.

And so there are those who have no patience with anything like improvement in church architecture, or with anything like good, hearty, earnest church singing, and they deride any form of religious discussion which goes down walking among every-day men rather than that which makes an excursion on rhetorical stilts. Oh, that the Church of God would wake up to an adaptability of work! We must admit the simple fact that the churches of Jesus Christ in this day do not reach the great masses. There are fifty thousand people in Edinburgh who never hear the Gospel. There are one million people in London who never hear the Gospel. There are at least three hundred thousand souls in the city of Brooklyn who come not under the immediate ministrations of Christ's truth; and the Church of God in this day, instead of being a place full of living epistles, read and known of all men, is more like a "dead-letter" post-office.

"But," say the people, "the world is going to be converted; you must be patient; the kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of Christ." Never, unless the Church of Jesus Christ puts on more speed and energy. Instead of the Church converting the world, the world is converting the Church. Here is a great fortress. How shall it be taken? An army comes and sits around about it, cuts off the supplies, and says: "Now we will just wait until from exhaustion and starvation they will have to give up." Weeks and months, and perhaps a year, pass along, and finally the fortress surrenders through that starvation and exhaustion. But, my friends, the fortresses of sin are never to be taken in that way. If they are taken for God it will be by storm; you will have to bring up the great siege guns of the Gospel to the very wall and wheel the flying artillery into line, and when the armed infantry of heaven shall confront the battlements you will have to give the quick command, "Forward! Charge!"

Ah, my friends, there is work for you to do and for me to do in order to this grand accomplishment! Here is a pulpit, and a clergyman preaches in it. Your pulpit is the bank. Your pulpit is the store. Your pulpit is the editorial chair. Your pulpit is the anvil. Your pulpit is the house scaffolding. Your pulpit is the mechanic's shop. I may stand in this place and, through cowardice or through self-seeking, may keep back the word I ought to utter; while you, with sleeve rolled up and brow besweated with toil, may utter the word that will jar the foundation of heaven with the shout of a great victory. Oh, that to-day this whole audience might feel that the Lord Almighty is putting upon them the hands of ordination. Every one, go forth and preach this Gospel: You have as much right to preach as I have, or as any man has. Only find out the pulpit where God will have you preach, and there preach. Hedley Vicars was a wicked man in the English army. The grace of God came to him. He became an earnest and eminent Christian. They scoffed at him, and said: "You are a hypocrite; you are as bad as ever you were." Still he kept his faith in Christ, and after awhile, finding that they could not turn him aside by calling him a hypocrite, they said to him: "Oh, you are nothing but a fanatic." That did not disturb him. He went on morning, I license you. Go preach this Gospel—preach it in the Sabbath schools, in the prayer meetings, in the highways, in the hedges. Woe be unto you if you preach it not.

I remark, again, that in order to be qualified to meet your duty in this particular age you want unbounded faith in the triumph of the truth and the overthrow of wickedness. How dare the Christian Church ever get discouraged? Have we not the Lord Almighty on our side? How long did it take God to slay the hosts of Sennacherib or burn Sodom or shake down Jericho? How long will it take God, when he once arises in his strength, to overthrow all the forces of iniquity? Between this time and that there may be long seasons of darkness—the chariot-wheels of God's Gospel may seem to drag heavily; but here is the promise, and yonder is the throne; and when Omniscience has lost its eyesight, and Omnipotence falls back impotent, and Jehovah is driven from his throne, then the Church of Jesus Christ can afford to be despondent, but never until then.

I think that before the sun of this century shall set the last tyranny may fall, and with a splendor of demonstration that shall be the astonishment of the universe God will set forth the brightness and pomp and glory and perpetuity of his eternal government. Out of the starry flags and the emblazoned insignia of this world, God will make a path for his own triumph, and, returning from universal conquest, he will sit down, the grandest, strongest, highest throne of earth his footstool.

Then shall all nations' song ascend
To Thee, our Ruler, Father, Friend,
Till heaven's high arch resounds again
With "Peace on earth, good will to men."

I preach this sermon because I want to encourage all Christian workers in every possible department. Hosts of the living God, march on! march on! His Spirit will bless you. His shield will defend you. His sword will strike for you. March on! march on! The last despotism will fall, and paganism will burn its idols, and Mohammedanism will give up its false prophet, and the great walls of superstition will come down in thunder and wreck at the long, loud blast of the Gospel trumpet. March on! march on! The besiegement will soon be ended. Only a few more steps on the long way; only a few more sturdy blows; only a few more battle-cries, then God will put the laurel upon your brow, and from the living fountains of heaven will bathe off the sweat and the heat and the dust of the conflict. March on! march on! For you the time for work will soon be passed, and amid the outflashes of the judgment throne, and the trumpeting of resurrection angels, and the upheaving of a world of graves, and the hosanna of the saved and the groaning of the lost, we shall be rewarded for our faithfulness or punished for our stupidity. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting, and let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen and Amen.

AN UNCOMPLIMENTARY REPLY.

"I REMEMBER," says an earnest Christian worker, who in his younger days was an unbeliever, "how an apprehension which caused me much distress was unceremoniously removed. I used to spend part of my college vacation with a friend in the country who was like myself a sceptic. During our walks and talks in his garden I noticed a young man who was employed as a gardener listening intently to our conversations, while he was potting plants near the arbor in which we were sitting. After my conversation the thought of this gardener recurred to me and I trembled as I thought of the mischief that an unlearned man might have received from hearing the infidel talk of college graduates. I sought him out, therefore, and told him of my conversion and my fear on his account. "Oh," he said, "you need not have feared. I heard you, but I only thought how ignorant you were."

THE STREET OF SORROWS.

EAST Twenty-sixth Street, New York, has acquired the name of "the Street of Sorrows." It is rightly named, because, clustered around down by the river, there are city hospitals and dispensaries with out-lying pavilions, the Morgue, where unclaimed dead are brought and piled into rough pine boxes. At the end of the pier come boats to take prisoners to the work-house and penitentiary on Blackwell's Island, and boats to take sick poor to the Charity Hospital. All day long the procession comes down the street. Criminals in cage-like wagons, the sick in ambulances and invalid chairs, and the dead in the city hearse. Plenty of sorrow may be found in other streets by those who look for it, but it is thrust on the gaze unveiled in "the Street of Sorrows." As the Christian sees its heart-rending spectacles, he blesses God that the day is coming when such scenes will no more be witnessed, for they will disappear when he comes to reign, who is called "The Man of Sorrows." (Isa. 53: 3.)

A DECEPTIVE VANE.

PERSONS accustomed to pass the New York General Post-Office every day do not pay any attention to the direction of the vane above it. They know that it may not indicate the direction in which the wind is blowing. Strangers and occasional passers-by are, however, often misled by it. It pointed constantly to the East for ten days recently, though in that time the wind changed to every point of the compass. One citizen complains that he sustained a severe wetting because he trusted it. He believed there could not be rain while the wind was blowing in the direction the vane indicated; but the wind was not blowing in that direction and the citizen was caught without an umbrella. It appears that the vane is too heavy to move easily and it remains stationary until a gust of wind with almost the strength of a gale turns it around. Its vagaries form a legitimate ground for complaint against the Government officials who have charge of the Federal building and the demand is made that if the thing will not change with the wind it shall be taken down and its place occupied by one that will do so. The same demand is often made on the Church, not as to the vanes on its spires, but as to the ministers in its pulpits. Unhappily some are yielding to the demand in spite of the Apostolic injunction not to "be carried about by every wind of doctrine," but to "speak the truth in love." (Eph. 4: 14.)

A LONG-SUFFERING WIFE.

THE police of New Jersey are looking for a man whose conduct has been singularly brutal. He was formerly in business in Amsterdam, but becoming dissipated he was involved in financial difficulties, and, deserting his wife, he came to America. He brought with him a degraded woman whom he married in New York. He settled down in Hoboken, N. J., and commenced business. Two months ago he wrote to his real wife, who had taken refuge with her parents in Amsterdam, declaring himself penitent and begging her to come to him. He said he had separated from his wicked companion forever and would be a true and faithful husband as long as he lived. The wife freely forgave him, left her father's home and crossed the Atlantic. Her husband met her at the pier, but his manner was cold and repellant. With some circumlocution he told her that though in a moment of repentance he had, as he wrote her, severed his vicious association he could not shake off his infatuation and was again living with her rival. He proposed that as his wife was here and had no money nor home, she should go to his home, here, and he would introduce her as his cousin. The poor woman in her extremity and trusting too much to her own power of winning back the affection of the man she still ardently loved, yielded and submitted to the indignity of the plan he proposed. But she was ill-treated and finally was deserted again. Then she appealed to the law. A man who could be inhuman to a woman so magnanimous must be despised by every one as a disgrace to his race. Yet it is not uncommon to find men who have abjured the world and sworn fidelity to Christ returning to the world, loving it and serving it, while outwardly keeping up the Christian profession, "Fearing the Lord and serving their own gods." (ii. Kings 17: 33.)

A WINGED MESSENGER.

A MERCHANT doing business in San Francisco, whose home is in the country, five miles away from his store, set out for the city one morning recently leaving his dearly loved child sick at home. The little boy was supposed to be merely ailing from a slight cold, but during the day he became worse and the mother recognized the symptoms as those of malignant diphtheria. There was no doctor at hand and prompt medical attention, she knew, must be had or the child would die. In the emergency she determined to make use of a carrier pigeon, which her husband had made it his hobby to train. She wrote a note fully describing the child's symptoms, tied it under the pigeon's wing and sent it up, confident that it would fly to the store. It did so; the merchant carried the note to the best physician in the city, obtained a prescription and had it made up. A small phial was attached to the pigeon and in ten minutes the bird was back again in the home with the medicine. It was administered and the child recovered. The anxious mother's act was an excellent illustration of the exercise of faith. Believing that her child would surely die if no help could be obtained, she was really staking the precious life on the pigeon carrying her letter safely and quickly to her husband. If with like confidence the awakened sinner commits his salvation to Christ, he will surely be saved. (ii. Timothy 1: 12.)

VEGETABLE INSECT TRAPS.

SEVERAL new kinds of tropical plants have been placed in the Botanical Garden, at Washington, D. C. The Star of that city, says that much interest is caused among amateur botanists by the latest additions made to the hot-houses. Among them is a plant with large pitcher-like blossoms growing from its stem. They contain a fluid of which frogs are fond. A small frog hopping into one of these receptacles is unable to get out after imbibing the fluid which attracted it, as thorns project from the interior of the cup downward, and bar the exit of the frog. Belonging to the same species of carnivorous plants are some, of which specimens have also been sent to the Garden, that have a peculiar attraction for beetles, cock-roaches, ants, bees and butterflies. All the plants are provided with similar means to prevent the escape of the prey. This is in most cases a coating of fine bristles directed inward and downward which effectually hold the insect until it dies, when the flower digests it. Superintendent Smith "feeds" these plants with raw meat, chopped fine, there being few insects in the hot-houses compared with the number they need to sustain life. In their native clime, the Superintendent says, if one of these pitcher flowers is cut open, from one two hundred ants or bugs may be found in them, which being undigested, must have entered within twenty-four hours. To find animal life sustaining vegetable life is a reversal of the common experience. We are more accustomed to seeing vegetable life sustain animal life. Unhappily, however, though the plants are unfamiliar to us, their way of life is not. The saloon, the gambling-den and the haunts of vice thrive in the same way, by attracting victims within, to perish there. (Prov. 4: 14-17.)

Volume XI., of The Christian Herald, containing the numbers for 1886, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office: price $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885 and 1887, are also for sale.

HEDLEY VICARS AND THE BIBLE.

performing his Christian duty until he had formed all his troop into a Bible-class, and the whole encampment was shaken with the presence of God. So Havelock went into the heathen temple in India while the English army was there, and put a candle into the hand of each of the heathen gods that stood around in the heathen temple, and by the light of those candles, held up by the idols, General Havelock preached righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. And who will say, on earth or in heaven, that Havelock had not the right to preach?

In the minister's house where I prepared for college, there was a man who worked, by the name of Peter Croy. He could neither read nor write, but he was a man of God. Often theologians would stop in the house—grave theologians—and at family prayers Peter Croy would be called upon to lead; and all those wise men sat around, wonder-struck at his religious efficiency. When he prayed he reached up and seemed to take hold of the very throne of the Almighty, and he talked with God until the very heavens were bowed down into the sitting-room. Oh, if I were dying I would rather have plain Peter Croy kneel by my bedside and commend my immortal spirit to God than some heartless ecclesiastic arrayed in costly canonicals. Go preach this Gospel. You say you are not licensed. In the name of the Lord Almighty, this

CHRIST'S AUTHORITY.

S. S. Lesson for August 9th, By Mrs. M. Baxter. John 5: 17-30. Golden Text, Matt. 28: 18.

NEVER was there a man so subject to authority as the Man Christ Jesus. "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of Me," he says, "for I am meek and lowly in heart." (Matt. 11: 29.) When he came into the world, it was to do the will of another (Heb. 10: 5-8); his first recorded utterance upon earth was: "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" (Luke 2: 49); it was his "delight" (Ps. 40: 8), his "meat" (John 4: 34), his "practice" (John 5: 30) to do his Father's will. We have already seen that he waited for his Father's will as to the very hour and moment in which he should do all which his Father gave him to do; his times, as well as his actions, were all subject to his Father's will. He spoke no unauthorized word, and was, in every detail of his life, under obedience. Yet never was any man possessed of such authority as Jesus Christ, the Son of God! Shall we not learn the lesson which God so seeks to teach us, and which human nature is so slow to learn, that is the best fitted to command? In the temple, as a child of twelve years old, Jesus, taking the position of a learner, hearing and asking questions, became, by his very answers, master of the situation. Already, the power of those words which he spake, not of himself; but from the Father who dwelt in him, was beginning to be manifest. In the very outset of his ministry, his hearers were "astonished at his doctrine, for he taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes." When, at the same time, an unclean spirit manifested its presence in the synagogue where Jesus was teaching, Jesus rebuked him, commanding him to come out of his victim, and was immediately obeyed.—"They were all amazed, inasmuch that they questioned among themselves, saying, What thing is this? What new doctrine is this? for with authority commandeth he even the unclean spirits, and they do obey him." The winds and waves obeyed him, to the astonishment of his own disciples, the loaves and fishes multiplied in his hands. Pharisees, scribes, and Sadducees were silenced by his simplest words; sickness and death fled at his touch.

He Who Best Obeys

Never was there such Authority.

The Jews would have been well pleased if Jesus had only said, "The Father worketh hitherto." But when he said, "My Father worketh hitherto," and then unhesitatingly asserted, "And I work," leaving it to be inferred that the Father and he were doing the same work, and working in unison, this roused all the enmity which was in them. They would not believe that this Jesus was the Messiah; they had their own ideas of what the Messiah was to be, and this humble, unpretentious Man in no way answered to the ideal they had in their minds. So they set him down as a pretender in spite of his holy presence, in spite of his mighty works, in spite of his unanswerable words.

But Jesus continued teaching them, whether they would hear, or whether they would forbear; "Verily, verily, I say unto you, the Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do: for what things soever he doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise." Our blessed Lord, misunderstood, reckoned an impostor, knowing that all he was saying went against the grain in his hearers, yet does not wait to explain or justify himself; he simply delivers his message as he receives it from above, and leaves all the consequences to him under whose authority he was. What a lesson for us all of simple trust and of self-renunciation! "For the Father loveth the Son, and showeth him all things that himself doeth, and he will show him greater works than these that ye may marvel. For as the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will. For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son; that all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father. He that honoreth not the Son honoreth not the Father which hath sent him." But these words, incomprehensible as they must have been to those minds, blinded by prejudice, to those hearts, full of self-importance and self-interest: how full they are to us! Oh, how they teach us the truth, that God can only make known his ways to the obedient, but that to them that obey him and yield to his will, he will unfold his very heart and make them like their Lord, his "friends" and fellow-workers. (John 15: 14, 15; II. Cor. 6: 1.)

And now the Lord reveals his authority, his "power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life." "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him who sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." Sin came into the world, and death by sin, through man turning from the Word of God to the representation of the enemy in the garden of Eden. Life comes through turning back to give heed to the Word of God, and to receive as our own personal Saviour and Lord, Jesus, as sent from God, as the gift of God, bringing life and salvation. He who hears Jesus and believes, passes from death unto life, from the condemned cell into freedom, and the "no condemnation" of them who are in Christ Jesus. (Rom. 8: 1.) He passes from death in trespasses and sins which a conscience, either asleep or unawakened causes, from dead prayers, dead praises, dead knowledge, dead works, which are all duty and no privilege, from constraint, with no joy in God, no fellowship, no heart to heart communion, no power to tell others of his love—to "the glorious liberty of the children of God," in a sense of pardon and of sonship.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live." It is not the assent to the doctrine of justification which quickens souls into life; it is the recognition that Jesus the Son of God.

Speaks to Me

and brings me pardon, and peace, and power to live unto God; and I, the poor, guilty sinner, accept him as God's Son, claiming me as redeemed by his blood, to live no more to myself and sin, but unto him that died for me and rose again. It is only the Spirit of God who can quicken man, so that he can hear the voice of the Son of God, not in his feelings, but far deeper down, in the inner man, in that "hidden man of the heart" which we are never conscious of until the Spirit of God moves upon the face of the waters, and arouses us to the reality of God, and of our own immortal existence. No man is really alive unto God who has not heard in the depth of his being the voice of the Son of God speaking to him.

It is indeed another life which man enters when eternal things become actual facts to his spiritual consciousness, and communion with God is not a mere feeling, wrought up by some lively meeting, some earnest preacher, some startling event,—but the voice of the Son of God to the sheep which hear his voice, and respond in the quiet secret of that "hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible." There is nothing transient, nothing corruptible in the real communion of God with our spirits. It is his own eternal life which he gives us, answering back to him, understanding and reciprocating him. King Saul could serve God as long as it suited him, but there was nothing permanent in his relations to God. David could serve God even when it cost him much. He was at home in the valley of the shadow of death as well as in the green pastures. His acquaintance with God was permanent, in the spirit life, not in the emotions.

A HOPELESS CASE.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for August 9. Matt. 28: 18. "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth."

WILL BRETT was a hopeless case. The lawyer said so, and he knew something of him for Will had been his clerk. More than that the minister said so, for, time and again, he had talked to him as a boy and a young man, had encouraged him to reform and pleaded with him. Still more, Will's father said he was a hopeless case. Over and over again he had forgiven him, when Will came to him repentant and promising amendment. But the most serious matter was that Will himself said he was a hopeless case and honestly believed it. The only person who knew him and did not say so was his mother. She would not let go her hope.

What was the matter? Will was a fine young fellow some five and twenty years of age. He was handsome, witty, healthy and intelligent. There was nothing in his make-up to lead the casual acquaintance to say there was no hope for him. But after knowing him a time the fault would be discovered. As one of his associates phrased it, "Will had no backbone." He could be persuaded to do almost anything in the way of dissipation, but he could not be persuaded to stop when he had once begun. He would solemnly vow never to touch a card again. That would be after he had lost all his money and all that he could borrow. But the next invitation would surely be accepted. He would pledge himself never to make another bet, but when he heard of some "sure thing" Will would be more eager than any one to risk his money. And as to drinking, he had signed the pledge again and again, but never kept it many weeks.

What was to be done? No one could suggest any way of saving him. Will himself could think of no way. He did think, when a good and beautiful girl consented to marry him, being in love with the handsome young scapegrace, that he could reform for her sake. But he could not. The very week before he was to be married he was urged to have just one more good time with his bachelor friends before settling down as a married man, and he consented. He so disgraced himself that night that the wedding was indefinitely postponed and the bride's father, who had never been very enthusiastic about the match, told him that he would never own him as a son-in-law. So Will lost heart and was sure that nothing could save him. After coming to that conclusion he grew worse very rapidly. He was reckless, and sank lower and lower. He did some dishonorable things, which made his companions ashamed of his society and caused the heads of families in the town to threaten their sons and daughters of what would happen to them if they were seen in Will Brett's company.

But Will's mother kept on praying. "Nothing short of a miracle can save him, now," a good deacon said to her. "Well," she said, "I am praying to One who can work miracles." At last the town grew too hot for him and Will ran away to avoid arrest. He went to a great city, where no one knew him and where, at least, no one would reproach him with disgracing his family. He did not expect he should live very long. Other people thought so, too, when one night Will was taken into hospital, having been run over while tipsy in the street. But he did not die. He was hurt badly, but he recovered. The chaplain of the hospital came to talk to him when he was well enough to bear it.

"It is of no use," Will told him, "I know all you would say, but I am a hopeless case. I am beyond any man's power to reclaim me."

"That is very likely," said the chaplain. "I have known many who reached that stage; but I never knew one who was beyond Christ's power. That is what can save you."

Will could not believe it. He had received a Christian training, but Christ had always been an abstraction to him. The chaplain talked of Jesus as if he knew him. Will shook his head.

"Perhaps you don't want to be saved," the chaplain said.

"Want to be saved!" Will almost shrieked. "I want it so much that I would be willing to give my right hand for it."

"Well, you can be saved. Now listen to this: What you need is strength. Christ will give you all you need. All power is his in heaven and in earth and he will see you through. Now will you take it?"

The Chaplain left him to think it over, but the next day he was again at Will's bedside. He listened to Will's story, but refused to be discouraged by it. "Christ," he said, "has never taken your case in hand. He never fails. If you trust in his power you are safe."

Will listened and as he listened he became no longer a hopeless case. He trusted in him who hath all power and began a new life in the strength of Christ. His mother's prayers were answered. He was saved by the miraculous power of the Lord, that "all power, in heaven and earth" which is still used for the rescue of sinners who believe on him.

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

MY Father worketh hitherto, and work." There is a lesson in these words for old and young and for great and small. Many Christians will find in them the secret of true happiness. Christ was a busy man. He had no time for the follies of this world. Early in life we heard him say "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" and as soon as we get another glimpse of him we find him still at it, going about doing good, even as he had opportunity. He did not stop to consult convenience, to inquire the day of the week, or the time of the day. With him deeds of mercy were always in order, and so they should be with us. Do you know of an opportunity to do good? Enjoy it to-day—do it now. Don't wait. Death may get ahead of you and then it will be everlastingly too late.

A Bishop gave a clergyman, in response to an appeal for charity in behalf of a sick parishoner, a ten dollar note. The clergyman thanked the Bishop, and putting the note in his pocket, remarked that he would go on his errand of mercy on the morrow. "Tomorrow!" replied the Bishop, "Go at once, sir. Don't keep the poor man without the comfort of that money for twelve long, weary hours. Besides, to-morrow he may be dead."

It is said that Dr. Blair was called to attend a middle-aged, rich lady who had many imaginary ills. He wrote out and left a plain prescription, which ran thus: "Do something for somebody." The Doctor heard nothing from his patient till Christmas morning, when he was hastily summoned to the cottage of her Irish washerwoman. "It's not meself, sir, it's me wrist that's ailin'." Ye see, I was after goin' out into the black darkness for a few bits of wood, when me foot struck this basket. It stood there like a big mercy, as it was full of soft flannel from Mrs. Walker. She towld me that your medicine cured her, doctor; so if you'll plaze to put a little of that same on me wrist, I'll be none the worst for me nice present." "It's a powerful remedy," said the doctor, gravely; and more than once in after years he wrote the prescription, "Do something for somebody."

"Then shall they also answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee a hungered, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee?"

"Then shall he answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me."

"They that have done good unto the resurrection of the Life and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation."

These words are plain. They cannot be misinterpreted. Character decides destiny. If you expect to go to heaven, you must live up to your expectation. If you expect to ensure eternal happiness you must pay the insurance premium in this life. And it will pay you to do it. It is the safest kind of investment. The Insurance Company is the oldest in existence. Its paid up capital is the "Unsearchable riches of Christ." Its assets—an inheritance "incorruptible, and undefiled and that fadeth not away." The cash in bank "Gold tried in the fire." Its surplus: "Able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think." The conditions of the policy are "Repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." The application must be made to the President who is the "King of Kings." The adjuster is the "King's Only Begotten Son." It has no contested claims and unpaid benefits. But you must comply with the conditions or you cannot reap the advantages. You would not think, after a fire has swept away your property, of going to an insurance company and demanding of them that they make good the loss, if you had no insurance there, simply because the company was wealthy and the adjusters known to be kind-hearted men. So you must not think that God will suffer you to inherit eternal life unless here below you comply with the conditions which he has laid down in his blessed Word. The Lord help us so to do.

RELIGIOUS SIMILITUDE.*

Satan's Empire.

THERE was an empire, founded in ancient days, whose dominion embraces all the continents and islands of terra firma. Satan, who wields the imperial sceptre over this vast region, has outlived the ages and rules with the iron rod of absolutism. The lives and property of this despot's subjects are not regarded, but his greatest delight is in the shedding of blood. When not engaged in war, these miserable subjects are handcuffed, chained, and fettered, or else burdened to death under the yoke of servitude.

Now, beyond the confines of this empire exists a very great kingdom, called Heaven. This celestial kingdom is ruled with the rod of love, swayed by Messiah. His subjects are clad in beautiful garments, and are so much loved by him that he does not recognize his people as subjects, but as children, and bestows vast riches upon them. If they suffer, he alleviates their suffering; if they mourn, he comforts them; and when they "pass through the valley of the shadow of death," his rod and staff go with them.

Between the empire of Satan and this celestial kingdom rolls a vast sea, called Time. Over this sea sails a vessel of untold capacity, called The Zion. This vessel has for her commander Messiah. The object of The Zion is to carry those who may be delivered from the tyranny of Satan's empire and entered upon their pilgrimage to the heavenly land.

Upon that end of Satan's empire nearest the seat is built a famous city, whose population is many millions. This is the chief city of the empire and is known by the name of Wickedness, and has walls great and high.

The Lighthouse.

Then Evangelist took him to the deck, and pointed out to him the lighthouse far out at sea. "Do you see that lighthouse out yonder?" asked Evangelist.

"Yes; it is so brilliant that one could not help but see it," replied Pilgrim.

"When you reach there you will find The Faith awaiting your arrival. That light is put there by Messiah to guide seamen through this dark and stormy place."

As the wind was favorable, it was not long until The Repentance arrived at the lighthouse. The anchor was cast, and many people were transferred to The Faith—Pilgrim being among the number. Captain Belief, of this vessel, was the most gentle and mild-spirited man that Pilgrim had ever seen. The graces of Messiah emanated from his face. Now, he was quite affable towards Pilgrim, and asked him to what country he was bound. Pilgrim told him that he was en route to Heaven.

"Well," said Belief, "you will have to be transferred from this vessel to The Conversion after a little time. Here is a chart, called the Bible, that has much to say concerning the country to which you are bound. There are two great lessons that it teaches: first, that man is a sinner, and second, that Messiah came to save sinners. Do you believe these things?"

"I do, with all my heart," responded Pilgrim.

"You take this with you," said Belief: "it will be to you a chart indeed upon Time's great ocean. It will be to you also a compass by which you will be enabled to steer aright. This chart will answer you as a passport. Keep it with you until you enter Heaven."

Miss Pride.

Now, Temptation set sail in the spicy and exhilarating vessel, and it was not long until he overtook The Zion. He first saw a lady, by the name of Miss Pride, who had left the city of Wickedness before Pilgrim. She was standing on deck, and he hailed her and said:

"Miss, you seem to be in trouble to-day. Pray, what is the matter with you?"

"Well," said Miss Pride, "I can't say that I am sick, but somehow I am so dejected."

"My dear lady, I do not admire the manner in which you are dressed. Does the Shipmaster recommend that you should wear that ruffless robe all the time?"

"I must say that he does, and I don't like our manner of dress myself as well as I do the city fashions."

"You certainly look badly. You must forever wear a long face, and must always be uncomfortable, if you would please your hard master. Come and get on board with me, and I will take you back to the city, where you will be free from the trammels of discipline, and where you can dress and act to suit yourself, and be rid of those odd forms and restraints."

So Miss Pride gave Temptation her hand, and was helped down into the fragrant Backslide. Pilgrim, being at the door and hearing the racket, opened it to see what was the matter, when, lo! he saw Miss Pride in the Backslide. On seeing Pilgrim, Temptation raised his hat and bowed to him, with all the air of a city dude, and addressed him as follows:

"Noble sir, I understand that you are a doorkeeper. You have condescended very low since you have left the city. Prior to this, you were exalted highly, and were doing a flourishing business and making thousands of dollars annually, by keeping the city saloon. You are making but little money now, and you had better conclude to return with me to the city, and resume your former occupation."

"I am not making as much money as formerly," said Pilgrim; "but I shall be immensely richer after I reach the destined shore of the heavenly land."

The Landing of "The Zion."

The Zion now arrived in full view of Heaven's wharf. Multitudes of shining ones were on shore, waving banners. The sound of heavenly voices wafted over the breeze, bringing a happy welcome to the passengers, who now stood on deck, viewing the shining shore. At this moment thousands of kerchiefs waved in token of greeting, while the golden sky became full of celestial music.

"I see my darling daughter," exclaimed Mrs. Pilgrim, "who left me many years ago. Many tears have I shed in bitter bereavement, as I thought of her during the past. Ah! there she stands at the beautiful gate, waiting and watching for me."

I heard many more such exclamations of greeting.

The Zion now pushed alongside the wharf, and the voyage was ended. Never was there such a happy meeting and greeting of loved ones since the world was created. Angels cheered and trumpets sounded. "Music, with her silver sound" and swelling numbers, rolled harmoniously, inasmuch as to make Heaven vocal with her strains of praise, while "all the sons of God shouted for joy." The accent, "Home! home! home!" was enough to ravish the soul.

Sometimes I bowed my head and wept; sometimes I laughed, as I stood up in the enchantment. The effect was so overpowering at times that I felt I could not endure it. At last I shouted:

I cannot, I cannot forbear
These passionate longings for home.
Oh, when shall my spirit be there?
Oh, when will the messenger come?

Now I saw that Messiah conducted the Zionists into a spacious hall, and arrayed them in exceedingly white raiment that outshone the sun; and said he, "This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." There now was silence in heaven for the space of half an hour."

THE SEVENTY WEEKS.

An Address at the Recent Prophetic Conference at Clapham, England.*

BY REV. N. S. TAYLOR.

DANIEL understood that four great prophecies were to run their course before the restoration of the Jews to Jerusalem, which event would be accompanied by the return of the Messiah to reign over them. Daniel inferred from his study of the prophet Jeremiah that "seventy years" were to run their course and he naturally concluded that at the period these "seventy years" ceased, the time for the restoration of the Jews to their own land in blessing would occur. But he saw no coming of the Messiah as he expected after the "seventy years."

The Solution of the Mystery

is given in what is known as the "Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks," or properly speaking, "The Prophecy of the Seventy Sevens;" for the word there translated weeks means, as every Hebrew scholar will acknowledge, not a week of seven days necessarily, but a period of seven of any measure of time. The word seven means a definite term which might be days or weeks, months or years, and the context here requires that it should be a seven of years.

We must recognise the completely Jewish character of this prophecy. Daniel's inquiry was concerning the Jews—their restoration, and their triumphant reign, with Messiah over them. There are three periods mentioned in the prophecy. The "seventy weeks," i. e. the seventy times seven years, or 490, are divided into three periods of seven weeks, of sixty-two weeks, and one week. The death of Christ occurred at the end of the sixty-nine weeks, but the prophet was informed that the cutting off of Messiah would not be the end. Seventy weeks were to elapse before it could be said that the transgression was "finished." The word "finished" means restrained. It is so used in the Books of Exodus and Genesis. When the waters ceased the waters were restrained. The wickedness of the Jews was not restrained at Christ's death. The rejection of the Messiah has gone on ever since, and still greater developments of their wickedness are yet to come in the time when it will be fulfilled that "they refused him who came in their Father's name, and received one who came in his own name."

Seventy weeks are determined

To Finish Transgression

and make an end of sin," i. e., to seal up sin. It shall not be restrained until Satan is shut up and sealed up after the Lord Jesus Christ shall have come. Then the Jews will become a saved nation, and never sin any more, but become a regenerate people. Another work to be accomplished by the end of the seventy weeks was to make reconciliation for iniquity. The word reconciliation is, properly speaking, to make a covering. It is used to describe appeasing in any sense. It will be after the Seventy Sevens, when sin is sealed up, that there will be a covering. The covering will then be applied to the Jewish people as a nation. Then "the nation shall be turned in a day and all Israel shall be saved."

In Rom. 11: 26, 27, we read how the prophecy of Jeremiah is applied in the New Testament to the Jewish people and the Jewish nation. The groundwork was laid at Calvary at the end of the sixty-nine weeks, but the application of it, by the restoration of the people of Israel, shall not be effected nationally until the close of the seventy weeks of years.

From a decree to rebuild Jerusalem to Messiah the king, there were to be sixty-nine weeks of years or 483 years. At the birth of Christ, he was not recognized as a king except by the magi, and he refused to be recognized as a king—"Mine hour is not yet." The time came when he revealed himself as a king—the people took branches and strewed them in his way, and cried, "Hosannah! Blessed is the king that cometh in the name of the Lord." He was received then and acknowledged as a king. He fulfilled the word spoken of in Zechariah—"Thy king cometh unto thee; he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass." The Jews refused to receive him as their king, but notwithstanding that, that was his first appearance as a king. Dr. Anderson has gone very carefully into the subject, and he computes the time from the going forth of the decree to restore and rebuild Jerusalem (spoken of in Nehemiah) until the date of our Saviour's public entry into Jerusalem as a king as exactly 483 years. Concerning we read: "And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself; and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary, and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined." And he shall confirm a covenant with many for one week. It does not say the prince that shall come is destroyed. The prince that shall come is Antichrist, the Man of Sin, the Wicked One. Antichrist shall confirm the covenant with multitudes for one week. In the midst of the last week, he shall cause the sacrifice to cease.

In all their errors the Jews have stuck to one great truth—that the Lord Jehovah is the one God, and that he only is to be worshipped. The very reason why many of them do not receive Christianity is because of the idolatry and the spurious miracles they see among Catholics. The miracles, however, will convince them at last. In the last days, according to Revelation, the supernatural is to be resumed; there are to be great signs and wonders, and miracles. Satan always wishes to mimic the Divine, and Satan will enable his man (Antichrist) to perform great miracles. Why not? If Christ had done him homage as the king of this world he might have represented Christ as a great man. "Upon the wing of a demon shall come one that maketh desolate," i. e., Antichrist, the desolator. Then there shall be a time of trouble such as never was from the beginning of the world unto this day. But God's wrath shall be determined upon him in the day of Christ's coming. The Lord shall destroy him with the breath of his mouth and the brightness of his appearing. The basis of atonement was laid in God's mysterious purposes; the casting off of his people was the bringing in of his Church. If the casting away of them be the restoration of the world, shall not the restoring or receiving of them be life from the dead? They who are now groaning under the bondage of corruption shall be brought at the coming of our Lord to the glorious liberty of the children of God.

A FALL INTO A CRATER.

A CABLE dispatch from Naples says that a shocking fatality has occurred on Mount Vesuvius. For some months past the volcano has shown signs of renewed activity and an eruption was feared. Two or three weeks ago, it became quieter but visitors were warned against approaching it, as the quiet might be only temporary. In spite of this warning two Brazilian travellers, accompanied by a guide, determined to make the ascent. They did so on July 1, and reached the top of the mountain in safety. There they were noticed to be standing near the crater, gazing into its depths. Suddenly the whole party was enveloped by a dense cloud of sulphurous smoke, which so stupefied the travellers that one of them reeled about for a moment, then staggered forward and pitched head foremost into the crater. He fell nearly two hundred feet sheer, into the burning lava. The victim had not foreseen the element of danger which stupefied him and rendered him incapable of self-control. Many a man has lost his soul by the same lack of foresight. Venturing too near the temptations to vice which are held out to the unwary, and over-confident in his own powers of self-restraint, the victim is overcome and falls to rise no more. (Prov. 4: 15.)

A DYING MOTHER'S LOVE.

THERE is no earthly love like that of a mother for her child. It approaches nearer to the heavenly love than any other. A correspondent in Shelby, Neb., writes to us as follows:

"I have had to learn life's lessons bitterly, and yet they are worth all they cost me. The sweet memories of childhood and the last scene by mother's bedside come back again. I see the drops of sweat that stood on her pure forehead while I last talked with her and asked: 'How is it in the future?' and her reply, 'Not my will but thine be done.' Her last charge to her boy was: 'Be honest.' When I saw her again, the spirit had fled. We laid her away in the churchyard, in the hope of a glorious immortality."

The son shares the mother's glorious hope. He has long since reached manhood, and has suffered many trials; but amid them all, his faith has remained steadfast. Thousands of America's sons have found, like him, that the memory of a sainted mother has stood as a sacred talisman, between them and sin.

HOW TO MAKE WORK EASY.

THE same amount of Christian work is exhilarating to one man and exhausting to another. In the one case it is a tonic and the other leeches. Why the difference?

In order to work easily the undertaking must be congenial. But you say that much of what is expected of us is repulsive to the natural soul. Our reply is, "Get your heart right and the work will be pleasant. No need of your trying to do Christian work unless you are a Christian."

Do not fret about results. All Christendom engaged in the redemption of one man would make a failure. God only is sufficient. Our work is to bring the soul under the proper influences. We are responsible for means and not for results. Fretfulness is not augmentation, but depletion. The successful Christian workers are without exception cheerful. They do the best they can and then leave the matter with God. We excuse an occasional fit of the "blues," but when the disease becomes chronic the man has all he can do to take care of himself, and has no time for the improvement of others.

If you have the salt rheum, and a man offer you a box of salve that he says will certainly cure you, and you observe that he has on his hand the same disease unhealed, you say, "No, I thank you: if your medicine were worth anything you would cure your own hands." So there is no use in a morbid man of gloomy heart attempting to raise others out of spiritual misfortunes, because his shadowed soul is a slander on his medicine. A man must have both his own feet solidly planted on the Rock before he can pull sinking men out of the floods.

CROAKING FARMERS.

WE rise to give out the hymn. It is the two hundred and seventysixth of "Shovel and Hoe Harmony":

Whistle and hoe,
Sing as you go,
Shorten the row
By the songs you know.

The agriculturists will all join in, while some Lancaster farmer gives the key-note with his pitchfork, and we are favored with drill and threshing-machine accompaniment. The outdoor life of our country friends now begins. We hope they will plow up more health and good cheer than ever before. Standing and walking so much in the sunshine, they ought to be bright and glad. The breath of the fields and woods ought to make them healthy. Their hard work ought to sharpen their appetite three times a day, and afford them eight or nine hours of sound sleep. We pray for their freedom from flood and drought, weevil and curculio; that there may be no long storms after they get the grain down, no ring-boned or spavined horses at the time when they want all the teams, no hollow-horn to depress the cows, no gaps for the rising generation of chickens, no incursion of neighbors' cattle into the bean-patch. We shall have a prosperous agricultural year. "How do you know?" cry out the rural population. "What sign in sky or ground or atmosphere do you judge by?" Our reason for thinking so is that it is almost always so. The good Lord has a way of abundantly blessing the fields. When one crop fails others make it up, as blind eyes almost always insure super-excellent ears. In the last six thousand years we do not believe that there have been twenty that might be called dead failures. We are certain that this year, with not more than one or two exceptions of crops, we shall have large peaches, luxuriant corn, golden wheat, sound potatoes, rich grass, and great affluence of turnips, celery, cabbage, and squash. While you are guessing by the moon, or the squirrel's storage of nuts, or the state of the mountain stream, or the almanac, as to what is coming to pass, we refer to the first agricultural journal ever written, and find in it: "While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease."

DISSIPATING COMPANIONSHIP.

WE were much interested in the account of an entertainment given in London to four hundred blind persons at a tea party. What a novel time they must have had! It was the twelfth annual meeting of that kind. But in reading it, we thought of the fact that in this country we often have what might be called blind tea-parties. So it is when people sit down at a late evening hour, and play the cormorant amid rich indigestibles. Late suppers are getting more and more common. The nearer they are pushed to the midnight hour, the more fashionable. The highly-spiced wines and confections, the rare game, the fruits, the candied temptations, disappear as by magic. The banqueters do not see the irritations of stomach, the feverish headache, the exhaustion, that must come afterward. They are blind to the baleful effects upon their business or professional faculty. They are oblivious to the infraction of inexorable laws. They have no more eye to the consequence of their indulgence than the cattle which break through the bars in the night and devour so much corn that it is necessary to send for the farrier. In fact, they are at a blind tea-party.

Sometimes young men are flattered by invitations to dine with the dissipated. They think it a grand thing to have sat in the company of gay-cravated young men. As they draw the napkin across their lips at the close of the repast, they feel they have made a social achievement. Instead of that, they have given permission to men of base appetites to pat them on the back and take them by the beard. They have forged for themselves a chain of unwise surroundings, which they will not be able to break without a struggle. It only takes one unsafe companion to swamp a pure young man. But at that feast you have formed five or six undesirable acquaintanceships. Through your napkin-ring you ought to have been able to see into disasters to your moral well-being. If you had stirred your cup deep enough you would have roused up a fiery-tongued adder. You might have tasted poison in the pulp of the grapes. You ought to have seen ruin on the half-shell. But you are blind to all the effects of dissipating companionships. Yes, you were sitting and standing at a blind tea-party.

It is at the table many decide their destiny. The kindest, and purest, and best of social ties are here formed. Many people are disagreeably taciturn until they open their mouth to eat something, and then they cannot get the facial vacuum closed again. You may have noticed that the stiff, cold, formal occasions, are those when there was nothing to eat. A sociable without refreshments is a disaster. But the table is also the descending road to many. They start downward between the tureens and butter-dishes, the jingling cutlery beating their march to ruin. There may be nothing but healthy and desirable viands and beverages on the table; but if those who sit with you are not of moral tone, and you knew it when you accepted the invitation, you have made a grievous mistake. "Evil communications corrupt good manners." You did not realize that you were in dangerous proximity. You may think that you saw just where you were; but you did not. You had no more vision than Bartimeus. You were at a blind tea-party. Alexander the Great entertained four hundred captains in silver chairs; but those who knew how to control their appetites, and rightly select their fraternities, sit in chairs whose rungs and arms and back and feet are burnished gold.

SUMMER VISITORS.

THE dog-days are upon us, and everybody is on the go, less particular as to where they go as that they do not stay at home. Everybody wants a change. Inhabitants of the south shore of Long Island have a way of going to Massachusetts for the summer; the people of Massachusetts fly to the sea-shore. It is a game of "Puss-in-the-corner" all around. Everybody who can changes residence with somebody else; and the pawns, the bishops, the knights, the kings, and the queens, all change places on the chess-board. Even the President hies off to Cape May, and the minister drops the "Rev," takes off his white cravat and puts on a black one, and attempts to pass himself off for a layman. Some ministers have been known to laugh and poke their acquaintances under the ribs; some have been seen to run, hop, skip, and jump, and some ministers—we say it sadly—have even been known to go crabbing.

Well, all want recreation and relaxation, and all ought to get it and ought to enjoy it; and there is no better place than off in some quiet retreat where fashion is not known; where are green leaves and blossoming fields; where the forests, God's first temples, invite the nature-worshipper, or where the sea sounds its diapason all the night long. Let who will go to the crowded hotels; but, if our friends will believe it, the real rest and comfort are to be found in the thousand homesteads throughout the country where they take boarders "just for the summer;" where they give you good, plain, wholesome food, and plenty of it; where "a little more butter" does not mean twenty-five cents, and where all the water there is in the milk is first drank in by the cow in her own most excellent way.

Just here, though, there is one thing our recreating friends are apt to forget. Because they have got to a new place where they know no one and have no church ties, they say to themselves: "I guess I won't go to church;" and they prove themselves wonderfully good guessers, for they do not go. "It's too hot," or "He is not much of a preacher," or some excuse of the kind. Friend, with health, with time at your command, blessed by God as you are, cannot you afford to go to that little country church, join in the singing, though it is not as good as that of your quartette choir at home, and listen to the sermon, though it may not have the fire, the rounded sentences, and the eloquent peroration of the Rev. Mr. Cicero? Drink in all the blessings of the country; thank God for so much his bounty spreads before you for your enjoyment, and then, when the first day of the week is come, surely you can afford to give an hour to joining with his people in the confession of sin, the hymn of praise, and in the consideration of his words, whose waters flow unceasingly, and drinking which they shall so satisfy you that you shall never thirst again.

BRIEF NOTES.

Some hundreds of letters of complaint have been received from subscribers who did not receive the issue of July 15th, on time. We sincerely regret the delay which took place in the mailing of that number, but it was unavoidable. As already stated a fire broke out in the press-room while the paper was being printed. Our facilities were restored as speedily as possible and that issue has now been mailed to every subscriber. There will be no further delay.

The Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions writes: "A gift of $3,000 came to the Board of Home Missions the other day from an individual donor in a Presbyterian Church in Buffalo, and, soon after, $500 from a giver in another church in the same city."

Rev. Geo. C. Needham is now planning for a General Conference to be held in Boston the last week of October. He has secured the co-operation of prominent teachers of the Word who will deliver addresses on Theosophy, Spiritualism, The Higher Criticism, and all the prominent heresies of the day. Specialists will give the results of their studies on these subjects, and vindicate the Bible in its verbal and plenary inspiration.

The Snyder Avenue Baptist Church, Philadelphia, of which Rev. J. Wesley Sullivan is pastor, is building a large church in the Southern section of the city to be known as the People's Tabernacle. It will be one of the largest churches in the city and is intended mainly for working people among whom Mr. Sullivan's labors have been signally blessed during his ministry in Philadelphia. It is expected that the new church will be ready for occupation in September next.

The Rev. Stephen Merritt will have the sympathy and prayers of our readers under the sudden bereavement which has befallen him. His only son, Mr. Stephen W. Merritt, a bright young man full of promise, died on Sunday July 19th, at his home at Nyack. It is a heavy blow to this faithful and zealous servant of Christ, but he will be supported under it by the consolations of the Gospel, which he has so often administered to others. In many churches special prayers have been offered for him that God will sustain him under this sore affliction.

Rev. Newman Hall, the author of "Come to Jesus" has decided to resign the pastorate of his church in London. His decision was announced to the church on the occasion of its celebration of its one hundred and ninth anniversary. Fifty years had been under the pastorate of the eminent Rowland Hill, and thirty-seven under Newman Hall. The resignation is to take effect next July, when Mr. Hall will have been fifty years in the ministry.

Grace Episcopal Church, of Elizabeth, N. J., received on July 17, a munificent gift from Mrs. Elizabeth Dean, of Epsom, England. It consists of fifty city lots in the manufacturing suburb known as Elizabethport. Twenty lots are to be used for a recreation ground for children and the remainder as sites for a Mission Hall, homes, and a hospital. Mrs. Dean completed her gift by payment of $5,000 for dues and assessments for city improvements. The Rev. Henry H. Sleeper, the rector of the Church, is making strenuous efforts to turn this splendid gift to the best advantage by raising funds for the erection of buildings.

Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's condition appears from the later cablegrams of last week to be somewhat more hopeful. Prayer is being made continually to God for his restoration to health, not only in his own church and his own land, but in many churches on this side of the Atlantic and in every country in which the English language is spoken. Mr. Gladstone sent to Mrs. Spurgeon a letter of sympathy and many distinguished personages have called to express their concern and their hopes for his recovery. It is realized by Christian men of all denominations how valuable his life is at this juncture, both to the Church and the philanthropic enterprises which he maintains.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

The Chinese Troubles—Labor War in Tennessee—Prof. Koch Retires—The Crop Outlook—The Charges Against De Lesseps.

FOLLOWING upon the recent attacks on the missionaries and native converts in China, comes the news that the whole southern portion of the Celestial Empire is in a state of turmoil. Armed bands of plunderers make business almost impossible. A similar condition of affairs existed before the outbreak of the last great revolution. Le Wing Chuen, the war governor of Formosa, who has long held the outlaws in terror, is in ill-health, and should he die it is believed that event would be the signal for general revolt against Chinese rule in that part of the Empire. Even Shanghai is disquieted over the outlook and the foreign residents are taking precautions in anticipation of trouble. Experience has shown that there is no atrocity impossible to a Chinese mob, especially when it is goaded on by fanatical priests. Commander Marthon of the U. S. Steamer Palos, visited Wusuch after the recent riot and recovered the bodies of Missionary Argent and Customs Officer Green. Mr. Argent was killed by the mob while he was conveying four orphan children to Hankow to be cared for, and Mr. Green was butchered while on his way to assist the missionaries' wives to escape.

Professor Koch's Retirement.

A YEAR ago, all Europe was ringing with the praises of Professor Koch, the discoverer of the bacillus of tuberculosis and both continents hailed him as the saviour of consumptives. The "tuberculin," however, has proved a disappointment and Professor Koch has taken the result greatly to heart, and has resigned all his public offices. The Berlin Academic Senate will bestow an honorary office upon him. It is due to Koch to explain that he always deprecated the premature publicity given to his "discovery," claiming that the complete test of permanent efficacy would require a year or more.

Ex-Premier Gladstone's Affliction.

IN the death of his son, Mr. W. H. Gladstone (whose portrait is given below), ex-Premier Gladstone has sustained the first serious affliction in his family. The eldest son of the great English statesman, although overshadowed by his illustrious father, was a man of many noble qualities. He was a Lord of the Treasury during his father's administration and sat in Parliament for twenty years. He inherited great mental force and possessed other traits which, with fuller development, might have made him very prominent in public affairs. As an orator, however, he presented a marked contrast to his gifted parent, being extremely shy and even awkward, although his speeches were always sensible and thoughtful. He relieved Mr. Gladstone not only of the care of his estate at Hawarden, but of many of the onerous duties of office as well. One characteristic the two had in common—a strong love of literature and a passionate devotion to humanitarian projects. Mr. W. H. Gladstone leaves a widow and three children, his only son being a boy of six years.

MR. W. H. GLADSTONE.

WHAT has proved to be the most serious labor disturbance of the present year began in the mines of the Tennessee Coal Company a few days ago. The Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company employs about 2,000 free miners and from 500 to 600 convicts in its own mines in Tennessee, besides the prisoners from the State prison at Nashville, the convicts it sub-leases to other companies, and those whom it leases from the State of Alabama for working in its mines at Birmingham in that State. Taken altogether, this convict labor force in both States probably outnumbers the free force. Some time ago, owing to the burning of the Nashville prison, 600 convicts were sent to outside employment, being leased to the Tennessee Coal Company—a different concern from the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company—whose working quarters are at Briceville, Tenn. Ever since the convict system went into operation in Tennessee, there has been opposition to it by the free laborers and this proposed new draft of convicts had the immediate effect of arousing the free miners to hostile action. The militia under Col. Sevier, on duty at the convict quarters at Briceville, were surrounded by from 1,500 to 2,000 armed miners who had assembled at Coal Creek, five miles away. A demand for surrender was made by the miners and the troops, being greatly outnumbered, yielded without a blow.

They withdrew from the stockade, and taking the convicts with them, boarded a train for Knoxville. The free miners remained in control and the sheriff of the county immediately made an appeal to Governor Buchanan for troops. The Governor called out the State militia, but meanwhile the Sheriff, being terrorized by the miners' threats and demonstrations, disappeared, and the Governor, acting under the Attorney-General's advice, hesitated before taking any step that would result in bloodshed. The main body of militia remained at Knoxville, expecting the order to advance and give battle to the miners at any moment. The latter sent a committee to Governor Buchanan asking him to arbitrate. He advised that they consent to the convicts returning to work unmolested, and he would then call a special session of the Legislature, and recommend the repeal of the Convict Lease Law. The Committee conveyed the Governor's ultimatum to the miners, who determined to prevent the return of the convicts at all hazards. It is claimed Governor Buchanan has no constitutional right to send troops there in the Sheriff's absence. The situation continues serious, although there is some hope of reaching a peaceful solution of the trouble.

Convicts in a Thunderstorm.

A STRIKING scene occurred during a severe storm at Hartford, Conn., a few days ago. Lightning, in quick and blinding flashes, illuminated the county jail, penetrating every corridor and playing about the cell doors so vividly and terrifyingly that the inmates were appalled. Scores of them fell upon their knees and prayed aloud in shaking tones to God for mercy. "That one thunderstorm," said the jailer, "instilled more piety into the prisoners than an army of chaplains could have done." Long after the storm had passed over and the electric display had ceased, the occupants of the cells were silent and thoughtful.

Venezuela and Reciprocity.

THE Republic of Venezuela has refused to negotiate a reciprocity treaty on the basis suggested by our State Department. The principal reason alleged is that such a treaty would result in a loss of revenue, without any compensating advantage. At the same time Venezuela expresses her goodwill toward this country and a hope for future reciprocity upon terms more advantageous. The communication says: "On account of the very novelty and greatness of the Customs-reciprocity idea, Venezuela is called upon to proceed with the greatest caution. . . . Neither in population, the state of her industries, nor her richness can she compete with the great powers of America and Europe, and as she is at present purely an agricultural nation, producing few kinds of exportable products, it may be expected that this consideration will affect the spirit of your government in treating this question. . . . We have no manufactured products to enjoy the benefits which their multiple products would enjoy here." The conclusion is reached that to accept the reciprocity proposed would reduce the present revenues of Venezuela 33 per cent.

A Pioneer Woman Missionary Dead.

A LADY who had passed almost all her life in missionary labor in the Sandwich Islands and the Marquesas, Mrs. Clarissa C. Armstrong, died in San Francisco last week. She was the widow of the Rev. Richard Armstrong, and one of the last survivors of the missionary force which set out to undertake the conversion to Christianity of the Pacific Island savages in 1819. When the frightful cannibal atrocities took place in the Marquesas in 1831, she, with her husband was there, and witnessed many of the horrors. Since then, the fierce native islanders have come under the gentle influence of the Gospel. Mrs. Armstrong for several years before her death was unable, by reason of her age and weakness, to do much work, but to the last she retained her interest in the missions.

A Cheering Crop Outlook.

LOVERS of peaches will be glad to know that the prospects are excellent for a fine crop this year. The Maryland and Delaware Peninsula, which is the principal peach-growing section of the country, will ship fully three million baskets. For two years past the crops have been small, but this season the "drop" in June was slight, showing that the peach-worm has been unable to do any considerable damage thus far. Old peach-growers say the crop will be a reminder of the great harvest of 1875, when five million baskets were handled by the transportation companies. Other crop news is equally encouraging. In Illinois the wheat harvest is almost completed. Corn is looking fine and spring wheat and oats are making good growth. From Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, Kansas, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Dakota, the reports are uniformly encouraging. In Kansas, which has suffered more than any other State in the Union except probably the Dakotas, from bad crops for several years past, the outlook is exceptionally good and the farmers are working with renewed hope. It is asserted that St. Paul has been made the headquarters of a movement by the United Farmers' Alliances to corner the wheat crop of the country, and that a circular proposing this has been sent to a million farmers, urging them to hold back their wheat until the prices advance.

Founding Hebrew Colonies.

PROJECTS are discussed for the establishment of several Hebrew industrial colonies in different parts of the country, with the view of permanently locating the thousands of Jewish emigrants arriving here every month. While some of the colonies will be provided for by the Baron Hirsch fund, there are others that intend to organize on an independent basis. One of the latter is already established at Alliance, N. J., and another is about to be started at Hulberton in that state. Both colonies are intended to be partly agricultural and partly industrial.

A Great Life Closing in Gloom.

INTELLIGENCE comes that Count Ferdinand de Lesseps, one of the grandest inventive and constructive minds of the present age, and, one whose genius has made a permanent mark on history, is rapidly failing under the pressure of recent misfortunes. De Lesseps has known almost all of the honors that can come to a famous civilian; he has been decorated by many governments and his two great schemes—the Suez and Panama Canals—have made him the greatest engineer in the world. Now, at eighty-six years of age, he is cited to appear before the French Courts to answer charges against him as a member of the governing body of the Panama Canal, that through the misrepresentations and mismanagement of De Lesseps and his associates, the people of France have been duped into investing their money to a fabulous amount in a hopeless scheme; that the Canal "loans" were simply floated to secure funds dishonestly, without the slightest prospect of repayment; that the company is bankrupt and that the Count, foreseeing the inevitable crash, sold out his own Canal stock. These accusations are denied by the aged engineer, who points to the fact that his own and his wife's fortunes, aggregating over one hundred thousand francs per annum, have both been sunk in the enterprise. He declares that the present prosecution is another instance of the ingratitude of nations to those who have spent their lives in their behalf. Ferdinand de Lesseps was born at Versailles in 1805, and has been successively diplomat, consul, prospector, and engineer. In 1840 he matured the project for a canal through the Isthmus of Suez, which was built at a cost of eighty million dollars, a force of twenty thousand natives being engaged nine years on the work. The scheme was carried through in the face of violent opposition, and proved a magnificent success. De Lesseps has many friends who uphold him in his present troubles and are confident that the Panama project, if encouraged, would be equally successful; but so many thousands in France and Austria have already been ruined by it, that it now seems impossible to restore confidence.

COUNT DE LESSEPS.

THE NEW CREATION.

"Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people." Isaiah 65: 17, 19.

THIS passage, like the rest of Isaiah's closing chapters, will have completest fulfilment in the latter days when Christ shall come, when the whole creation shall have been renewed, when new heavens and a new earth shall be the product of the Saviour's power, when, for ever and for ever, perfected saints of God shall behold his face, and joy and rejoice in him. But the work which is spoken of in the text is begun already among us. There is to be a literal new creation, but that new creation has commenced already; and I think, therefore, that even now we ought to manifest a part of the joy. If we are called upon to be glad and rejoice in the completion of the work, let us rejoice even in the commencement of it. The Lord himself will joy and rejoice, and we who are in sympathy with him are exhorted and even commanded to be glad; let us not be slack in this heavenly duty.

He has commenced it thus—by putting new hearts into as many as he has called by his Spirit, regenerating them, and making them to Become New Creatures in Christ Jesus. These the apostle tells us are a kind of first fruits of his new creation. We are the commencement of the future ingathering. Our newborn spirits are the first ripe ears of corn out of a wonderful harvest, that will come by-and-by. The saints' spirits are, first of all, new-created; but their bodily parts remain in the old creation. Hence we suffer pain, for though the Spirit is life because of righteousness, "the body is dead because of sin." By-and-by their bodies shall be new-created, when, from the beds of dust and silent clay, they shall leap up into immortal beauty. The resurrection will be to the body what regeneration is to the soul. When body and soul are thus created anew, the whole earth around them, in which they shall dwell, shall be, at the same time, renewed also; and so God shall make the spirits, the minds, the bodies and the abodes of men all new. These bodies, quickened by his Spirit who dwelleth in us, and united to souls purified and refined, shall tread upon an earth delivered from the curse, and shall be canopied beneath new heavens. Have they not new desires? Should not all above them be new? They shall tread a new earth, for they have new ways.

I. First, then, concerning the joy to which we are called, we would say it is

A Joy in Creation:

"Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth. I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy." I must confess that I think it a most right and excellent thing that you and I should rejoice in the natural creation of God. I do not think that any man is altogether beyond hope who can take delight in the nightly heaven as he watches the stars, and feel joy as he treads the meadows all bedecked with kingcups and daisies. He is not lost to better things, who, in the woods, is charmed with the sweet carols of the feathered minstrels. The man who is altogether bad seldom delights in nature, but goes away into the artificial and the sensual. He cares little enough for the fields except he can hunt over them, little enough for lands unless he can raise rent from them, little enough for living things except for slaughter or for sale. He welcomes night only for the indulgence of his sins, but the stars are not one half so bright to him as the lights that men have kindled: for him indeed the stars shine in vain.

Joy in Nature.

One of the most innocent of joys, apart from spiritual things, in which a man can indulge, is a joy in the works of God. I confess I have no sympathy with the good man, who, when he went down the Rhine, dived into the cabin that he might not see the river and the mountains lest he should be absorbed in them, and forget his Saviour. I like to see my Saviour on the hills, and by the shores of the sea. I hear my Father's voice in the thunder, and listen to the whispers of his love in the cadence of the sunlit waves. These are my Father's works, and therefore I admire them, and I seem all the nearer to him when I am among them. If I were a great artist, I should think it a very small compliment if my son came into my house, and said he would not notice the pictures I had painted, because he only wanted to think of me. He therein would condemn my paintings, for if they were good for anything, he would be rejoiced to see my hand in them. Oh, but surely, everything that comes from the hand of such a Master-artist as God has something in it of himself! There are lovely spots on this fair globe which ought to make even a blasphemer devout. I have said, among the mountains, "he who sees no God here is mad." There are things that God has made which overwhelm with a sense of how can men see them, and doubt the existence of the Deity? Whether you consider the anatomy of the body, or the formation of the mighty heavens, you wonder that the scorner does not bow his head—at least in silence—and own the infinite supremacy of God.

His Omnipotence:

Well, now, if there be—and I am sure there is—something pure and elevating in joy in God as the Creator of ordinary things—as the Maker of all this first creation—much more is there something bright, and pure, and spiritually exhilarating, in rejoicing in God's higher works, in God's spiritual works, in God's new creation. Methinks, if a man feels within him a new heart, and rejoices in his new birth; if he sees in others new and holier lives, and rejoices in them; if he listens to the preaching of the Gospel, and discovers in it new and better principles, such as the old worn-out world could never have discovered—

That Man is a Gracious Man.

There is one reason why you are called upon to rejoice in it, namely, that you are a part of it. I know, when I lay sore sick and tormented in body, it seemed always to be such a joy to me that I myself, my inner self, my spirit, had been new-created, and that my nobler part could rise above the suffering and soar into the pure heaven of the spiritual realm; and I said of this poor body, "Thou hast not yet been new-created. Still doth the venom of the old serpent taint thee; but thou shalt yet be delivered. Thou shalt rise again if thou diest, and art buried, or thou shalt be changed if the Lord should suddenly come. Thou, poor body, thou that draggest me down to the dust in pain and sorrow, even thou shalt rise, and be made anew in 'the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body'; for the new creation has begun in me, even the earnest of the spirit." O beloved, cannot you rejoice in this?

II. And, secondly, it is a joy which

Will Eclipse All

that has gone before. Now, my text is, "And the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind." God's great new-creating work ought to fill us with such joy as to make us forget the old creation, as though we said to ourselves:—What are the sun and the moon? We shall not have need of these variable lights in the perfection of the new creation, for in heaven, "They need no candle, neither light of the sun." What is the sea, though it be the very mirror of beauty? In that new creation there will be no more sea, and storms, and tempests will be all unknown. What are these luxuries of sight and hearing? We shall not want them when our eyes shall behold the King in his beauty in the land that is very far off. The joy of the spiritual is such that, while it admits the joy of the natural, yet, nevertheless, it swallows it up as Aaron's rod swallowed up the rods of the magicians.

As an instance of

The Expulsive Power

of a new delight, we all know how the memory of the old dispensation is gone from us. Brethren, did any one of you ever weep because you did not sit at the Passover? Did you ever regret the Paschal lamb? Oh, never, because you have fed on Christ! Now, I want you to feel just the same with regard to all your former life as you now feel towards that old dispensation. The world is dead to you, and you to the world. Carnal customs and attractions are for you abolished, even as the ancient sacrifices are abolished. What were your sins? They are blotted out: the depths have covered them: you shall see them again no more for ever. Seek not after them as though you had a lingering esteem for them. Let them not come to mind, except to excite you to repentance. What were your pleasures when you lived in sin? Forget them. They were very rapid, deceptive, destructive evils. You have a higher pleasure now which enchants your soul. "Old things have passed away; behold, all things have become new!"

III. It is a present and

A Lasting Joy;

"But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create." Be now glad; and now rejoice: it is a present joy. Take a delightful interest in that which God is now creating in the spiritual realm; though the work be only in the doing, yet be glad concerning it. Be glad in anything that the Lord has created in you. Has he created in you so much of the new life as to have produced conviction, repentance, faith in Christ, hope in the promise, longing for holiness? Be glad in this even if you have other circumstances pressing upon you, and causing you to be heavy at heart. Though you might be mourning because you are so sickly, yet be glad that you are born again. If somewhat distressed because you are so poor, yet be glad that you are a child of God, and have a place in the new family of love. Let the old things go, and grasp the new, the heavenly. The old creation—bear with it a little longer, for the time of your redemption from its bondage draweth nigh. The kingdom of God is within you, rejoice in it.

And I want you, also, to find your joy in the new creation of God, as you see it in others. The angels rejoice over one sinner that repents: surely you and I ought to do so! Try and do good, and bring others to Christ, and when a soul shows signs of turning to its God, let that be your joy. "Be glad and rejoice in that which I create." I have had many rich draughts from this cup. I do not know anything that has made me so happy, hundreds and thousands of times in my life, as to see God at work in men's hearts; and, without exaggeration, to hear of this one and of that brought to Christ through the hearing or the reading of my sermons has been a heaven to me. Oh, you may drink as much as you like of this cup of sympathy with God in his new creation-work! There is no intoxication about it—to find a joy in the work of God in the hearts of others is healthy, unselfish delight.

IV. Again, in the fourth place, it may be said of the joy which we ought to feel that it is

A Joy Which God Intended For Us.

"For, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy." He has made the new city, the new people, the new world to be a source of joy. Do you think you were chosen to be a groaner all your days? Were you called to misery, dear brother? Does Jesus Christ say, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will make you doleful"? Does he say, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, and ye shall find agony in your hearts"? No; but he talks about rest, and peace, and joy, and blessedness. One wrote to me, some years ago, and said that he came into this congregation, and he felt at once that he must be in the wrong place, because he found so large an assembly. God's people, he said, are a small remnant; there are few that shall be saved. He had settled that matter in his own expanded soul. But he was still more sure he was in the wrong place when he looked at me, for I looked happy; and in his judgment, if I had known anything about the experience of a tried child of God, my face would have been much longer, more wrinkled, and more sadly serious. I confess that my face does betray at times the fact that I am happy, and I cannot help it. But when this good man looked round on the great congregation and saw them all looking so happy, he felt that he must get out of the building as soon as he could, for such smiling people could not be the afflicted people of God.

One Man Suited.

He walked, he said, some distance along our streets, feeling heavy at heart because of the joy he had witnessed; but at last he reached a little place in a court. The very aspect of the chapel gave him hope—it was so small, and so hidden away. He entered, and, to his satisfaction, he found in the congregation less than a score: here were the faithful few. At any rate, he could say of this, "Is it not a little one?" The minister was as doleful as could be desired, and the subject was full of lamentation. He tells me that he sat down there in peace, for he found himself at home. I am glad he was suited. Different people have different ways, you know; and some love to be comfortably wretched. But I find myself miserable only when I keep away from my Lord and his work of new-creation. My impression is that I am not right when I give way to depression and melancholy. I certainly should not go to a place of worship

Seeking For Doubt

and grim despondency. Neither should I conclude that I must be on the way to heaven, because I felt in my own heart some of the miseries of hell. When I am despondent, I say to myself, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul?" I probably know as much about depression of spirit as any man that lives; but I consider myself foolish and blameworthy, a fool for knowing so much darkness, and I do not want to feel any more of it.

Now, dear friends, just for a minute upon this creation. I want to show how the work of God does create a joy-making people. As soon as ever we are converted, what is one of the first things that comes of it? Why, joy. The morning I found Christ it snowed very hard. The snow-flakes fluttered around me, like white doves, as I went home; and I felt just as light as those, for my soul was washed whiter than snow. It was not a gloomy winter's day to me: but all

Nature Wore Her Bridal Dress in sympathy with my ecstatic delight. Was it not so with you on the day of your new birth? When you and I see sin subdued, do we not feel happy? Whenever the news comes to me that a man has been reclaimed from drunkenness, or a woman is saved from the streets, or when I hear of a hard-hearted sinner repenting, I rejoice in the Lord.

But, by-and-by, there will be a still greater joy. We shall enter into heaven, and there will be joy among the angels, and joy in our heart over God's new-creation work, which will proceed at a glorious rate. Then the nations will be converted to God, I know not when, nor exactly how, but the day shall come when Christ shall reign from pole to pole. And what a joy that will be! We shall indeed be glad in that which God creates.

V. I finish up with the last point, it is a joy in which

We Share With God.

Gently, my tongue! Timidly and cautiously speak thou here! Here is thy warrant for supposing a fellowship with God and man in this joy—"Behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people." Father, when thy eternal purposes are all fulfilled, thou wilt joy over thy people! Son of God, Redeemer, when all thy agonies shall have received their recompense in the salvation of thy redeemed, thou wilt rejoice over thy chosen. Holy Ghost, when all thy condescending indwelling within us shall have accomplished its design, thou wilt rejoice in thy people! Come now, beloved, rejoice in sympathy with the divine heart! When the father found his son he made the whole household merry, and shall not we be? When the woman had found her piece of money, she called together her friends and neighbors, and she said, "Rejoice with me; for I have found the piece which I had lost." Shall not we rejoice with the Spirit over the lost silver piece? When the shepherd brought home his sheep, he said, "Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost." Come, then, rejoice with the Father, rejoice with the Son,

Rejoice With the Spirit; and if the Lord God, as the Trinity in Unity, invites us to be glad and rejoice in what he creates, let us not hold back, but let us sing his matchless love, and new-creating power, and infinite wisdom. I am sure you will sing, you must sing even now, if you know yourselves to be a part thereof.

And now I close with this observation. Nobody will ever rejoice in this new-creating work of God while he is rejoicing in his own works, and trusting in himself, and boasting his own merits. Some of you are trying to save yourselves, and make yourselves right before God: as well might the dead try to find life for themselves. It cannot be done. You must be made new by a power you have not within yourself—by a divine power. You must be born again, and this is the work of God; not your work. We shall know when his heavenly work is begun in you when you cease from rejoicing in anything that you are or can be of yourselves, and then shall you with us rejoice in that which God creates.

Ring the bells of heaven! Tune your voices, sons of earth! He who makes all things new is on the throne, working out his holy pleasure, Hallelujah! Amen.

"THE HELPING HAND."

A Deserving Mission Home in Detroit, and Its Good Work.

CHRISTIAN work amid the very poor in Detroit, Mich., has received a marked impulse through the energetic efforts of The Helping Hand Mission Home. This deserving charity was established by Mr. Thomas McGregor of Toledo, a broad-minded, Christian philanthropist, for the purpose of bringing under the influence of the Gospel a class of men who have sunk to the lowest depths of destitution and depravity. To these social outcasts the Helping Hand extends a homely and friendly welcome, questioning nothing as to their antecedents or deserts. The only qualification for admission is poverty and dire necessity.

Mr. McGregor, after starting his beloved scheme, worked for it as one inspired. All his energies and means were bent to the uplifting of the homeless and vagabond class, and thousands to-day praise The Helping Hand as the agency, through which they were once more set on the road to the better life. He surrendered a lucrative business as a music dealer, the better to devote himself to the work of salvation in the slums, and he had the satisfaction before his death, (which took place in May last), of seeing his mission, under God's blessing, well established. His was a heroic pioneer work. Had he lived, it was his purpose to have founded similar missions in other large cities. No appeals were made for money; sometimes the treasury was low and there was a gloomy outlook; but the Lord is always able to supply what is required for his own work, and men were not wanting who had been divinely prompted to give of their means to The Helping Hand.

The scene at Mr. McGregor's funeral was a touching and characteristic one. In the Mission Chapel, at 69 and 71 Larned Street, East Detroit, there was an unusually large gathering of the class of men among whom he had labored, and evidences were found on every side showing how he had endeared himself to all. In that gathering there were men of every trade, who, through misfortune or vice, had become outcasts; tramps, denizens of the slums, toughs from the alleys and tenements, yet all ready to testify to their love for the founder and their hearty appreciation of his life-work.

The Helping Hand Mission still goes on with zeal. It is a moral necessity, in a city like Detroit, where there are many waifs and strays steeped in sin, yet ready to accept the invitation to repentance and new life. The services which these outcasts attend are very simple. Singing a hymn, reading the Scripture lesson in which the truth is pressed home with power; then a sermon-talk of plain words, spoken right to the heart in the way that these men can appreciate and, lastly, an invitation to leave the service of sin and enlist under the free banner of Christ. Touching testimony is often given by the men, tears streaming down their cheeks as they thank God for their deliverance. One convert had been a drunkard for twenty years before The Helping Hand set his foot on the Rock of Ages. The Mission building (a picture of which is shown on this page), has been leased for a term of fifteen years and was lately refitted as a chapel, sitting and reading-rooms, laundry, bath-rooms, and sleeping-rooms, where the homeless might find shelter and the destitute be fed. The Gospel is preached twice a day. This work is entirely an unselfish one, no salary is paid to anybody and the Mission is dependent upon the generosity of Christian people for its existence. Those giving evidence of true conversion and a desire to begin a new life, are transferred to a separate part of the home where they are, as far as possible, removed from old associations and temptations and are housed and fed free, until able to procure work, after which they pay board. All the money received from such sources goes towards supporting the institution.

There are thousands of good Christians all over the Union ready and willing to assist in keeping up a mission of this kind to which one devoted life has already been sacrificed. It has been the means of bringing in many hundreds to the fold, and it would be a matter for deep pity should The Helping Hand be allowed to feel the pressure of financial necessity, now that its noble founder and benefactor has passed away. Mr. McGregor's portrait appears at the beginning of this article.

THE SOLDIERS' READING-ROOMS.

A NEW means of usefulness has been added by Rev. R. W. McAll to his mission work in France. This is the "Soldiers' reading-rooms," which he has established in Paris and many provincial towns. "When we remember," says the American McAll Record, "that all the youth of France must pass through the barracks, we recognize the importance of carrying the work of the Sunday School a step farther in the establishment of the soldiers' reading-room. Mr. McAll has not failed in this direction. These are now in successful operation in Paris and in the provinces. Great encouragement was felt from the first in the fact that the perforce was most favorably disposed to the work. The administration has even refunded in proof of its approbation the taxes that have already been paid to the state. It is not known that this has ever been done before for any similar institution. The attendance has been very gratifying. It is estimated that between three and four hundred men have been brought directly under moral and religious influence. Some of them become so fond of the Bible, that they ask to be allowed to take it with them to read and they often ask for letters of introduction to directors in the provinces, when they are removed from Paris, that they may have access to the soldiers' reading-room in the town whither they are going." It is also gratifying to learn that the Temperance Societies are similarly flourishing. In France they are called Societies of the Blue Cross. In many instances, the meetings of the Societies are held in the rooms of the Mission and thus, reclaimed drunkards are brought more directly under the influence of the Gospel.

CONSECRATION.

KEEP my life, that it may be Consecrated, Lord, to thee.

Keep my moments and my days;
Let them flow in ceaseless praise.

Keep my hands, that they may move
At the impulse of thy love.

Keep my feet, that they may be
Swift and "beautiful" for thee.

Keep my voice, that I may sing
Always, only, for my King.

Keep my lips, that they may be Filled with messages from thee.

Keep my intellect, and use
Every power as thou shalt choose.

Keep my will, oh, keep it thine!
For it is no longer mine.

Keep my heart; it is thine own;
It is now thy royal throne.

Keep my love; my Lord, I pour
At thy feet its treasure-store.

Keep myself, that I may be Ever, only, all for thee.

HELPFUL ANECDOTES

A GUIDE'S SELF-SACRIFICE.

A EUROPEAN journal publishes a narrative of remarkable heroism on the part of a mountain guide in Switzerland. It appears that he and two other guides undertook to conduct a party over one of the most precipitous passes of the higher Alps. The men, as is usual, were tied to each other by a long rope. As they scaled the wall of ice they slipped on the edge of a frightful chasm. This man was at the end of the rope. Without his weight there was a chance for the others to regain their footing; with it there was none. He cast a glance down at the dark abyss, filled with fathomless snows, then drew his knife from his belt, and saying quietly to the man next to him, "Tell mother how it was, Jose," he cut the rope and fell, never to be seen of mortal man again. "Greater love hath no man than this that he lay down his life for his friends."

THE APPRENTICE'S WINDOW.

An instructive illustration was used recently by a speaker who was endeavoring to interest an audience of Christian people in work among the neglected street waifs. He said: "I have heard an incident connected with the building of a great church, famous for its magnificent windows. The great master to whom those windows were entrusted had a world-wide reputation, and I need hardly say he looked upon the work as being a sort of masterpiece—he was determined to devote all his skill and energy to the construction of those windows, in their design and in the perfection of their work. Every bit of glass put in was carefully examined by him, and pieces here and there were thrown aside as useless. But he had in his employ an apprentice, whom he never thought much of, but this young apprentice collected and arranged all these discarded pieces of glass. By-and-by the windows of the church were completed. The young apprentice produced a window also, and it was made up of nothing more or less than the fragments of the discarded glass. When the windows were finished that of the young apprentice was found suitable for a niche and it was so exquisite in the care and taste and labor it displayed that it was accepted. And the story tells us, when the people looked at all the several windows they said, 'There is none that can excel this; indeed, we think this window exceeds in beauty all the other work.' Yet it was made of discarded bits of glass. They only needed extra care to become beautiful in combination. There are many human gems to be found neglected on our streets that might adorn Christ's living temple."

THE SAILOR BOY'S BIBLE.

An American tourist in England asked permission to speak at a Bible Society's meeting at Dartmouth. He said: "About forty years ago there lived within this old town, and within twenty yards of this room, a venerable Christian, who was wont, in his hours of leisure, to visit the sick and distressed in their affliction. One day he chanced to look in upon a widow and her children, and to read to them from the Book of consolation. Putting his hand, before he left, on the head of a little boy, he said, 'The Lord bless the lad, and make him a blessing.' That boy became a sailor on board one of the ships of which that good man was the owner. When on the point of sailing, his friend presented him with one of the Bibles issued by the Bible Society. The boy and his Book were carried over many thousands of miles of the mighty ocean in safety, when, on one particular voyage, the ship was overtaken by a succession of storms and was so much injured that there was danger of her not reaching port. All were in fear, and it was then discovered that the little boy had a Bible—the only copy of the Divine Book on board—and it was read every day by the sailors. It pleased God, after the ship had been to sea for three months and three days, to bring her back to this port. Do you wish to know who was that venerable Christian who owned the ship and gave the boy his Bible? He was the father of your respected secretary now on the platform; and the little boy stands before you, and you have been kindly and patiently listening to him. I owe all my happiness on earth and my hopes for eternity, to the great truths contained in the Bible; its gift to me was the first step heavenward; and if a change has been mercifully wrought in me, it has been by the pure Word of God. And I regard it as one of the privileges of my life, that I have spent a portion of it in reading that Word to others."

CHRIST THE JUDGE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning August 9th.
Rom. 2 : 16 ; 14 : 9 ; II. Cor. 5 : 10.

A FINAL judgment is necessary. The natural instinct of the human mind anticipates it. So many wrongs go unrectified in this life, so much sin undetected and unpunished, so much good unrecognized and unrewarded and so many men misunderstood, that without a general and impartial judgment the government of the world would seem to have been a failure. In this life neither good nor evil men receive according to the deeds done in the body.

Contemplating, therefore, a future judgment the question of the judge and his character is one of vital and universal importance. We learn from the passages selected for the week's topic and many others, that the judgment of the world is to be committed to Jesus Christ. What then are his characteristics?

His omniscience is an essential feature of this assize. He "will judge the secrets of men." If the judges of our courts knew the secrets of those who stand at their bar, how many sentences would be changed in quality and quantity! If society, which now confidently sits in judgment upon conduct and character, and applauds or condemns, knew the secrets of those whom it judges, how often would its decisions be reversed! Secret motives, secret temptations, secret sorrows have a powerful influence on the conduct of all delinquents and should be taken into account, or judgment will not be just. Christ will be the judge—he who told the woman of Samaria of her past life; who saw Nathanael before Philip called him; who asked the silent scribes why they reasoned these things in their hearts; who knew who would betray him; who foresaw that Peter would deny him and afterward repent; who, in short, "needed not that any should testify of men, for he knew what was in men."

The standard of judgment is also revealed. Men are to be judged by the Gospel. At first sight the standard of the Gospel seems milder than that of the law. But it is really more severe. Under the law outward obedience sufficed, but Christ demanded obedience of the heart (Matt. 5:21-28). The Gospel brings higher privileges with the greater responsibility they involve.

The judgment is of the dead and of the living (Rom. 14:9). In this world the power of the judge ends at the grave. The suicide passes beyond his reach. He who has sinned in secret and died undetected has escaped the punishment due him under human law. But Christ is Lord of the dead as well as of the living and there is no release in that war.

The judgment is individual and universal. Saint and sinner alike will be reckoned with at that bar, for there are degrees of reward (Matt. 25:20-23). There will be some whose labors will be acknowledged and recompensed, and there will be some who have built of hay and stubble who will be saved, but so as by fire. (1 Cor. 3:15). An accounting for the deeds done in the body will be required of those, too, who have rejected Christ. Having refused the offer he made to bear their sins they must bear the penalty themselves.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR FELLOWSHIP.

FROM Dr. Francis E. Clark's eloquent address at the Minneapolis Convention, reported in the Golden Rule, we clip the following forcible passage on the value of Christian combination, the basis of which the Christian Endeavor movement supplies:

This fellowship, which these days of holy communion will cement, shall flow back in refreshing rills of spiritual power to churches in every State and Territory and Province between the two oceans; and even to the churches across the sea the electric thrill of this fellowship will go; and wherever it goes, it will carry strength and cheer. Who will voluntarily cut himself off from such a reservoir of power? For the local church, for the individual Christian soul, I plead when I pray that our fellowship may remain unbroken. The united strength of the common enemy demands that we oppose to him the united strength of our common fellowship. There are no divisions among the hosts of darkness. "No sects in Heaven," is the title of a familiar poem; it is quite as true that there are no sects in hell. Never before did the clans of evil seem so persistently to marshal their united forces for a desperate assault. The watchword of the day is combination. Rumseller is combining with rumseller, distiller with vender, speculator with speculator, libertine with gambler, to resist good laws, to obstruct righteous legislation, to bring about a reign of terror and confusion among the hosts of God. Shall we who represent the coming generation of Christ's warriors play into the enemies' hands by weakening our ranks and dividing our hosts? I cannot believe that we shall.

I plead for this interdenominational and international fellowship of the societies because Christ commands it and prayed for it. With the agony of the coming cross before him, with the blood-drops of Gethsemane about to bead his brow, with reiterated emphasis he prays: "that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us." Brethren and sisters, we have the opportunity in our Christian Endeavor fellowship to answer Christ's prayer, in some worthy way to usher in the glad day to which his petition points forward. Even now I see that day dawning in the east. It is coming, brothers; it is surely coming. Its early light already gilds the mountain-tops. Of this good time coming one of the leaders in this Christian Endeavor movement sings:—

O golden day so long desired,
Born of a darksome night,
The swinging globe at last is fired
By thy resplendent light.
And hark! I like Memnon's morning chord,
Is heard from sea to sea
This song: One Master, Christ the Lord;
And brethren all are we.

A KING'S DAUGHTER'S TROUBLES.

VERY pathetic is the appeal that is published in the Silver Cross from Lawrenceville, Va., signed "Pattie Buford." She reports that the Hospital for sick and infirm and aged negroes which her sisters of the silver cross aided her to establish, has been destroyed by fire. She was just commencing the erection of an Orphanage in connection with the Hospital and was hoping for the help of the Order in conducting it. Now her concern is for the poor old people who were deprived of their shelter and she pleads for help for them.

"There were," she says, "between fifty and sixty helpless men, women, and little children in the building and not one able-bodied person on the premises. Even the faithful head-nurse, a strong woman, had gone with food and medicine to a woman too ill to be taken to the hospital. The matron, with great calmness and courage, assisted by such patients as could walk, dragged to the doors those entirely helpless, and no one being strong enough to lift them, she rolled them out. Every life was saved.

"When I reached the spot the roof was falling in, the yard strewn with broken furniture and bedding; some poor women fainting from terror, others screaming from fright, children crying, old women and men sobbing like babies, the blind groping about in their pitiful helplessness, and above all the roaring fire, leaping frantically from beam to beam, then leaping higher and higher till the great branches of the overshadowing oaks were blazing too. The poor creatures rushed to me and clung in their frenzy, imploring me to help them and I feeling, as I never felt before, my own utter helplessness, had to quiet them like poor children as they are. We put the fainting, helpless women in the school-house. Afterwards, I succeeded in getting some vacant cabins and a house about a mile distant, where we stowed the old people. In a lonely country place like ours, it is not easy to shelter sixty sick and helpless people, but before the pitiless storm which followed, set in, all were sheltered. They must remain in their crowded quarters till the hospital is rebuilt, for rebuilt it must be as speedily as practicable."

It appears there was an insurance on the building, but the furniture and bedding were a total loss. If any circles in the North have funds not required for local claims, or have the means of raising some additional sums, it would seem that such an appeal as this deserves their consideration.

CARRYING THE SEED.

A STONISHMENT has often been expressed at the phenomenal rapidity with which the Christian Endeavor movement has spread throughout the land and beyond sea. A clue to the secret is given in a book recently produced by Rev. Dwight M. Pratt, entitled Decade of Christian Endeavor. Mr. Pratt says: "The removal of some of its most ardent workers during the first years of its work enabled the Williston Society to become the direct agent in forming many similar organizations throughout the various parts of the country. Some of these incidents are of great interest and show the limitless reach of Christian influence and effort. For example a young man, a devoted Christian left Williston Church, and with his bride sought a home in Lincoln, Nebraska. There he formed a Christian Endeavor Society among the young people of his neighborhood. From this Society a church was organized of which he became one of the deacons. Another member removed to South Hadley, Mass. A society was at once formed there which resulted in similar organizations in all that section of the State. The marriage of one of the Williston young ladies to a graduate of a Theological Seminary, carried the work to Duluth, Minnesota, where he was called to minister.

"John Charnock removed from England to Portland, was voted into the Williston Society, but before actual enrollment as a member, crossed the continent and located at Tacoma, Washington. He carried with him a copy of its constitution. His short residence at Portland had been sufficient to fill him with enthusiasm for the work. He wrote his pastor in Crewe, England, describing its nature and remarkable successes. This led to the establishment of the first society in England. Through his personal efforts the organization was also transplanted to the Pacific coast."

It was similarly carried to China. The first society in that land was in Foochow. "The translation of the term 'Christian Endeavor' into Chinese," says Mr. Pratt, "was considerable of an achievement for both the Chinese thought and the Chinese language. Ku la hwei, its attempted equivalent, means literally 'The Rouse-up-society' and is thus a vigorous tribute to the energizing spirit of the movement."

Thus, it appears, that as in the early days of Christianity, "they who were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word."

A RESCUE IN THE BOWERY.

WHAT may be done by personal effort in the work of rescuing the fallen is illustrated by an incident which occurred some time ago at the Bowery Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York. One bitter winter day, shortly after Christmas, a young man whose face bore the marks of dissipation and whose furtive manner and sensual glances showed how far he had wandered from the paths of virtue, entered the rooms of the Y. M. C. A., and asked for help. It is, by the way, a significant fact that a young man in distress makes instinctively for these Associations, rather than for the haunts of dissipation where he has squandered his means. The genial and devoted Secretary was engaged at the time, but he found time to listen to the young man's tale of need. He then gave him an order entitling him to admission to a lodging-house, as he was in too filthy a state to be admitted to the Association home.

After the young man departed the Secretary finished his interrupted business and was about to take up the next item of work in his busy day, when an uneasy apprehension about his recent visitor crossed his mind. It had begun to snow heavily and was altogether an uncomfortable time for out-door travelling, but the Secretary wrapped up and went out to look for the young man. He was not at the lodging-house when the Secretary called; so a voyage of exploration was made among the Bowery saloons. He was found in one of them leaning against the lunch-counter. The Secretary accosted him, and pleaded with him with his well-known earnestness. That a comparative stranger should have taken so much interest in him as to sally forth in such weather seemed to touch the wanderer's heart. A serious conversation took place and when they reached the lodging house an earnest prayer was offered that the vows made might be kept.

That was the turning point. Since then the young man has led a changed life. Employment was found for him and he is now awaiting the arrival of his wife from England, who hearing of his reformation is gladly coming to rejoin him and set up their home anew under hopeful conditions. The Secretary's journey through the snow that winter evening meant much for those two unhappy persons.

SEASIDE HOMES.

GRACE HALL, the excellent home leased, at Asbury Park, by the New York Young Women's Christian Association, this season is again, filled by tired and jaded girls from the city offices and stores. For ten dollars the Association pays their fare to Asbury Park and back, and gives them excellent accommodation and good board for two weeks. The experiment was commenced three years ago, when the Leslie Cottage at Asbury Park, was hired for the purpose. The applications for tickets, were then so numerous that an adjacent cottage was hired and promptly filled. The next year, the Association secured a lease of Grace Hall for three years, and it is filled all the season long.

The Philadelphia Y. W. C. A. has engaged in the same work on a still more extensive scale. It now owns a commodious home at Asbury Park, capable of accommodating a hundred inmates beside the matron and staff. It is managed by a regularly constituted Board from which girls and women, who have to earn their own livelihood may obtain tickets for a week's board for three and a half dollars. The treasury of the Home is replenished by a novel and sagacious arrangement. Early in the season before the time when business houses are giving vacations to their employes the ladies connected with the Y. W. C. A., and their friends spend a few weeks at the Home, paying double rates for board. They thus practically test the sanitary condition of the institution and the culinary and house-keeping capacities of the staff, while the home makes a profit by their stay, which can be applied to the support of needy beneficiaries. Girls who are not members of the Association, but who are earning their own livelihood are granted tickers on the same terms as the members.

THE Y. M. C. A. IN JERUSALEM.

THE habits of citizens of Jerusalem have not heretofore been favorable to the organization of a Young Men's Christian Association. Most of them are in their homes after sundown, and retire to rest early. Of late, however, Western customs have come into vogue in the ancient city, and not always in a beneficent form. A drinking saloon and a concert garden have been opened, and both of these are now well filled in the evening. Christian men have not been slow to take the hint. Mr. Hind Smith on his recent visit to the city succeeded in getting sixty men together to consider the project of forming an Association. Mr. Erank T. Ellis now writes to the Young Men's Era of the progress that has been made. He says: "To accommodate the members speaking different languages two sections were formed, the Anglo-Hebrew and the Arabic for the English and Arabic languages respectively. These two sections were set to work the same week each with its independent committee, chairman, secretary and treasurer. At the time of formation the Anglo-Hebrew section enrolled eighteen members, which has now increased to 22; the Arabic section enrolled 32 and now numbers 40." The chief difficulty was in finding a place for meeting. Funds could not be raised to buy or even to hire a building and the Anglo-Hebrew section has not even yet been able to find suitable quarters. But the Arabic section is thriving. A mission room was offered for its use and gladly accepted. "Great interest," Mr. Ellis says, "is evinced in its progress by Arab young men and I have no doubt of its success."

GOD LOVETH.

WHAT though the path with thorns abound,
Though storm-clouds gather dark around;
Though hopes fall dead, like blighted flowers
With frost for dew and snow for showers;
'Tis peace and comfort, sun and dew:
The Father loveth, loveth you!

Not without cost the Father gave
His hand to help, his heart to save.
To you, for you, this heavenly Dove,
Whose earthly type is mother-love,
From heaven to earth thy Saviour drew,
For so the Father loveth you.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells of the Poverty of Oriental Lands and the Beggars One Encounters There.

THERE was a cry of delight from the children, when Uncle John, after drawing up his chair to its well-known corner, the other evening, began to uncover a large-sized photograph. They crowded around the traveller and could hardly restrain their impatience.

"Easy, Tom; easy," said Uncle. "Rome wasn't built in a day, you know."

And as he spoke, he unfolded the picture and disclosed to their gaze a group of women and girls, sad-faced, and bearing every evidence of extreme poverty.

"Beggars!" said Ted, laconically. "Aren't they?"

"Not exactly," replied Uncle, "although there are plenty of beggars where these came from. Now, you have heard me tell of the Arabs. Well, these are Arab women and children—Bedouins, who belong to a class to be found everywhere in the Holy Land. This photographic group was procured by Rev. Dr. Talmage's party when they were in Palestine a year ago."

"Why do they look so doleful, Uncle?" asked Tom.

"They are a grave people, from whose national life much of the brightness and gladness have departed," was the response. "You remember, two weeks ago, I told you about the Egyptian children of Cairo and Ismailia. Well, their lives are pleasant compared with the lives of these little ones. They are the sons and daughters of a race of shepherds, robbers, and beggars, and we find them scattered all over Palestine and Syria. Every-one looks down upon them, yet they were once a glorious people, with great kings and princes. There were Bedouin kings among the monarchs who gave gifts to Solomon. They once conquered all Syria which, as you can see on the map, is a very large country; but their entire possessions extended from the Indian Ocean to the Persian Gulf and from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean, with Palestine as a boundary on the north. It is a land full of deserts and beautiful places."

"They are the children of Ishmael, are they not?" ventured Max Wheeler.

"Right" said Uncle. "Hagar's son was the father of the Arab race and of all those that dwell in tents, as you know the Bible tells us. The Amalekites whom the Israelites met and overcame in the desert, were Ishmaelites, too."

"Now, children, if you will take the map and trace out the land of Arabia, you will see what a vast territory these wanderers possess. They are divided into two classes: the wilderness dwellers, who are called Bedaween or men of the desert, and the dwellers in cities. The Bedouins look down upon the townsmen. They are subdivided into a great many tribes, just as our American Indians are to-day. They move wherever they can find pasture for their vast flocks, for they are stock-raisers rather than farmers; but they are plunderers as well, and many a caravan has a startling tale to tell of ill-treatment at their hands. Yet they have some good qualities after all; it is very rare to find people wholly bad. These Arabs are kind to any stranger who may happen to need shelter or food, and he is welcomed and is at liberty to remain among them three days."

"Do those in the picture belong to one family?" was asked.

"Most likely to one tribe, and probably to a single household. There are three generations represented here you see: the old grandmother, the grown-up daughters and the little children—the Usufs, Mennis, Hasnas, Fatmehs and Seids —"

"What queer-sounding names!" exclaimed the children.

"They are sturdy little folks, with bronze faces and shining teeth and they can spring about among the rocks all day long. Whenever a stranger appears, these youngsters run at him and call loudly for backsheesh, that is, a present. When they get anything, they dance around a while and then they pounce upon the stranger and overwhelm him with questions. I have often been amused at their persistent inquiries after the health of each particular relative of mine, even to the remotest degree. A gift of cakes will bring a deluge of such inquiries. Then the children will be followed by the women in rags and with faces like Nubians, asking on their own account.

"The women and children are the greatest sufferers from the unsettled life the Bedouins lead. Bare-footed, ragged, poorly-fed and none too well used as those boys and girls are, their highest dream of happiness is a full supper and a soft place to sleep on, within the tent. But, in spite of hardships, they grow up tall, athletic men and women, the men with splendid figures, capable of enduring great fatigue and the women almost equally muscular."

"Are there many of these Bedouins in Jerusalem?" inquired the children.

"They are found everywhere throughout Palestine. Along the banks of the Jordan, travellers meet them frequently. On the highways, one sees the sturdy Arab beggars, either in camp or on the march. They are just like those in the photograph. This picture was probably taken at Bethany or near Jericho. There are Bedouins in both neighborhoods.

"It is a great pity that history does not furnish us with a more perfect account of the Arabs and their country," said Uncle in conclusion. "Arabia has been a land of many religions, and although it is now Moslem, the Arabs themselves are far from being fond of the Turks. Arabia is also, as you may have read, the home of magic, and the magi or wise men of old were almost all natives of the Peninsula. The Arabs speak many dialects but their language is the richest in the East and the best developed. It has a close affinity to the Hebrew, but is much older. The Arabs were a powerful people in the days of the Hebrew patriarchs; it was probably to a band of Arab traders, going across the desert, that Joseph was sold by his brethren for a slave."

"Company Manners."

We have heard of people who had two kinds of faces and two distinct styles of behavior—the first for home consumption, the other for "company." Their "company manners," were elegant and quite captivating; bland, courteous, agreeable. The less said about their home manners the better. It is the old story of the bear at home, the lamb abroad.

Such parents exercise a most detrimental influence on their children. The little ones, being naturally imitative, consider it perfectly actions, and so live that our light may shine in the household, and illumine the steps of childhood, instead of misleading them.

Children in China.

BISHOP GOODHILL writes entertainingly of his recent visit to the missions in China and has something to say concerning the children of that country that will interest our own home circles. The influence of Christian teaching is everywhere visible among the young folks of the Flowery Kingdom.

"One boy now at our school at Kiukiang," he says, "found several hundred dollars belonging to our missionary ladies at Chungking, in the ruins of the house destroyed by the mob, and risked his life by carrying the money through the crowds and over the hills, many miles, delivering it without loss to the good women who had been driven half-clothed into the fields. He could have kept the whole of it without being detected."

"In North China, children, boys up to twelve and fourteen, pass the late spring and all summer almost naked. No language can convey an exact impression of the poverty of many people in North China. A strip of matting for a roof, two parallel rows of dried mud for sides, make fine houses compared with some we have seen. Yet these same people have a great love for their children, and I have seen fathers—ragged fathers—carry their naked babies with as much pride as one would expect at home. Many missionaries have told me that they can go safely anywhere, if they go with a child."

"Our beautiful mission children seem to interest and delight them beyond measure. At Nanking, while our house boat was anchored in the canal, every man stood for two hours fascinated by the two babies and the golden-haired girls on our boat."

"See," one Chinese captain said, pointing to one of the little girls, "see, she opens her mouth."

Girl-babies are not welcomed in the average Chinese home. They are too often passed over as of no account. Even now, so little are they thought of in China, that they are more commonly designated by numbers than by names, and the household speaks of them as the "Third little Sister," "Fourth little Sister," etc.

The Influence of a "Good-by."

LET nothing prevent or delay you from making a start on the Christian path. Cut loose from all hindering influences. No matter how dear the acquaintanceship, if it is one that will prove an encumbrance, better bid it good-by than imperil your own salvation.

Mrs. Bottome relates an experience which illustrates the influence of a good-by.

"When I started out on the Christian path," she says, "I called to take farewell of a young friend of mine, who had once had a great influence over me. 'Where are you going?' she inquired, in surprise."

"I have made up my mind to go to heaven," I replied. I could see that she was startled.

"But why bid me good-by?" she persisted.

"Because," said I, "you will mock at me and I am still weak and may not be able to stand it. If I were stronger, I might hope to influence you; but I am uncertain about that so I have chosen to part."

"Don't you think I want to go to heaven as well as you?"

"I took her hand. The tears came fast enough now, and they were blessed tears of penitence. She started with me and we have kept close together on the road since then." Earnestness won a triumph here. That good-by opened her eyes to the condition of her soul and put her feet on the heavenly road.

Pins and Politeness.

"An absurd conjunction!" you exclaim. Is it? Let us see. A writer in the Occident, of San Francisco, remarks that a pin, small as it is, is an emblem of what a man ought to be. First of all, a man should be straight, like the familiar tiny bar, which is a nuisance when crooked. Like a bent pin, a man or woman whose moral nature is awry, disturbs the peace and harmony of the world. Gossips, slanderers, swindlers and defaulters are the bent pins of society. Then, pins are polished, and so ought people to be; pointed, and everything we do ought to have a definite point and object. A good pin is not too pliant or readily bent, and Christians ought to have firmness and backbone in all cases where duty is concerned.

The Captains Bargain

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA MCNAIR WRIGHT.

The Captain Troubled.

ROBERT promised Captain Allen that he would pay no heed to the woman's talk; but when the Captain was gone he watched the dying woman with a growing trouble. What a mystery was here! Now she was part and parcel of this world—soon she would be away from this world—but where? How, and how far was she to go? How would that other life move on? What kind of a life would it be? He lifted his head. The woman was looking at him. "Where is my dress?" she asked. "What am I here for? I cannot feel my feet. I cannot move my legs. I want to get up. I have a long way to go to-night. You are coming with me. You need not take any of your things, but go get on your best clothes, and come away quickly."

"You fell into the creek from the bridge," said Robert, "and father and I took you out; and we took off your dress and shoes. You hurt yourself—that is why you do not feel your legs."

"Are the dress and shoes dry? Bring them, and come, we will go off together. Rub my feet, will you, boy?"

Robert rubbed. She could not feel his touch. "Harder! Are you rubbing! Pinch them! Stick a pin in them! I cannot feel you touch me at all."

Robert bent over her, great compassion in his big, brown eyes.

"You are going on a long journey to-night," he said, "and no one can go with you; you must go alone."

"I won't go alone; I mean to take you," said the woman.

"You cannot take me or any one. Your journey will be far outside of this world, into the world to come. You are going to die. You are hurt, and in a few hours you will be dead. Your feet and legs are dead already. You are going out of this world to stand before God."

"I don't know—anything about God," said the woman.

"But you must meet him to-night. There is no minister here to talk to you. The schoolmaster is away. There is no one to pray for you; but if you have done evil, say you are sorry, for you are going to die."

"You seem a kind boy," said the woman. "And you pulled me out of the water, did you?"

"Yes; never mind that; think—are you ready to die?"

"I wish—you'd tell the man to come here, —I want to say a word to him," said the woman.

Robert went up into the mill.

"She wants to see you."

"What has she been saying to you?" demanded the Captain.

"Nothing. I told her she was going to die, and she wants you."

"Robert!" cried the Captain, eagerly, "go stand on the middle of the bridge until I call you!"

Having thus provided for getting Robert out of earshot, Captain Allen went to confess his penitent.

Robert stood a long while on the bridge, waiting like the "boy on the burning deck." In truth, Captain Allen only remembered to call him, when the woman seemed to be in great agony and he did not know what to do for her.

Robert thought of the opiate, and, as the doctor had said it was the only thing to give her, he administered it freely, and repeated the dose. The woman sank into unconsciousness. Robert saw that Captain Allen was very pale; his eyes were sunken; beads of sweat stood on his brow. He sat by the table, laid his arms upon it, and his head on his arms. The heavy breathing of the woman sounded through the room. After a time there was a rattling sound.

"She is dying!" said the Captain. "I wish she had never come here!"

He rose and put his arm about Robert.

"She is dead."

He led the boy out of doors. At that minute a wagon drove up with the poor-master and the doctor in it, and a pine coffin with a long, coarse, white shroud. They went in and wrapped the stranger's body in this garment.

So it happened that Eliza and her four children coming home from their pleasuring saw several men carrying a coffin out of their kitchen. All this tragedy of death had happened while they were having a picnic on a summer's day.

But from the hour the tramp-woman crossed the threshold of his mill, Captain Allen was a changed man. He no longer had a jolly laugh and a genial word for every one. His appetite failed; his sleep was broken; his face was full of gloom; his words were tart. He no longer deferred to the opinions of the woman—with a head-on-her-shoulders, but contradicted and dissented from her regularly, as if he felt that between her views and his there must be some great difference. At night his dreams were frightful.

"You are going to be sick, 'Zekiel," said 'Liza, "and I do wish you'd take some medicine. That tramp-woman dying here has over-set you completely. Robert did not take it as hard as you do. You always were a man of great feelings, 'Zekiel."

"Robert is only a boy. Boys don't realize things, 'Liza."

"Well, you need to do something for yourself or you'll be down sick. You mutter and toss all night. Last night you dreamed you had killed that woman. The other night you dreamed that you had put Robert down a well; and not long ago you dreamed you had buried him alive. I told Jerry yesterday we'd have trouble yet with you if you did not take heed."

"I wish, 'Liza Allen, you'd not talk about me to any one."

"I'll talk about you to the doctor if you can't get better right soon, 'Zekiel," said the resolute Eliza.

"What is wrong with you, father?" said Pink, laying her hand on his arm.

"Nothing! Why do you think anything is wrong?" he cried.

"You are so different, father. You are tart to mother; you boxed the twins' ears; you scolded Pop for making a noise; you find fault with me; you speak cross to Robert and Jerry. We never knew you to do so before. Father, is the mortgage foreclosed, and you do not like to tell us? Or is there some other debt? Must we leave the mill? Do tell me, father. You are so changed, and we are all so unhappy. Until now, we have been very happy." Tears were in Pink's eyes.

"There is nothing wrong. Don't bother me," said the Captain, stubbornly. But Pink's words pursued him. He could not work. In the mill Jerry and Robert seemed to regard him anxiously. He went into the garden. He saw Mr. Murray coming down the road and dismounting at the mill. He noticed how pale and sad Mr. Murray looked. He was more bent than ever; he seemed haggard and feeble.

"I came to say good-bye," said Mr. Murray. "I am sick. I am going away. I shall go to Europe or to the East. Very likely I shall lay my bones there. What is the use of living, alone as I am? Ah, Allen, if you had only been willing to give me the boy, and with him a joy and interest in life, it might have saved me! But I cannot find my own boy, and this one is the only other boy I ever cared for."

He passed into the kitchen. Allen followed him. He felt that he ought to be very glad that the Superintendent was going away. Mr. Murray spoke to the rest of the family. Then laid his arm on Robert's shoulder and looked earnestly at him. "I should have a son like you, Robert! Then I might be content, and live to do some good. Well, good-bye; I leave to-morrow."

He shook hands all round. Captain Allen was so gruff, he was not even civil. Mr. Murray went out of the house. Then Captain Allen, as reluctant, but forced to the act, followed him to the door, and called out: "Mr. Murray—won't you—don't you want to stop to supper?"

"Thank you, Captain. No."

The Captain came in growling. "Some folks won't take a chance when it's offered 'em. They won't give other folks a chance. He needn't say I didn't stop him."

The family sat down to supper. "I think poor Mr. Murray won't live long; my heart ached for him," said Eliza.

"I can't bear to see him so unhappy," sighed Pink, "I like him so much. I can see his eyes now."

Captain Allen pushed away his plate, and tramped out of the kitchen. He went to that rubbish place under the mill. Long ago in that damp, dark corner he had fought a moral battle, and won a victory. Once more the Captain was in sore conflict.

Jacob wrestled all night at Jabbok. The earth is full of the scenes of unchronicled spiritual struggles and contests. The Captain remained under the mill until nearly midnight. When he came in, Eliza alone was sitting up for him. She looked keenly at him.

"'Zekiel, where have you been so long?"

"Under the mill."

"'Zekiel, I don't know what has got hold of you."

"I'm afraid the devil has," said 'Zekiel soberly.

"'Zekiel Allen! I wouldn't have believed it if anyone had told me!"

"Neither would I, a year ago," said the Captain.

Again he tossed restlessly, all night. There are in earthly wars, victories that are so nearly defeats, that the conquerors are kept waking and watching on the hardly-won field, uncertain whether morning may not find the foe in possession. "It is sometime so in spiritual warfare, we tremble lest we may not find ourselves holding a hardly secured vantage."

The Captain sat down to his breakfast, but did not eat. He hastily drank two cups of hot coffee, then surprised his household by snatching his hat and rushing away from the house. At this Eliza burst into tears, and wrung her hands. "I do not know what is coming over your poor father! He used to be as cheerful, hearty, and good-tempered as the day was long. Now he is as cross as two sticks. I know he is losing his mind. His worries have softened his brain. Oh, children, whatever shall we do if he goes crazy!"

The children had no plan of action to propose for so dire a contingency. Pink wept with Eliza. Bop's sturdy little fingers were clenched in a fierce effort to play man, tearless. Robert put his arms about his mother, and Jerry, clearing his throat vigorously, looked out of the open door. Meanwhile the Captain sped, as one pursued by the Avenger of Blood, up the steep path to Deacon Britt's. There he found the schoolmaster on the porch, having just finished his breakfast. The Captain called to him, breathless:

"Schoolmaster, I want you to come where no one will hear us talking. I have strange things to say to you."

The master led the way to the orchard, where the fruit was ripening red and golden in the autumn sun, and the dew yet lay along the grass. No one could come within earshot without being seen.

"Schoolmaster, have you seen Mr. Murray lately?"

"Yes. He looks very poorly; he is leaving to-day, on the train at eleven o'clock."

"Did he ever tell you his story, schoolmaster?"

"No. He once had a wife and child. They are dead. I know nothing more. He never speaks of himself."

"He spoke to me," said the Captain; "he told me,"—and he rushed into the Superintendent's sad story.

"Stop, stop!" said the schoolmaster, after a moment. "These are very private affairs,—meant only for you, as he confided them to you. You should not tell them to me, Captain. It is a breach of faith."

"I must tell you," said Captain Allen, "and you must hear me. Listen, I tell you"—and he went on with the Superintendent's story. "Do you not think, schoolmaster, that a man who lost his child in such a way, has no further right to him? What business had he to take the child out against its mother's wishes—to drink with his baby in his arms? He lost him by his own fault. He deserves to be lonely."

"Allen, Allen, that is not the voice of Christian pity. Where should we all be, if with God there was no forgiveness of sins? I know your heart aches for that poor father who for all these years has vainly looked for his child. But unhappily your pity and mine cannot restore his son."

The Captain looked moodily on the ground. "If he is sick and going to die, it would do his son no good to be found by him; he would be with him just long enough to be spoiled—and then left an orphan. The Superintendent will not suffer much longer."

"I think grief is killing him, and joy would cure him."

"He's had his chance, and thrown it away," said Allen.

"Allen, he has greatly wished for Robert. Is it this that is on your mind? Are you feeling that you ought to give up your boy to him?"

"Schoolmaster!" cried the Captain, with violence, "Robert is his son. Robert is the boy he lost!"

"Allen, what are you telling me? How do you know it?"

"You know the tramp-woman that died at my house? She had come for Robert. She left him at the village. She came to claim him, she said he was her son. I wouldn't have given him to her; but you know as she tried to cross the creek to speak to him, she fell, and that was her death. When she found—the boy was the one who told her, and he did not guess she had ever had to do with him—when she found she was going to die, she called for me and told me the truth. She said she saw the child in his father's arms sitting on a bench in Central Park. The child cried, and the father gave him his watch and his pocket-book to play with. The woman saw that the father was intoxicated and did not know what he was doing. Presently he put the child down on the bench, and said he would go and get him some candy. No one was near and this woman thought she would take the pocket-book and the watch from the child. But when she went near to it the child held fast to the things,—Robert always was a plucky one!—and she saw he had a ring on his finger, a gold chain on his neck, and a rich dress."

"Schoolmaster, I think children are pretty enough as they stand, without fixing them up like popinjays. Well, she was greedy, and thought she would take the child off so she could strip him, and then she would leave him somewhere, and she wrapped him up in her old shawl, head and ears, and off she went to a slum where she lived. But she found the pocket-book had a hundred dollars in it, and her husband told her she would get ten years for stealing the child, and she had better get away with it. They thought if a reward was offered, if they had time they could fix up a story and be safe for the reward. So the woman took the midnight train for Philadelphia. Her husband, and a couple of boys they had, went there to her after a little, but there was such a hue and cry raised about the child that they dared not say anything. They got rid of the money drinking, and sold all the things but a little shirt with the child's name on it, which the woman kept, hoping that some day she might hear of a reward for finding the child, and manage to obtain it. And she kept the inside case of the watch; she had to break it out before she sold the watch, for on the case is Mr. Murray's full name, and 'from his wife.' She kept those two things."

"Well, when they had a drunken fight the man, and his two sons, her step-sons, used to threaten to tell about her stealing the child. It scared her so that after about four years, she took occasion of her husband's being in jail, to go off to Lacy and lose the child. She took him up here to Lacy, on a night train, left him on the road-side, and went off to Harrisburg and stayed six months. But this summer she was in New York, and coming upon an old paper she found that 'five thousand dollars and no questions asked' was offered. She made up her mind to come after him. She thought she would find him in the poorhouse. She did not know Mr. Murray was up here; the child was to be taken to a lawyer in New York. She had fixed up a story about her sister having stolen him, and told her when she was dying, and given her the watch-case and shirt. But you see, schoolmaster, all her plans went wrong. When she found she had to die, she told me the truth, and—when I saw the watch-case I found on it the Superintendent's full name. So, there it was. Robert is Murray's son."

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

We have received a great many answers to the question propounded by "Merchant," Rome, N. Y., which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 8th. The question was as follows:

Is a person ever justified in telling a falsehood? Suppose I were sheltering a fugitive from a furious mob, and knew that to betray his presence would be followed by his death. Would I be justified in denying all knowledge of him? Would such a departure from truth be justifiable?

"Merchant's" question involves a very subtle point in moral ethics, and it is not surprising that among the many readers who have sent replies, there should be some who, in view of the urgent and sympathetic nature of the case stated, have been diverted from the main issue: our duty to God.

From a large number of affirmatives we select the following as representative of all:

J. C. C., Brattleboro, Vt.—It seems to me that a person would be justified in telling a falsehood to save the life of an innocent man. I believe in no other case would one be justified. The following cases are parallel to that mentioned by Merchant: Exodus 1: 17, 18, 19; 1 Samuel 19: 14; and 20: 28 and 29; 1 Samuel 17: 19, 20; Joshua 2: 4, 5, 6. Each case was to save a life.

C. G. M., Fishkill-on-Hudson, N. Y.—In such an emergency, it would be perfectly right. Although the Word of God condemns a lying tongue, Christ also says: "As you would that men should do unto you, do ye also unto them." (Luke 6: 27.) Would not telling an untruth and betraying a brother-man be breaking the command of our Saviour, which, he says, is the Law and the Prophets? (Matt. 7: 12.) We find Elisha deceiving the Syrian, and it would seem, with the approval of God, for he answered his prayer. (II Kings 6: 19.)

J. A. G., Carlisle St., Philadelphia.—In my opinion he is justified, because a furious mob, being insane with passion, would have no right whatever to the information desired, as they intend to use such information to commit murder. A falsehood in the mind of God is a wilful, malicious misrepresentation. In the case cited, far from being malicious, it would be a charity to both parties. It would save the man's life and prevent the mob from becoming murderers and thereby endangering their own souls. "For no murderer hath eternal life."

A. A. H., Crozer Seminary, Chester, Pa.—There is no command against falsehood without intent to injure. The state has the right of life by divine gift. A man may, in mercy to the murderer, or on account of overwhelming numbers, deprive the life-takers of a knowledge of the truth.

Mrs. M. B. V., Kirwin, Kan.—If I betray the fugitive and he is killed by the "mob" would not his blood be upon my hands? I should consider the mob of "the devil" and will lie to him every time, for he first lied (or deceived) us. Of two evils choose the lesser.

Among the negatives we have received we select the following, as succinctly presenting the views of the remainder:

W. H. W., Shelbyville, Tenn.—Stand by the truth! Remember what Alexander Pope, the poet, says:

He who through vast immensity can pierce,
See worlds on worlds compose one universe,
Observe how system into system runs,
What varied beings people every star,
May tell why Heaven has made us as we are.

The only safe course for us to pursue is to follow the explicit direction of Holy Writ: "Buy the Truth and sell it not." (Prov. 23: 23.)

L. S. G., Hartford, Conn.—No; for the simple reason that God, who is greater than all circumstances, is able to make a way of escape for the fugitive, if such were his holy will.

Miss N. B., Greene Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.—Never tell a falsehood, even to shield a person. Rather keep silence concerning the truth, even at the risk of your life.

D. W. A. Lebanon, N. H.—It is not the will of God that we should lie under any circumstances. A full trust in the Almighty will save from such emergencies, without the need of resorting to falsehood. "All liars shall have their place in the lake of fire, which is the second death."

C. H., Dundas, Ont., Can.—No; even if the fugitive were my own mother, sister or brother. (See Psalm 15.) How can a man speak the truth in his heart, if he tell an untruth with his lips?

D. W. S., Tampa, Fla.—A lie is a lie, no matter under what circumstances it is told. God's eye sees the mob as well as the man hiding. Can a lie change God's purposes? No man is ever justified in telling a lie.

Mrs. H. P. R., Plattville, Grant Co., Wis.—Enthusiastically no! We are not to do evil that good may come. God can deliver us in every conflict.

R. B. Y., Bloomfield, N. J.—Was Peter justified in denying his Master? To deny all knowledge of the person mentioned in "Merchant's" question, would be an equally unjustifiable lie. Think you not that God is able to deliver us from any such position, since it is by his will that we are at times so placed? We should trust him to deliver us from all evil. (Is. 26: 4. Psalm 3: 5; Psalm 138: 8; Is. 26: 3.) If we do trust him, we shall be safe from all harm.

O. B. C., Entrieken, Huntingdon Co., Pa.—No. He might do so consistently if a servant of Satan, but a servant of God would not be justified, for a liar is an abomination in his sight.

R., Washington, Ga.—I think the best thing would be to say nothing. Some call this a silent lie. Is it?

This question, which has aroused so much interest, is one that a Christian need not hesitate to answer. The doctrine that "the end justifies the means" cannot be entertained by any Christian. Paul says (Romans 3: 8), of those who say: "Let us do evil that good may come" "that their damnation is just." Lying in all its forms is expressly forbidden by God. (Lev. 19: 11; Col. 3: 9.) It is hateful to him. (Prov. 6: 16-19.) It is a characteristic of the wicked and the apostasy. (1 Tim. 4: 2); it excludes from heaven (Rev. 21: 27); and those who are guilty of it shall be cast into hell. (Rev. 21: 8.) To lie, in any case is, therefore, sinful; to lie in the case mentioned by "Merchant" would be to doubt and affront God's Omnipotence. A full faith would not hesitate to tell the truth and leave the result in God's hands. His saving power has been most gloriously exemplified in just such circumstances, where, when all human agencies failed and the Christian has thrown himself wholly upon the Lord, the Omnipotent arm has been stretched out to succor him. There is also the alternative of silence, which "Merchant" seems to have overlooked.

Dr. Adams, Glendive, Mont.—Is it consistent for us who profess to live Christian lives to enter into games of chance for pleasure, such as checkers, dominoes and authors?

The whole question of amusements must be relegated to the individual conscience. "To him that thinketh it is sin, it is sin." There are some men whose idea of duty and the necessity for devoting all the time available to work for God is so exalted that they would consider any amusement a sinful waste of time and such men are to be admired. There are others, however, who find in relaxation a means of increasing their power for labor. They wisely take relaxation in some form. Certain games have by association with gambling become disreputable and these for example's sake should be eschewed. Cards, roulette and many that might be cited belong to the category. The games mentioned in the question cannot strictly be called games of chance and it would be uncharitable to condemn as inconsistent those who engage in them for relaxation.

James Moyle, Port Oram, N. J.—Can it be said consistently with the purity of his nature that God ever allowed polygamy? Was David a polygamist at the time of writing the 32d Psalm?

Polygamy was a recognized institution in Oriental lands in ancient times as it is now. Jacob had two wives and there is no record of his having been directly reproved of God for it, though it brought him much misery. Neither is there direct prohibition in the Mosaic code of laws. In fact it was recognized there and provision made in respect to it. "If a man have two wives," etc. (Deut. 21: 15), and the legislator goes on to state how the property of a polygamist shall be divided. Again: "If he takes him another wife" (Ex. 21: 9) the first wife is not to be neglected. Allusions to the practice are frequent. It is expressly stated that Gideon had many wives. (Judges 8: 30.) The fact is clear that God permitted polygamy in those days and it is not fitting for us to pronounce on the consistency of his acts.

The date when the 32d Psalm was written is uncertain but that David was a polygamist there can be no question. The fact, however, does not justify polygamy any more than the crimes he undoubtedly committed were any the less crimes because he committed them.

J. M., Watertown, N. Y.—When was the first printing-press set up in America? When did the first illustrations appear?

The first printing-press was set up in Harvard, in 1639. The first illustrations made in America appeared in Tully's Almanac in 1698. It was printed in Boston.

C. F. Jr., Dayton, O.—Is it true that no trace has ever been found of Nineveh?

What are believed to be the ruins of ancient Nineveh have been discovered on the banks of the river Tigris. They are shapeless mounds of earth and stone. Excavations have laid bare streets and the debris of what have once been palaces, and idols and books have also been unearthed. The tablets (made of clay) from the principal library have been identified and partially translated.

Temperance, Mobile, Ala.—A friend asserts that enough liquor is drunk every year to pay the interest on the national debt. Can you give me the exact figures?

In 1890, $900,000,000 worth of liquor of all sorts, was drunk in the United States. It is estimated that of beer alone enough was consumed to give every man, woman and child thirteen gallons and a-half.

THE COBBLER'S VISION.

A QUAIN legend is current in Russia. It relates to a man known in his town as "Martin the Cobbler." Martin was unlearned, but very pious man, who thought and prayed much as he sat on his bench day by day mending his neighbors' shoes. From the time that the story of Jesus entered his heart no other subject occupied his thoughts. He dwelt upon it continually and forgot the hardships of his lot in anticipating the joy of seeing his Lord in heaven. That became his idea of heaven—a place where he would see his Lord face to face. As he thought of it the dark basement in which he worked seemed less dismal. Yet it was a dismal place. The only light that entered it came from a strip of glass in the wall close to the ceiling which was but a few inches above the level of the pavement outside. Every passer-by interrupted the light though Martin from his bench could not see more of them than the feet. His spiritual life was a very inward one. He seldom spoke of religion to the neighbors who came to bring him work. They would not have understood him and probably would have ridiculed him. Martin therefore was self-contained, living in his own thoughts and doing nothing to disseminate the light he had. His religion consequently was not an active but a meditative one.

One night his thoughts were dwelling as usual on that glorious hope up to the time of his throwing himself on his poor bed for a night's rest. He fell asleep and dreamed that an angel stood beside his bed and told him, that his desire to see his Lord was to be gratified. Jesus himself would visit his humble abode on the morrow. The vision was so impressive that Martin had no doubt of its reality. He awoke early full of the thought that Jesus was to visit him that day. He prepared his breakfast and sat down to the meal. As he did so he noticed a pair of feet passing the window which must, he was sure, belong to some one who was very tired. They were scarcely lifted but were dragged along wearily. Martin felt good to every one that morning and he rose from his breakfast determined to make one heart glad beside his own, at any rate. The feet he had seen belonged to a poor homeless woman who had wandered around all night and was tired and hungry. Martin took her down into his basement, shared his breakfast with her and let her rest awhile. He set to his work, wondering when the Lord would come. The time must be getting near. As he sat down at his mid-day meal he saw through his window two shambled feet as weary of step as the woman's had been and when he went up he found an old man who had tasted no food that day. Martin led him down and fed him in the Master's name. Dinner over, he resumed his work and labored on till sunset. The Lord had not come. He waited until it was quite dark and then went to bed sad and disappointed.

In his sleep he saw again the faces of the man and woman whom he had fed that day. They stood one on each side his bed, their forms clad in the poor ragged garments just as he had seen them in the daytime. As he looked from one to the other wonderingly their faces seemed to light up, their garments grew luminous and they appeared even brighter than the angel he had seen the night before. "Martin," they said, "didst thou not know me? I was hungry and thou didst feed me. Inasmuch as thou didst it unto one of the least of these, thou didst it unto me."

DEATH ON THE LINE;

Tom White's Sunday Excursion and what Came of It.

H, where is the place? Do show me the place!"

The demand, which was rather an entreaty, proceeded from an elderly woman, very respectably dressed. She was intensely excited. Tears were flowing down her cheeks, where time had already made its furrows. The same excitement was on every countenance. Evidently some great calamity had occurred. We followed the old woman and her guide into a large room, where a most awful and ghastly spectacle presented itself. Upon various tables lay twenty-two corpses! There were the old man and the infant; mothers, daughters, sons, and husbands; some of them almost crushed out of recognition.

What was the cause of all this? No powder-mill had exploded, and sent forth its lurid flames. No ravaging army had spread slaughter and destruction around. It was a Sabbath morning. The bells were ringing merrily from every steeple, to welcome the day of rest.

A party of pleasure was on its way to Chicago. Laughter and merriment were universal, when, in a moment—while the laugh was ringing in the ear, and the jest had scarce parted the lip—the air was rent with shrieks and groans of mortal agony! A collision had taken place between two trains, and, without warning, twenty-two persons suddenly passed from time into eternity!

The old woman we have alluded to, passed from one mangled body to another, until her eye rested on that of a young man in the prime of life, frightfully disfigured. With a paroxysm of grief, she took the cold hand in her's, and seeing I looked sympathizingly at her, poured out her grief in heart-rending language.

"Oh, sir!" she said, "this poor lad is my son. He would go. I wanted him not. And now—you see. He was a good boy, sir."

"Do you think," said I, "that he had given his heart to God?"

I had doubts myself; for I thought a man that had truly come to Christ, would know the value of the Sabbath as a means of grace, and not spend it in his own pleasure. Still I was anxious to know if there had been any signs of repentance.

"Why, sir," replied the woman, "he went to church sometimes; and he never swore nor got drunk."

"But did he pray?"

"Why yes, sir,—sometimes."

This was poor encouragement. Still I felt interested in the young man; and so I promised to call on the mother.

On fulfilling my promise a day or two after, I found that the history of the widow's son was as follows:

Tom White was an only son. His mother petted him with a foolish fondness. She was blind to his faults till they forced themselves on her notice; and then her rebukes took no effect. His father had died when he was very young, leaving a small annuity to his widow. Out of this, Mrs. White apprenticed her son to an engineer. His master was a pious man, and frequently, in conversation with his apprentices, urged them to give their hearts to the Lord. Young White felt softened and resolved to do so. It was the early strivings of the Holy Spirit, whose "viewless way" is seen in every good thought and holy emotion. For a time he regularly attended the house of God, and seemed earnest about his soul. But in an evil hour he formed the acquaintance of a young man, who was light-hearted, gay, and dissipated.

Young White was fascinated by his friend's society, and he gradually yielded himself entirely to his influence. The first strivings of conscience were quenched. Sunday evening was spent in strolling about and smoking. One day he and several others were out bathing. Ever fond of adventure, White sought the deepest part of the pond. He had swum some time, when he felt the cramp; and before he had time to cry out, he sank. Presently one of his companions cried out, "Where is White?" An alarm was raised; the pond was dragged; and he was recovered. For a time he hung between life and death. With returning consciousness, came a resolve once more to turn to God. In an agony of soul he sought for pardon through Christ. Several weeks passed. Everyone who visited him, believed him a changed man. In course of time he recovered; and while walking out one day, he encountered his old companion. White had resolved he would shun him; but it was in his own strength he trusted.

"So I hear you've turned a saint again, Tom," he said. "I didn't believe it, for I thought you had too much good sense for that; but I heard the parson declare you were really converted."

Tom was silent.

"Is it true, old fellow? No, I see it is not. So come to my lodgings, and we'll have a bottle together—it will do you good."

With an accusing conscience, but unable to resist, White consented. He listened to the ribald scorn heaped upon religion, and the blasphemous infidelity of his companion, and he felt himself a partner in the sin. Despair seized his soul. In vain did poor White try to drown the voice of conscience in sin—it still made itself heard.

In due time Mrs. White removed to Cleveland. Here Tom's companion led him into still greater dissipation. All this time conscience kept urging him to return to God. Yet still the same plea was urged, "I will by-and-by." It is one of the most marvellous things in existence, that God's patience is so great.

About this time a storm occurred at Cleveland. It was one of the severest ever known. The wind, which was almost a hurricane, howled along the deserted streets, bringing down frail tenements and chimneys in every direction. The sea lashed to fury by the tempest, threatened to wash away the securely-built parade. One man was actually blown down by the fury of the wind. Young White and his profligate acquaintances were returning home on that memorable night. The storm made no impression on their minds. Just, however, as they were turning the corner of a street, a chimney-pot was thrown from a tall house, and a fragment, in its fall, struck White, and he fell senseless to the earth. He was carried home to his wretched mother, and this time all hopes were given up. In a terror not to be described, his conscience awoke at the sight of an impending eternity.

"O God," he cried, "have pity on me! But there's no pity for me. I have sinned too much. There's nothing but hell for me." In vain did friends reason with him on the infinite love of Christ, willing, at all times to save to the uttermost. Satan urged his repeated backslidings, and despair seemed settled on his heart. By slow degrees, after much prayer, his mind grew calmer. He seemed to be in a more hopeful condition. But it was only a transient beam of light. His soul was unrenewed. The impression was not lasting. In his heart of hearts, he longed to return to the sins that he loved, and hoped, by-and-by, he should yet be saved!

Thomas White recovered. His heart was not grateful. He thought not of the mercy that had hitherto spared him. He not only returned to his old companions, but formed an acquaintance with a young friend of dissolute morals. To supply this new friend with money, extortionate demands were made on the mother, who still hoping, even against hope, in her son's future reclamation, gave him all she had.

It was Saturday night previous to the accident. White and the friend we have alluded to were spending what they called a gay evening at a saloon. The former was much the worse for liquor, and before he left her, promised to take her to Chicago, on the morrow. When the morning came, he rose and dressed himself with care.

"Where are you going?" asked his mother.

"To Chicago."

"Don't go, Tom," said she imploringly; "stay at home with me, and take me to church. You're never at home now."

"No, I must go, mother; and if I stayed, I shouldn't go to church."

"Oh! Tom, you haven't been since you got better. What will become of you?"

He seemed staggered by the question, but tried to laugh it off by saying—

"You're very dull to-day; but never mind, you'll see I shall become quite a religious man by-and-by."

She saw him depart, despite her entreaties; and with a heavy heart she returned to her room, where she indulged in a flood of tears.

At the station he met his wicked companion. "Come along," he said in high glee. "I mean to have a jolly day. The old lady tried to keep me at home to go to church; but it was no go." And with an irreverent laugh they entered the carriage. A few hours later, their mangled corpses were brought back, and the frightful intelligence of the catastrophe conveyed to their homes.

"Stifle not your conscience! Trifle not with sin!" says the Scripture. "To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart."

HOME DREAMS.

It comes to me often in silence
 When the fire-light sputters low—
 When the black uncertain shadows
 Seem wraiths of the long ago;
 Always with a throb of heartache
 That thrills each pulsive vein,
 Comes the old, unquiet longing,
 For the peace of home again.

I'm sick of the roar of cities,
 And of faces cold and strange;
 I know where there's warmth of welcome,
 And my yearning fancies range
 Back to the dear old homestead,
 With an aching sense of pain;
 I t'here'll be a joy in the coming,
 When I go home again.

When I go home again! There's music
 That never may die away,
 And it seems the hands of angels,
 On a mystic harp, at play.
 Sobbing, the night wind murmurs
 To the splash of the autumn rain;
 But I dream of the glorious greeting
 When I go home again.

—Eugene Field.

A PRAYER FOR TRUST.

I ask not, Lord, that thou wouldst make
 My pathway smooth and bright;
 But only that my feet may walk
 Where thou dost send the light.

I pray not for untroubled bliss,
 Nor for a cloudless sky,
 But only that, or shine or storm,
 To thee may bring me nigh.

I only ask that thou wouldst be
 My escort and my friend;
 That thou wouldst lead me as thou wilt,
 And keep me to the end.

—Church Gleaser.

GOD'S PRECIOUS PROMISES.

GOD'S precious promises are sweet;
 How truly are they verified
 In the believer's life; they meet
 His wants when mostly tried.
 When bending o'er some grave in grief,
 Where one lies buried that was dear,
 These tender words bring him relief—
 "She is not dead but sleepeth here."

Or if some hidden anguish veils
 His hope in gloom, with what delight—
 His heart some other promise hails,
 That scatters far the mists of night.
 Do doubtings haunt his mind with fear
 And sore distress? yet undismayed
 His spirit grows, for one is near Whisp'ring "Tis I, be not afraid."

Do subtle foes his pathway tread,
 To lure him from the goal divine?
 In him he can resist, who said:
 "All pow'r in heav'n and earth are mine."
 In sickness, and in health as well,
 Each promise comes in turn to cheer;
 Teaching believers how to dwell
 In peace and perfect safety here.

And when at last with dread alarms

CURING A CHINESE ARISTOCRAT.

AN interesting case of opium cure is thus described by Mrs. Piggott of the China Inland Mission: The servant of the mandarin at Shansi was cured of opium smoking recently, and she was so delighted that when she went home to Yamen, she told them how easily she had been cured and how little she had suffered, and what a good thing it was to be cured of opium smoking. Through her influence one of the elder sons of the house came and was cured, and subsequently a daughter-in-law came with the same result. The daughter-in-law thought that the best thing she could do was to come to me, because they like to do things there indirectly; so he did not go straight to the opium refuge, but came to me and asked me as an intermediary to accompany her and to intercede for her that she should have very good medicine. She feared she would have to be shut up and not allowed to go out however ill she felt. She came and was cured, and just the day before I left she came to express her gratitude, and brought us two little presents which she said were her own work. She wished us to come and have dinner with her, which was a rare mark of respect. She has also put up a tablet in the opium refuge—a large board with a statement on it of her cure for the encouragement of others who may come for treatment. This was the first lady of rank we had; many have come since then. We make no stipulation before treating patients, but we find as a rule that a patient who has been cured of opium-smoking is pretty sure to come to the Sunday services.

SAMPLES DEMANDED.

A HUMBLE Christian worker was holding a preaching service in the open-air, when a well-dressed man approached, and at a pause in the service asked permission to address the meeting. Permission being given, he denounced religion as a humbug and a sham, and advised the men to go to the Socialist meetings, which he said would do them more good. While he was speaking the leader of the meeting learned from one of the men there that he was a drummer for a dry-goods house and a noted infidel. As he closed, the Christian man said to him, "I hear you are a drummer and go from town to town with samples of the goods manufactured by your firm. Now you are engaged to-day in another business, I ask you to show your samples. I will show you what we are doing." Beckoning to two men to stand up beside him, he continued, "Here are two brothers. You see them now. Five years ago they were the biggest scamps and drunkards in the district. They were wife-beaters, and even a terror in the saloon. But five years ago they went to a little Gospel meeting, and there they gave their hearts to Jesus. Now they and their wives are well dressed and their homes comfortably furnished, yet they are earning just the same wages as they did before their conversion, and in their homes all is happiness. That is the work of the Gospel. They are samples of what it can do. Now show me the samples of Socialism. Show me one drunkard made sober, one dishonest man made honest, one immoral man reclaimed and then we will listen to you. If Socialism is better than Christianity show your samples." There was a general laugh at the confusion which sat visibly on the face of the Socialist and amid the roar of derision he slunk away.

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

A CHANGE OF VIEW.

HOW a consistent life impresses the enemies of Christianity is forcibly illustrated in an incident related by a missionary recently returned from India. A native teacher named Ruttonji Nowroji went to a strange village and preached the Gospel and several persons were converted. The head man of the village was a bigoted Mohammedan. He was much annoyed by the introduction of Christianity and he warned the people that any one accepting the new religion would be turned out of the village. Some of the converts after this were afraid to confess their faith but others after praying that the head man might be turned from his purpose, were baptized. Their prayers were answered. The head man not only did not turn them out, but a short time afterward wrote the teacher to come back and baptize some more of the people for it had done those who were baptized good. They were now the best men in the village.

A MEDICINE MAN'S TRICK.

A SINGULAR exhibition of trickery is described by Mrs. McKittrick. During her labors in Africa she witnessed a species of trial somewhat in the nature of an inquiry by Grand Jury. Some of the brass rods which are used in West Central Africa as money had been stolen and this inquiry was directed to the discovery of the thief. The people according to custom called in the help of a medicine man. Mrs. McKittrick witnessed his arrival. Seating himself with due solemnity he muttered some incantations and then stated the circumstances of the theft. He next produced a native bell from his bag and declared that in a few minutes he would be able to name the thief. The name of a tribe was uttered and then a glass ball was set rolling from the top of the bell. There were flat spaces around the rim of the bell, and if the ball halted on one of them, it was indication that the thief belonged to the tribe, whose name was uttered before the glass ball started. "Lolongo," was the first name. The ball rolled on and off. "Lukolele," said the medicine man, and started the ball again. This time the ball stopped on a flat space and the operator declared that the thief belonged to the Lukolele people. Mrs. McKittrick noticed that the medicine-man ran the ball the second time on a different side of the bell. She watched him closely and as he was about to call off the families of the Lukolele people to find out by means of the ball to which family the thief belonged, she stopped him and asked permission to look at the bell. She found that the flat spaces on one side were greased and those on the other side were not. It was easy to see why the glass ball rolled off in one case and not in another. The medicine-man could thus convict anyone he chose of the crime. The trick was explained to the people and probably one or more lives saved by the exposure. The medicine man was an old man, who had plied his craft for many years. It is sad to think how many innocent victims have been sacrificed through his arts. If Christianity brought no hope for the life beyond the grave it would still be a beneficent influence in heathen lands for "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty."

THE COST OF PEACE IN CHINA.

In a speech made the other day on the needs of China, the Rev. J. W. Stevenson, who has been laboring in that land, told a pathetic story of an aged mother's efforts to find spiritual peace. A company of devout, elderly, well-to-do women, but with countenances marked by trial, came to the place where Mr. Stevenson was settled. One, who had lost by death her only son, told her story of dissatisfaction in the attempt to lay up merit by the peculiar and mortifying native religious observances. She had joined every Buddhist sect she could hear of, paying the fees which they exact for membership; and she wished to know what she must pay, and what long journeys she must take, in connection with what she called this new religion. Disappointment and bewilderment marked her demeanour as she heard of gospel free grace. For the sixty-eight years during which she had sought spiritual rest and satisfaction she never came across one who could tell her of Christ. That was an illustration of the condition of multitudes in China to-day.

AN APPEAL FOR EXORCISM.

A STRANGE appeal recently came to Rev. S. F. Woodin, a missionary of the American Board at Fulchau, China. He sends the story to the Independent: A man came to his house and begged him to visit his brother who was in much trouble. Going to the house indicated, accompanied by a medical missionary and several Chinese Christians, he found a man, his wife, daughter and nephew, all sick and in acute distress. Their sickness was a species of low fever, but as they professed to see demons and had been told their sickness was due to demoniacal possession, they concluded that the first step to recovery was to get the demons cast out. They had tried the usual plans. By the advice of a wizard, one of the sick men had been made run barefoot over a bed of burning coals of charcoal. All, however, had failed, and the head of the family having heard something of Christianity sent for the missionaries. The fundamental principles of Christianity were explained to him and to the other sick members of the family and prayer was offered. All gave serious attention to what was said, and when the missionary asked them if they were willing to give up their idols they consented. The missionary then proceeded to remove them, the head of the family pointing out their places or shrines. More than a score were removed. Dr. Kinnear, the medical missionary prescribed for the sick, and they are now recovering and are earnestly seeking Christ.

Breakfast Fruit Cake

BY MARION HARLAND.

1 quart of flour, 2 cups of milk, 2 tablespoonfuls of butter, 1 tablespoonful of lard, 1/2 teaspoonful salt, 1 quart of strawberries, huckleberries, blackberries or raspberries, 1/2 cup of sugar, 2 teaspoonfuls of Cleveland's baking powder.

Sift flour, baking powder and salt together, chop in the shortening, stir in the milk with a wooden spoon. The dough should be just stiff enough to handle. Roll into two sheets, line a baking pan with one, put in the berries, strew with sugar, lay on the other sheet and bake. Cut into squares, split and eat hot with sugar and butter.

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

The leavening power of Cleveland's Baking Powder comes from cream of tartar with soda, nothing else; that is why Cleveland's is perfectly wholesome, leavens most, and leavens best.

THE GOSPEL ON WHEELS.

Bishop Walker's Novel Method of Evangelizing in Villages of North Dakota—A Baptist Home Mission Car.

THE Church in this century has, like the world, manifested a restless, tireless energy in her work. With alert vision and intelligent adaptation she has availed herself of discoveries and inventions like the printing-press, the telegraph and all the increased facilities of travel and communication to spread abroad the glad news of salvation. Never since the time of the Apostles has there been a century so distinguished for aggressive Christian effort. Christian leaders, who believe that the coming of the Lord is near at hand, and those who are not looking for him until the world has been converted, have been alike active and energetic in their endeavors to preach the Gospel for a witness in all lands and in the neglected districts of our own land. Nor has the effort been a dull, unintelligent one. Conferences to discuss the best methods of work have been frequent and one branch of the Church has vied with another in devising new ways of reaching outsiders and winning souls for Christ. A remarkable and highly ingenious development of this aggressive spirit is that of the travelling church, two examples of which are now in operation. The Protestant Episcopal Church in North Dakota, and the Baptist Home Mission Society, have each a church of this kind, and both testify to the valuable results achieved by its help.

The first in the field was the Cathedral car, called "The Church of the Advent" constructed for services of the Protestant Episcopal Church in North Dakota, through the efforts of the Bishop of the Diocese, the Right Rev. Wm. David Walker, S. T. D., whose portrait appears on this page. Bishop Walker is an excellent type of the energetic aggressive Christian worker. He was born in New York fifty-two years ago, was educated at Trinity School and Columbia College, and prepared for ministerial work in the General Theological Seminary. On June 29, 1862, he was ordained Deacon in the Church of the Transfiguration in New York. For twenty-one years he labored industriously and successfully in Calvary Church of the same city spending a busy life among the poor and the afflicted, directing the missions of the Church, preaching in Mission Chapels and devising various new methods of evangelizing the masses. In 1883 his brethren in the Church, seeking an active and intelligent man for the new Bishopric of North Dakota, elected him to that trying position, and he was consecrated December 20, 1883, by Bishops Clark of Rhode Island, Potter and Cox of New York, Paddock of Massachusetts, Clarkson of Nebraska and others.

In entering on the duties of the diocese, he was impressed with the magnitude of the field and the paucity of the means at his command. In travelling through his diocese he saw isolated farms and small villages utterly unprovided with a place of worship, and far away from any town where there was a church. All along the four lines of railroad which crossed the State, hamlets might be seen in large numbers duly equipped with one or more saloons, but with no church. How to provide for the spiritual need of these people was a problem which weighed on the Bishop's mind. There were, in most cases, not sufficient people to erect church-buildings and the capital that would be required to build them by outside effort would be simply enormous. Yet the need was urgent. Many of the people were well educated. Bishop Walker says he has been surprised at the number of college graduates he has met in the course of his journeys. Large numbers had been trained in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and to these especially, the impossibility of reaching a consecrated building was a sore trial. To them, marriages, the baptism of their children, and the celebration of the Lord's Supper in any other building than one solemnly dedicated and set apart for divine service would have lost much of their sanctity. There was therefore a danger in the absence of such a building, of their disregarding religious observance altogether and lapsing into a condition of practical heathenism. It was this condition of affairs which eventually led to the idea of the Cathedral car.

No sooner did the idea enter the Bishop's mind than he put it into execution. He returned to New York and speedily collected the necessary funds and gave orders for the erection of the first church on wheels. An excellent car sixty feet long was built by Messrs. Pullman and the idea of a church was observed by a slight transverse elevation giving the vehicle in the upper part the form of a cross. The interior was finished in oak in the Gothic style. The furnishing was a mosaic of gifts. A church at Summit, N. J., presented the altar; Dr. Conrad of Philadelphia presented the lectern as a memorial of his father; the altar-cloth, the Bishop's chair, the organ, the font, the communion service and the Bible were gifts from other persons or Societies. Thus the car fully equipped for work was finished and delivered to the Bishop for his beneficent object.

The Bishop's plan is to send a placard ahead to be exhibited at a railroad station, stating when the car will arrive and the hours of service. The car is attached to a train, drawn to the station and switched to a side track. After the services are over it is attached to another train and taken to the next stopping-place.

Thus the work goes on from day to day. The Bishop has now about eighty places which he thus visits in regular order. Great interest is manifested everywhere in the car but especially by railroad men. "As I go here and there all over North Dakota," says the Bishop in a letter to his friend, the eminent Dr. Langford of New York, "brakemen, conductors, yardmen, engineers, firemen, telegraph operators, dining-car waiters, porters, switchmen, ticket-agents, baggage-men, express agents, superintendents, general managers—all ask affectionately about their 'cathedral,' where it is, when it will come to them again. It is a new ecclesiastical zeal and affection appearing in a new place. The car is packed with people at every service. There are seats for upward of seventy persons. We invariably have a larger number present. Very frequently three persons sit on two chairs.

Ninety persons have been present with us again and again. The worship is very hearty. Men who have not attended services of any kind hearts. The embarrassment which men feel in visiting a clergyman at his home or talking with him in a church is wanting in the car. It is open and free to come and to go in and out of at will.

"My custom is to do all the work necessary in the car with my own hands. It would be very unlike a missionary in this new Northwest to bring a uniformed porter on my journeys. It would give unreality to the work. So I prepare the lamps and light them. I sweep the floor and make my own bed, and distribute the leaflets, and make the fires, and put the seats in order. About half the time it falls to my lot to play the organ. I find all this no hardship. Often I have three or four hours on my hands while waiting for service-time to arrive, on a side-track. Many then come to see me, and feel disposed to look on me as a workman like themselves. I only desire to say in closing that the 'cathedral car of North Dakota' is preeminently a success."

No less successful is the Baptist Missionary Society's car suitably named The Evangel. The origin of the idea of this car dates back to 1873, when Mr. G. H. Herrick of St. James, Minn., persuaded the Railroad Company to side-track a car at that place for a whole winter to be used as a Sunday School. A flourishing Baptist Church has grown from that beginning. Boston W. Smith, the Sunday School Missionary of the Baptist Publication Society, hearing of the success of this work, advocated a similar expedient in other neglected districts and finally Dr. Wayland Hoyt of Minneapolis took the scheme up and carried it into execution. A syndicate composed of Colgate Hoyt, John D. Rockefeller, James B. Colgate, John B. Trevor, Charles L. Colby and E. J. Barney was formed for building a car. The work was done by Barney & Smith of Dayton, O., and on May 23, the car completed and furnished, was presented by the syndicate free of cost to the Home Missionary Society. At the dedication services Dr. Wayland Hoyt made the gratifying announcement that the leading railroad men all over the West and Northwest had promised that the Evangel should be carried to and fro on their lines without charge. It will seat one hundred persons and has sleeping accommodation for the missionaries, buffets for the cooking of meals and a room to be used as a library. It also contains a fine organ. The total cost of the car as it is furnished was about $12,000. It is intended that the car shall be the means of initiating permanent work. It will stay long enough at each place to organize a Sunday School which, after the car leaves, will meet in a building.

for ten, fifteen, even twenty years, who scoffed through these years at the very idea, have been present again and again. They were absent from other worship because they claimed to be free-thinkers or agnostics or sceptics. They have looked on quietly, or they have joined in the singing of some popular hymn because they could not help it, so thrilling was the experience as every voice was lifted up in song.

"My highest comfort in connection with this work has come from the fact that more individual souls have been personally reached than in all the years of my ministry in proportion to the number preached to. That is to say, I have had more men coming to me after the services to talk solemnly about duty, life, their souls, than ever in my previous experience. Careless men, godless men, reckless men, sinful men have come and opened out their

A HARVEST SCENE.

Dr. Talmage Preached last Sunday at Green Mountain Falls, Colo., to a vast Congregation. "And she went and came and gleaned in the field after the reapers: and her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz who was of the kindred of Elimelech." Ruth 2: 3.

WITHIN a few weeks I have been in North Carolina, Virginia, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Michigan, Canada, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Missouri, and they are one great harvest-field, and no season can be more enchanting in any country than the season of harvest.

The time that Ruth and Naomi arrive at Bethlehem is harvest-time. It was the load custom when a sheaf fell from a in the harvest-field for the reapers to refuse to gather it up: that was to be left for the poor who might happen to come that way. If there were handfuls of grain scattered across the field after the main harvest had been reaped, instead of raking it, as farmers do now, it was, by the custom of the land, left in its place, so that the poor, coming along that way, might glean it and get their bread. But, you say, "What is the use of all these harvest-fields to Ruth and Naomi? Naomi is too old and feeble to go out and toil in the sun; and can you expect that Ruth, the young and the beautiful, should tan her cheeks and blister her hands in the harvest-field?"

Boaz owns a large farm, and he goes out to see the reapers gather in the grain. Coming there, right behind the swarthy, sun-browned reapers, he beholds a beautiful woman glean— a woman more fit to bend to a harp or sit upon a throne than to stoop among the sheaves. Ah, that was an eventful day!

It was love at first sight. Boaz forms an attachment for the womanly gleaner—an attachment full of undying interest to the Church of God in all ages; while Ruth, with an ephah, or nearly a bushel of barley, goes home to Naomi to tell her the successes and adventures of the day. That Ruth, who left her native land of Moab in darkness, and journeyed through an undying affection for her mother-in-law, is in the harvest-field of Boaz, is affianced to one of the best families in Judah, and becomes in after-time the ancestress of Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory! Out of so dark a night did there ever dawn so bright a morning?

I learn, in the first place, from this subject how trouble develops character. It was bereavement, poverty, and exile that developed, illustrated, and announced to all ages the sublimity of Ruth's character. That is a very unfortunate man who has no trouble. It was sorrow that made John Bunyan the better dreamer, and Doctor Young the better poet, and O'Connell the better orator, and Bishop Hall the better preacher, and Havelock the better soldier, and Kitto the better encyclopedist, and Ruth the better daughter-in-law.

I once asked an aged man in regard to his pastor, who was a very brilliant man: "Why is it that your pastor, so very brilliant, seems to have so little tenderness in his sermons?" "Well," he replied, "the reason is, our pastor has never had any trouble. When misfortune comes upon him, his style will be different." After a while the Lord took a child out of that pastor's house; and though the preacher was just as brilliant as he was before, oh, the warmth, the tenderness of his discourses! The fact is that trouble is a great educator. You see sometimes a musician sit down at an instrument, and his execution is cold and formal and unfeeling. The reason is that all his life he has been prospered. But let misfortune or bereavement come to that man, and he sits down at the instrument, and you discover the pathos in the first sweep of the keys. Misfortune and trials are great educators. A young doctor comes into a sick-room where there is a dying child. Perhaps he is very rough in his prescription, and very rough in his manner, and rough in the feeling of the pulse, and rough in his answer to the mother's anxious question; but the years roll on, and there has been one dead in his own house; and now he comes into the sick-room, and with tearful eye he looks at the dying child, and he says, "Oh, how this reminds me of my Charlie!" Trouble, the great educator! Sorrow—I see its touch in the grandest painting; I hear its tremor in the sweetest song; I feel its power in the mightiest argument.

Grecian mythology said that the fountain of Hippocrene was struck out by the foot of the winged horse, Pegasus. I have often noticed in life that the brightest and most beautiful fountains of Christian comfort and spiritual life have been struck out by the iron-shod hoof of disaster and calamity. I see Daniel's courage best by the flash of Nebuchadnezzar's furnace. I see Paul's prowess best when I find him on the foundering ship under the glare of the lightning in the breakers of Melita. God crowns his children amid the howling of wild beasts and the chopping of blood-splashed guillotine and the crackling fires of martyrdom. It took the persecutions of Marcus Aurelius to develop Polycarp and Justin Martyr. It took the pope's bull and the cardinal's curse, and the world's anathema to develop Martin Luther. It took all the hostilities against the Scotch Covenanters and the fury of Lord Claverhouse to develop James Renwick, and Andrew Melville, and Hugh McKail, the glorious martyrs of Scotch history. It took the stormy sea, and the December blast, and the desolate New England coast, and the war-whoop of savages, to show forth the prowess of the Pilgrim Fathers—

RUTH AND BOAZ.

When amid the storms they sang,
And the stars heard, and the sea;
And the sounding aisles of the dim wood
Rang to the anthems of the free.

It took all our past national distresses, and it takes all our present national sorrows, to lift up our nation on that high career where it will march along after the foreign despotisms that have mocked and the tyrannies that have jeered, shall be swept down under the omnipotent wrath of God, who hates, oppression and who, by the strength of his own red right arm, will make all men free. And so it is individually, and in the family, and in the Church, and in the world, that through darkness and storm and trouble men, women, churches, nations, are developed.

Again, I see in my text the beauty of unfaltering friendship. I suppose there were plenty of friends for Naomi while she was in prosperity; but of all her acquaintances, how many were willing to trudge off with her toward Judæa, when she had to make that lonely journey? One—the heroine of my text. One—absolutely one. I suppose when Naomi's husband was living, and they had plenty of money, and all things went well, they had a great many callers; but I suppose that after her husband died, and her property went, and she got old and poor, she was not troubled very much with callers. All the birds that sang in the bower while the sun shone have gone to their nests, now the night has fallen.

Oh, these beautiful sun-flowers that spread out their color in the morning hour! but they are always asleep when the sun is going down! Job had plenty of friends when he was the richest man in Uz; but when his property went and the trials came, then there were none so much that pestered as Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite.

Life often seems to be a mere game, where the successful player pulls down all the other men into his own lap. Let suspicions arise about a man's character, and he becomes like a bank in a panic, and all the imputations rush on him and break down in a day that character which in due time would have had strength to defend itself. There are reputations that have been half a century in building, which go down under some moral exposure, as a vast temple is consumed by the touch of a sulphurous match. A hog can uproot a century plant. In this world, so full of heartlessness and hypocrisy, how thrilling it is to find some friend as faithful in days of adversity as in days of prosperity! David had such a friend in Hushai; the Jews had such a friend in Mordecai, who never forgot their cause; Paul had such a friend in Onesiphorus, who visited him in jail; Christ had such in the Marys, who adhered to him on the Cross; Naomi had such a one in Ruth, who cried out; "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me."

Again, I learn from this subject that paths which open in hardship and darkness often come out in places of joy. When Ruth started from Moab toward Jerusalem, to go along with her mother-in-law, I suppose the people said: "Oh, what a foolish creature to go away from her father's house, to go off with a poor old woman toward the land of Judæa! They won't live to get across the desert. They will be drowned in the sea, or the jackals of the wilderness will destroy them." It was a very dark morning when Ruth started off with Naomi; but behold her in my text in the harvest-field of Boaz, to be affianced to one of the lords of the land, and become one of the grandmothers of Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory. And so it often is that a path which starts very darkly ends very brightly.

When you started out for heaven, oh, how dark was the hour of conviction—how Sinai thundered, and devils tormented, and the darkness thickened! All the sins of your life pounced upon you, and it was the darkest hour you ever saw when you first found out your sins. After awhile you went into the harvest-field of God's mercy; you began to glean in the fields of divine promise, and you had more sheaves than you could carry, as the voice of God addressed you, saying: "Blessed is the man whose transgressions are forgiven and whose sins are covered." A very dark starting in conviction, a very bright ending in the pardon and the hope and the triumph of the Gospel!

So, very often in our worldly business or in our spiritual career, we start off on a very dark path. We must go. The flesh may shrink back, but there is a voice within, or a voice from above, saying, "You must go;" and we have to drink the gall, and we have to carry the cross, and we have to traverse the desert and we are pounded and flailed of misrepresentation and abuse, and we have to urge our way through ten thousand obstacles that have to be slain by our own right arm. We have to ford the river, we have to climb the mountain, we have to storm the castle; but, blessed be God, the day of rest and reward will come. On the tip-top of the captured battlements we will shout the victory; if not in this world, then in that world where there is no gall to drink, no burdens to carry, no battles to fight. How do I know it? Know it! I know it because God says so: "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat, for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe all tears from their eyes."

Christ, hounded of persecutors, denied a pillow, worse maltreated than the thieves on either side of the cross, human hate smacking its lips in satisfaction after it had been draining his last drop of blood, the sheeted dead bursting from the sepulchres at his crucifixion. Tell me, O Gethsemane and Golgotha! were there ever darker times than those? Like the booming of the midnight sea against the rock, the surges of Christ's anguish beat against the gates of eternity, to be echoed back by all the thrones of heaven and all the dungeons of hell. But the day of reward comes for Christ; all the pomp and dominion of this world are to be hung on his throne, uncrowned heads are to bow before him on whose head are many crowns, and all the celestial worship is to come up at his feet, like the humming of the forest, like the rushing of the waters, like the thundering of the seas, while all heaven, rising on their thrones, beat time with their sceptres: "Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth! Hallelujah, the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord Jesus Christ!"

That song of love, now low and far,
Ere long shall swell from star to star;
That light, the breaking day which tips
The golden-spired Apocalypse.

Again, I learn from my subject that events which seem to be most insignificant may be momentous. Can you imagine anything more unimportant than the coming of a poor woman from Moab to Judæa? Can you imagine anything more trivial than the fact that this Ruth just happened to alight—as they say—just happened to alight on that field of Boaz? Yet all ages, all generations, have an interest in the fact that she was to become an ancestress of the Lord Jesus Christ, and all nations and kingdoms must look at that one little incident with a thrill of unspeakable and eternal satisfaction. So it is in your history and in mine: events that you thought of no importance at all have been of very great moment. That casual conversation, that accidental meeting—you did not think of it again for a long while; but how it changed all the current of your life!

It seemed to be of no importance that Jubal invented rude instruments of music, calling them harp and organ; but they were the introduction of all the world's minstrelsy; and as you hear the vibration of a stringed instrument, even after the fingers have been taken away from it, so all music now of lute and drum and cornet is only the long-continued strains of Jubal's harp and Jubal's organ. It seemed to be a matter of very little importance that Tubal Cain learned the uses of copper and iron; but that rude foundry of ancient days has its echo in the rattle of Birmingham machinery, and the roar and bang of factories on the Merrimac.

Again, I see in my subject an illustration of the beauty of female industry. Behold Ruth toiling in the harvest-field under the hot sun, or at noon taking plain bread with the reapers, or eating the parched corn which Boaz handed to her. The customs of society, of course, have changed, and without the hardships and exposure to which Ruth was subjected, every intelligent woman will find something to do. I know there is a sickly sentimentality on this subject. In some families there are persons of no practical service. They would not deign to look at Ruth carrying back the barley on her way home to her mother-in-law, Naomi. All this fastidiousness may seem to do very well while they are under the shelter of their father's house; but when the sharp winter of misfortune comes, what of these butterflies? Persons under indulgent parentage may get upon themselves habits of indolence; but when they come out into practical life their soul will recoil with disgust and chagrin. They will feel in their hearts what the poet so severely satirized when he said:

Folks are so awkward, things so impolite,
They're elegantly pained from morn till night.

Through that gate of indolence how many men and women have marched, useless on earth, to a destroyed eternity! Spinola said to Sir Horace Vere: "Of what did your brother die?" "Of having nothing to do," was the answer. "Ah!" said Spinola, "that's enough to kill any general of us." Oh! can it be possible in this world, where there is so much suffering to be alleviated, so much darkness to be enlightened, and so many burdens to be carried, that there is any person who cannot find anything to do?

Madame de Staël did a world of work in her time; and one day, while she was seated amid instruments of music, all of which she had mastered, and amid manuscript books which she had written, some one said to her: "How do you find time to attend to all these things?" "Oh," she replied, "these are not the things I am proud of. My chief boast is in the fact that I have seventeen trades, by anyone of which I could make a livelihood if necessary." And if in secular spheres there is so much to be done, in spiritual work how vast the field! How many dying all around about us without one word of comfort! We want more Abigails, more Hannahs, more Rebecas, more Mary's, more Deborahs consecrated—body, mind, soul,—to the Lord who bought them.

Once more I learn from my subject the value of gleaning. Ruth going into that harvest-field might have said: "There is a straw, and there is a straw, but what is a straw? I can't get any barley for myself or my mother-in-law out of these separate straws." Not so said beautiful Ruth. She gathered two straws, and she put them together, and more straws, until she got enough to make a sheaf. Putting that down, she went and gathered more straws, until she had another sheaf, and another and another, and then she brought them all together, and she threshed them out, and she had an ephah of barley, nigh a bushel. Oh, that we might all be gleaners!

Elihu Burritt learned many things while toiling in a blacksmith's shop. Abercrombie, the world-renowned philosopher, was a physician in Scotland, and he got his philosophy, or the chief part of it, while, as a physician, he was waiting for the door of the sick-room to open. Yet how many there are in this day who say they are so busy they have no time for mental or spiritual improvement; the great duties of life cross the field like strong reapers, and carry off all the hours, and there is only here and there a fragment left, that is not worth gleaning. Ah, my friends, you could go into the busiest day and busiest week of your life and find golden opportunities, which, gathered, might at last make a whole sheaf for the Lord's garner. It is the stray opportunities and the stray privileges which, taken up and bound together and beaten out, will at last fill you with much joy.

There are a few moments left worth the gleaning. Now, Ruth, to the field! May each one have a measure full and running over! Oh, you gleaners, to the field! And if there be in your household an aged one or a sick relative that is not strong enough to come forth and toil in this field, then let Ruth take home to feeble Naomi this sheaf of gleaning; "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." May the Lord God of Ruth and Naomi be our portion forever!

A MISSING BODY.

DURING the recent celebration at New Haven, Conn., on the occasion of the unveiling of the monument to Adjutant Campbell, it was generally understood that the remains of the gallant officer reposed beneath the memorial. That supposition, it now appears, was erroneous. The committee in charge of the work decided not to erect the monument over his grave, but on a knoll a short distance away, where it would be more conspicuous. They had given instructions for the body to be taken up and placed under the monument; but when the grave was opened there was no sign of coffin or body. The most careful search revealed nothing that differed from the soil. This is not surprising, as it is more than a hundred years since Campbell was interred. The monument, therefore, does not mark his last resting-place. But it does more. It proves that a man's character and the memory of his virtues are more enduring than his body. The lesson is timely, for in these days of luxury and selfishness men seem to forget that it is the righteous who are held in everlasting remembrance (Ps. 112: 6), but the name of the wicked shall rot. (Prov. 10: 7.)

A GOLD MINE IN A ROOF.

THE purchase of an old tin roof for three thousand dollars is reported in the Philadelphia Record, which also gives a sufficient reason for so high a price being paid for it. The roof is that of the Old Tabernacle Church at Broad Street and South Penn Square. Some years ago the paint on the roof was scraped off and the scrapings being tested were found to contain gold which was worth five thousand dollars. The gold comes from the Mint. When gold is being coined there, a considerable quantity volatilizes with the smoke through the chimney, and as soon as it strikes the air it falls. Much of it falls on the roof of the Mint, so much of it that the officials save even the water that falls upon it during a shower. Before the water finally gets to the sewer it is strained through many blankets and sieves which retain the gold. By these means the Mint recovers the greater part of the gold that falls on its own roof, but it appears that a portion of the precious shower is carried to the church, probably by the wind. As it is now able to sell its old tin roof for three thousand dollars, the church evidently profits by its proximity to the Mint. It has always been found that the closer the Church gets to the world the richer it gets, but unhappily it has generally gained its wealth not by selling its roof but by selling its principles. (Micah 3: 11.)

A NEW PERIL OF THE DEEP.

A NORWEGIAN vessel which arrived at Wilmington, N. C., on July 24, had a narrow escape during her voyage from Hamburg to that port. One moonlight night, when the ship was three days out, her captain and the mate, who were both on deck, saw close to their port side a sunken rock over which every other sea was breaking. The ship passed within a few feet of it. As there was a high sea the Captain did not deem it advisable to remain and take soundings, but as he and his mate are experienced seamen and accustomed to seeing breakers of this kind, reliance may be placed on their estimate that there is about one and a half fathoms of water on this spot. The weather having been cloudy for several days, they were not able to take an observation so that the exact situation of the rock is not known. The Captain, however, can calculate where it is, within a comparatively short distance, and he advises that an early investigation be made with the view of having the rock carefully marked on the charts. This duty should be performed without delay. The rock lies in the track of vessels sailing between Europe and our Southern ports and there is constant danger of wreck and loss of life while the charts give no warning of its presence. When it is marked on the charts Captains will know of it and avoid it, for they do not neglect their charts as people do their Bibles, which are their charts showing the lurking perils in the voyage of life. (Ps. 119: 105.)

A BLOOD-STAINED BILL.

A REMARKABLE trial for murder was closed at Springfield, O., on June 25. A night-watchman was killed some time ago in that city. He was struck from behind as he was turning in his report on the alarm-box, and his blood spurted on the box and the wall. It was evident that some fell on the murderer, too, for the marks of his fingers were seen on his victim's clothing, where he had rifled the pockets. Strong suspicion centred on a young man who was known to have been in the neighborhood on the night when the crime was committed. The evidence produced at the trial was wholly circumstantial, and the jury would probably have acquitted him, but for the mute testimony of a ten dollar bill, which he changed shortly after the crime was committed. There were stains on the bill, which, when examined under a microscope, proved to be those of blood. That fact convinced the jury of his guilt. The time is coming when many people will be similarly convicted of wrongdoing on the evidence of money. The Apostle warns those who deal unjustly with their employees that their "gold and silver is rusted and their rust will be a witness" against them in the day of judgment. (James 5: 3.)

A MURDEROUS GIFT.

THE wife of M. Constans, the minister of the Interior in the Cabinet of the French Republic, received a present of a book a few days ago. It appeared to be a Roman Catholic prayer-book. Mme. Constans on receiving the book found the leaves stuck fast together, and handed it to the butler to open. The butler was about to use a chisel on it when he noticed a fuse affixed to the leaves. The book was then turned over to the police, by whom it was cautiously opened. Then a cavity was disclosed in which was concealed 200 grammes of fulminate. A few grains of the fulminate, when tested in a laboratory, exploded with a loud report. Volumes similarly charged were received by other Government officials but their dangerous character was discovered before any damage was done. For some time to come, persons in Paris, receiving presents of books will regard them with suspicion and will be very careful about opening them lest they may contain destructive compounds. Happily, such plots are not common among us, but there are books in circulation the efforts of which are more to be dreaded than those sent to the French ministers. While the latter might destroy life the former contain moral poison. (Titus 1: 11.)

WHY PEACH TREES DECAY.

A WARNING to the owners of peach-farms is published by the Sentinel of Dover, Del. It says that there is one thing about the fruit business that growers have neglected, which may have a great deal to do with the fast decay of the once splendidly-paying orchards, and that is taking proper care of the trees. In the days when small orchards were the rule it was considered as essential to worm the trees once or twice a year, and to put ashes and gas lime around them, as for a farmer to cultivate his corn after planting. But with the era of large orchards all this was done away with, and every crop of fruit but added to the large number of insects in the land, until the soil has become filled with them. Nor is it so with peaches alone; the cherry and apple crops will similarly decrease if care is not taken of each tree. A similar warning might be given to ministers and evangelists, who are apt to gauge their success by the number of the converts. Care should be taken of each individual, lest the worms of selfishness, covetousness and worldliness do their deadly work. A large church or a revival with hundreds of converts adds to the worldly fame of the worker, but God is glorified only when the converts bear much fruit. (John 15: 8.)

THE FIVE THOUSAND FED.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 16, By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 6: 1-14. Golden Text, John 6: 48.

AFTER his teaching in Jerusalem and his subsequent journeyings in Galilee, Jesus went over the sea of Galilee. It was not his first visit to this country, for it was here that he healed the demoniacs. It was probably this wondrous work of healing which caused Jesus, on this his second visit, to be so popular. "A great multitude followed him because they saw the miracles which he did on them which were diseased." They knew Jesus as a miracle worker, and a wondrous Physician, and that was all! O how much they had to learn! The teaching of Jesus had, as yet, no attraction for them. They saw before them a Physician whose skill was equal to any case which was brought to him, who performed operations without the knife, who healed without any remedies, who asked no fee, who rejected no case as hopeless. Living as they did, a fleshly life, minding the things of the flesh, they saw in Jesus the ready and willing minister to their needs; and that was all! But this is the idea which many form of Jesus Christ our Saviour!

"And Jesus went up into a mountain, and there he sat with his disciples." Jesus often went into the mountains for prayer, and often taught them. He loved away from the level of the world. As we learn to live, and pray, and teach on high ground, from above and not from beneath, God gives power to our life and testimony. As the good Samaritan, he could come down to the wounded man "where he was," he could stretch out a hand to the sinking Peter, but in spirit he was always on high ground in his oneness with his Father.

High Ground,

The Passover was nigh at hand. "When Jesus then lifted up his eyes," not only on the things around him, but to his Father in heaven, that he might see all in his light, "He saw a great company come unto him." He was not perplexed, although he asked Philip, "Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat?" "This he said to prove him, for he himself knew what he would do." God is equal to the occasion, whatever it may be, and at all times. It is his glory to work when and where to human eyes everything looks impossible.

Philip's Horizon

was bounded by earth and earth's resources. He made a calculation to the best of his ability, and said, "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little." And did Jesus count for nothing? Philip's largest computation, even if it were carried out, would, after all, have only provided "that every one" should "take a little!" Why do we calculate? Why do we seek to make combinations and provide in our poor, earthly, near-sighted way against what may happen, instead of going, in childlike simplicity, to our heavenly Father with all our needs, both great and small? "He himself knew what he would do."

"One of his disciples, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith unto him, There is a lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes." But, following the computations of Philip, he added, "But

What are they among so many?"

Oh, if we would learn to measure the needs of the heathen,—the difficulties of the language, the climate, the almost impossibility of awakening among the heathen a spiritual idea—against God's almightiness, surely more would be accomplished. "What are they among so many?" What am I for the work to which I am called? What are the resources which I have in hand for that which has to be accomplished? All this is reckoning after the flesh. What is my Lord to me just now? What is he able to do? How far are he and I of one mind in this matter? This is the divine way of reckoning.

But Jesus does not reproach his disciples for their unbelief: he simply gives a direction

"Make the People Sit Down."

This was to be the work of the disciples; he would do the rest. Get them quiet, and still, and expectant. Tell them who it is that is on the ground; then your work is done, and Jesus can commence his. He works in the stillness, when the energy of the flesh comes to a halt. "They sat down in number about five thousand;" and there before them were the five little loaves and two small fishes; hardly enough for the meal of two hungry men. But there was Jesus, by whom all things were made, and without whom "was not anything made that was made." (John 1: 3.) He took the loaves. What would they become in such hands, which healed the sick and raised the dead? And he gave thanks, at an hour, and in circumstances, where most men would have grumbled and pitied themselves! And thus attracting the attention of all away from themselves and away from himself to his Father, he began the distribution to the disciples, who found themselves far out in their reckoning. Row after row of the seated people was supplied, and yet there was abundance; the guests of Jesus took of the loaves and of the fishes, as much as they would. Earthly resources give but a little; God's gifts are only limited by the capacity to receive; "as much as they would" is always his measure. "He giveth not the Spirit by measure." (John 3: 42; R. V.) "When they were filled," not till then, the supply ceased.

Then he said to his disciples, "Gather up

The Fragments that Remain,

that nothing be lost." The disciples who should be "able ministers of the New Testament, ministering the Spirit and life" are the last to leave the ground. Fragments of the bread of life, which others reject, are prized by those who go patiently over the ground again. In God's provision, there is always enough and to spare, but nothing of that which God, in his goodness, gives us is to be wasted, despised, or thrown away. That which others reject becomes peculiarly his own gift to us. While five little loaves and two small fishes began the feast, twelve large baskets of fragments were gathered by the disciples. The multitude had one meal, the disciples more, from that divinely increased provision.

Why do we continue to stagger under difficulties and apparent impossibilities which meet us? Our Shepherd has not left us alone. "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." (Matt. 28: 20.) But it is a habit of life not easily formed, and one that needs close and continual attention to the Shepherd's voice, to "endure as seeing him who is invisible." It was just such a life which could make Paul bold in face of predicted bonds and imprisonments, "None of these things move me." (Acts 20: 24.)

"Then those men when they had seen the miracle which Jesus did said, This is of a truth

That Prophet

that should come into the world." And they wanted at once to make him king, and offer him earthly honor. But he had not finished his mission as a prophet. These people had not yet learned to see themselves in the light of God, or they would have been more ready to know him as Priest with his atoning blood than to set up a temporal kingdom. He is King, and he shall reign until all enemies are subject to him. (1. Cor. 15: 25.) But his kingdom begins within us, where his prophet work, and his priestly work must take precedence. But by and by, when his people are fully conquered to him, and he shall have formed his Bride, then he will go forth, "conquering and to conquer," and "the kingdoms of this world" shall "become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ and then he shall be King and he shall reign forever."

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

THEY saw his miracles which he did on them that were diseased. There is not a single instance on record of our Lord refusing or failing to heal a sick one that sought his help—whatever the affliction may have been. Nor have we any record of his compelling any one to come to him for healing. No doubt there were many in that vast audience who were sick and did not know it. They were not healed. Others were sick, but did not care to admit or own it. They were not healed. And others, again, who notwithstanding the wonderful display of healing power they saw successfully applied to others, feared that theirs was an incurable disease and therefore did not even make an effort. And they were not healed.

Christ is still working miracles on those that are diseased and who apply to him for help. His healing power has suffered no abatement. As in days of old the halt, the maimed, the blind, the deaf and the dumb found prompt and complete restoration at his hands, so to-day the weary, sin-sick soul, however chronic or deep-seated the disease, may come to the Divine Physician and have the Balm of Gilead applied.

Hear the footsteps of Jesus,
He is now passing by,
Bearing balm for the wounded,
Healing all who apply:
As he spoke to the sufferer
Who lay at the pool,
He saying this moment,
"Wilt thou be made whole?"

But we must know and admit that we are in need of help and in all humility and with a contrite heart confess our sins and plead for mercy.

A Prince once visited a prison and on his way through it he stopped at every cell and conversed with the prisoners. Each had a tale of innocent suffering. Not one was guilty according to his own account. As the prince was passing out he met an old man, also a prisoner, and asked him how he happened to be so unfortunate as to be found in prison in the evening of his life. The old man burst into tears and confessed that even to live in prison was more of mercy than he deserved. He had been so wicked that no amount of suffering could ever make atonement. Moved by the honest confession and evident repentance of the prisoner, the prince cried in amazement: Wicked wretch—how could they imprison you amongst so many innocent men—go out at once and never again darken the door of any prison.

As much as they would. Jesus always gives good measure "pressed down, shaken together and running over." He invites us to ask largely that our joy may be full. There is no limitation to his bounty. He "whose are the cattle on a thousand hills" can do for us "exceeding abundant above all that we ask or think." Has God blessed and prospered you, given you joy unspeakable and peace that passeth understanding? Rejoice and be exceedingly glad for still there's more to follow. His supplies are exhaustless. Philip II, King of Spain, fabulously wealthy and the owner of exhaustless mines, sent one of his ambassadors to the Duke of Savoy. The Duke, anxious to impress his visitor with a sense of his own importance, invited him to visit his treasure vault and there he proudly pointed to gold and silver stacked up—pile after pile. The ambassador looked it all over and congratulated the owner of so much wealth. Then leaning down he lowered a cane which he carried until it touched the bottom of the vault. "Why," said he apparently surprised, "this vault has a bottom to it." "Certainly," said the Duke. "Ah," came the answer, "I see. That makes a big difference. The treasure vaults of my king and master are bottomless." The true Christian need not be apprehensive that his Master's supplies will ever give out, for it is not written: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

Filled twelve baskets with the fragments of five barley loaves. Strange mathematics:—subtracting increases, division multiplies. He takes five loaves, feeds five thousand hungry people, and twelve basketfuls are still left. He sends adversity, loss of property, sickness, bereavement—takes all the world holds dear; knocks away all the props, and they who sought happiness in vain while prosperity's sun shone upon them, now rest on their Saviour's bosom and exultantly sing:

The peace of Christ makes bright my heart,
A fountain ever springing,
All things are mine since I am his
How can I keep from singing.

"Jesus the same yesterday, to-day, and forever."

THE PRITCHARD MILLION

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for August 16, John 7: 48, "I am that bread of life."

Trenholm, had in his time been master of score of forges, and now Henry Pritchard, the grandson, controlled the family fortunes and the business, which had vastly extended during his father's lifetime.

In many respects, the new forgemaster was totally unlike his predecessors. He was the heir to a fortune estimated at a round million; they had fought their way up from comparative financial obscurity. He was traveled, refined, and educated; the humble tuition of the common schools, supplemented by the experience of active business lives, had been their college. There were many who shook their heads doubtfully when they spoke of the new forgemaster, who was coming home to take his position as the chief of the great business. Overseers, foremen, smelters, furnace-men, puddlers, all wondered what good could come of the business, in such unaccustomed hands.

"He'd better sell out afore he touches it else that million won't last long," predicted Tom Fallon, the chief of the furnace-men. And this seemed to be the general sentiment.

But the new forgemaster proved to be not only a scholar but a shrewd man of affairs as well. He noted everything and quickly familiarized himself with the general features of the business. The workers saw in him a sincere and earnest man, reserved and silent, and by no means the reckless sort of person they had expected. The interest he took in the welfare of his men soon made him popular. Just before his arrival, there had been a strike at the furnaces and the soreness it had engendered had not quite disappeared. When he learned the cause, the men's wages were advanced and the ground of former discontent removed.

"I must say, I rather like the new tenant of the Pritchard mansion," observed the Rev. Francis Benton, to his wife on a Sunday afternoon, as they sat at dinner. "Although I have not yet had the pleasure of a word with him, he impresses me as a man of extreme amiability and fine qualities."

"But far too grave for a man not yet turned thirty-five," responded his wife. "I noticed how sad he seemed in church to-day."

"Worrying a bit over the duties of his new position, I suppose," said Mr. Benton.

On the following Tuesday the good clergyman was surprised and pleased to receive a visit from the new forge-master. It was, of course, quite informal.

"Now that I am to settle here," said Mr. Pritchard, after the ice had been broken, "propose to do what good I can for the place and its people. Of course, I don't wish to be known in the matter. If you can find time to act for me, and if you know of any really deserving cases hereabouts, ample money will be placed at your disposal to meet them. Further, if any project can be devised that will help these people of ours along to nobler lives and higher aims, I trust you will consider it incumbent upon yourself to apprise me of it. "This is truly generous!" exclaimed the pastor. "God will abundantly reward so deserving a steward."

But he was silenced by the forgemaster's upraised hand.

"No thanks. That's all just now. I am glad to see that you are unlike some preachers who are full of theories only, and have no personal and actual acquaintance with the needs of their people. Had this been the case, you and I would have very little in common. I believe I have canvassed all your theology, and found them equally hollow and unsatisfying. Practical religion, now, is quite a different matter. But, alas! one might as well take up the quest of Diogenes as search for religion that satisfies all wants," he added with a sad smile. "Good night," he said abruptly, as he left.

For a long time the worthy pastor pondered on these words.

"Would it be right for me to become almoner of one who hopes to elevate others by means of this wealth, while he himself remains in the darkness of unbelief?" he asked.

For a time this question remained unsettled.

in his mind. Closer contact with Mr. Pritchard convinced him of the latter's sincere desire to be of service to his fellow-men. But the spiritual motive for which the clergyman sought was lacking. The benefits Mr. Pritchard showered upon the workers were conferred in kindly interest, but there was a marked apathy where their spiritual welfare was concerned. Mr. Benton saw the work growing under his hand; the fruit of the Pritchard million was visible in a new library, gymnasium and meeting hall; in recreation grounds, clubs and improved buildings, and the unknown donor's generosity began to be the talk of the iron district. The good clergyman was everywhere questioned until his heart grew sick at the deception. He went to Mr. Pritchard, fully resolved to decline a trust which he felt to be unsanctified.

The young forgemaster heard him and a deeper gloom settled upon his brow. "You are the first man," he exclaimed with great earnestness, "who has been candid enough to tell me what I know in my own soul to be the truth about myself. God grant we may yet be of service to each other and to the cause you represent. But I fear I must remain an unbeliever—a waif, tossed about on a sea of uncertainty and doubt. All my life I have been searching for that which satisfies the spiritual nature, which men call the soul, yet have not found it. I have dipped into many creeds and investigated the claims of many sects, but thus far have found them disappointing. Instead of bread, they have but given me stones. From their consolations my spirit has turned still hungry and athirst."

"Sometimes," he added almost fiercely, "I think that this inherited wealth has been a curse rather than a blessing! I have spent much of it foolishly, yet it has increased; I have scattered it among my poorer fellows, but it has not diminished. Even the benefactions of which you have been the dispenser bring me no enduring comfort. This is the end of all my philosophy—ashes and disappointment!"

"But not the end of all truth, my friend," said the good pastor. "To those who seek it in the right spirit, God will not deny the comfort you need. You have, till now, trusted in your own power, deeming your human intellect and your generous heart sufficient to achieve results that can only be reached by the process God has laid down. Your investigations have not led you to the Saviour who is himself that Bread of Life which you seek. All your good works for the benefit of these men here in Forgeville, or elsewhere, unless done in His name, will bring no blessing with them. The gold of Midas brought a curse, and yet the ancient king had a kindly heart."

After this first visit, the pastor's steps often found their way to the mansion of the millionaire. In simple, unsparing words he pointed out to Mr. Pritchard the folly of human dependence in strength of intellect, power of wealth, or man-made philosophies for securing true happiness and peace with God. The longing soul learned that heaven's peace was not to be coerced or bribed, but must come as a free gift.

"The bread I have eaten," said Mr. Pritchard, bitterly, "has been like that of the poor Breton peasants who, in famine times, grind the white rocks to powder and mingle it with the flour. My soul has fed upon stones, when there was not an hour in which I would not have gladly given all I possess for this Bread of Life."

It was not an easy victory which this proud, cultured man, with the divine help, finally won when he made full surrender of his heart to Christ. But there came a day when the hungry soul was satisfied and when true humility and simple trust took the place of self-righteousness and vain philosophy.

"My long quest is ended and my soul-hunger is appeased," was his greeting, as with a face lighted up with the radiance that comes from a spirit at peace with its Maker, he once more welcomed the pastor to his library.

His life since then has shown that the change is an enduring one and no mere illusion. Forgeville is more than ever prosperous, and Pastor Benton still dispenses the generous bounty of the forgemaster; but he does so willingly now, knowing that it is God's own work, prompted by love, instead of by human pride and vanity. In the hands of its owner, the Pritchard million is no longer a blight, but a blessing.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editor, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

HELPFUL ANECDOTES

SUFFICIENT FOR THE PURPOSE.

CON incident related in Dr. Culliss' Times of Refreshing may be helpful to some who have to deal with sceptics. A writer says that he went a distance of two miles in the country to speak to a small company of believers. Returning late in the evening by a path leading through the woods, a torch of "pitch pine" was handed to him, "I thought it of no use," he says, "for it was very light, weighing scarcely half a pound. 'It will light you home,' answered my host. 'The wind may blow it out,' I said. Again he answered 'It will light you home!' 'Not if it should rain,' I suggested. Still my host gave the same answer in his confident tone, 'It will light you home!' Contrary to my apprehensions the torch gave abundant light on my way right up to my own door." With still greater confidence may the Christian recommend the Bible. Its style, its dates, its writers, its science are all criticized, but it is what is wanted if it will "light the man home." There is abundant testimony that it will do that. All who have used it for the purpose have declared at the last as the Psalmist did that it has been a lamp unto their feet and a light on their path. Whatever objections captious critics may urge against the book, let no man be afraid to take it for a guide. "It will light him home."

PRAYER IN A CRISIS.

A REMARKABLE experience is described by a man engaged in business in Manchester, England, as an upholsterer. A prolonged period of business depression exhausted his available capital and left him with a large stock of goods on hand and no funds to meet a note for three hundred dollars, then rapidly nearing maturity. Being a praying man he took the matter to God in prayer, and besought help. There was no apparent answer. Only seven days remained before the note would be presented for payment. If it went to protest the man—Mr. Rohan by name—knew that his credit would be destroyed and he irretrievably ruined. He maintained his calm trust in God, believing that in some way he would be enabled to meet the note. But it was walking wholly by faith, not by sight, for during that last week business was so bad that he did not sell a single article from his stock.

The note was due on Monday, and on the previous day he went to church as usual. He was Superintendent of the Sunday School and had other duties about the church. He prayed that his mind might be kept free from worldly anxiety that he might do his duty without disquietude. His prayer was heard and that encouraged him to hope that his other prayer for financial relief would also be answered. On Monday morning he opened his store with a sinking heart. No relief was in sight and in an hour or two that bill would be presented. He assembled his family for prayer as usual, and again put up his prayer for help. He prayed earnestly, for the crisis was upon him.

On returning to his store he found a gentleman there who was a perfect stranger to him. "I want to look at some furniture quickly," he said, "I have but an hour to spare." Mr. Rohan wasted no time, his own time was short too. In less than an hour the goods were selected. "Now," said the customer, "be quick and make out your bill and I will pay you, and you can ship the things afterward." Mr. Rohan made out the bill and found that it came to exactly to three hundred dollars.

The customer counted out the money and as Mr. Rohan took it up he said, "Glory to God," and burst into tears. "What is the matter with you?" asked the customer, "Did you never sell so much at one time before?" "Oh, yes sir," said Mr. Rohan, "many a time, and much larger lots, but never just in this way." And then he told his story. "I am overcome," he said in conclusion, "because I seem to be brought into such a near contact with God. He sent you to save me from ruin." "I don't see that at all?" was the reply, "I wanted the furniture in a hurry and I was recommended to you as a man whose word could be trusted without my examining every article; so I came to you and that is all about it. But I understand something of what you say though I am not a religious man and don't believe in these fanatical notions. My mother was touched with Methodism and you talk like she used to do." "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee."

VACATION TIME.*

Simple Living.

THERE should be a marked difference in our living while the warm breath of summer lingers in the land. Everything that surrounds us then admonishes withdrawal from the practices of winter; bids us to be simple, and to seek in natural ways and humane avocations the renewal of the forces that sustain health and strength. The cares of business, the solitudes of the domestic and social routine, should be relaxed somewhat, and the mind become buoyant and sprightly. The cheery notes of the woodland birds should enter our heart and inspire our being with their happy enthusiasm. We think that society is rising to a better appreciation of the spirit of summer, and endeavoring, despite the many obstacles of hereditary custom and imitative caprice, to follow its intimations. The fact that the reign of the dog star is now recognized generally as "vacation time" shows the tendency.

A Common Error.

Dr. Pavy, one of our leading authorities, is in favor of a mixed diet as a rule having about one-fourth animal food, and he claims that more than this taxes the excretory organs unreasonably, and "there is reason to believe that acute affections and other morbid states are sometimes induced in this way." This is especially the case with people of leisurely habits. Sir Henry Thompson in his "Diet, in relation to Health and Activity," considers it "a vulgar error to regard meat in any form as necessary to health; like every description of food it is useful in its place, but it is by no means necessary for the large proportion of the population, and to many it has become desirable only by force of habit."

Liquors Unnecessary.

Wine, beer and strong liquors of every name are not commended to the palate of the reader as a substitute even for bad water. The latter can be purified but the former can scarcely be, without the elimination of stimulating properties that constitute their chief attraction to the user; all alcoholic beverages are not only unnecessary but dangerous. So much are they adulterated that even the alcoholic elements are not the worst of their constituents.

The consumption of beer requires comment because it appears to be on the increase, and immense quantities are drunk in the warm weather, and that despite the really prevalent opinion regarding the vicious methods common in its manufacture.

Acids and coloring matters are used by brewers, that are deleterious in their effect upon the assimilating organs, and the habitual use of beer is in time likely to produce serious disease, especially in the kidney and liver. A prominent English physician has said that there is no more fruitful source of gout, rheumatism, diseased heart, dropsy and the consequent early death of the robust working-man, than beer is, just in the turn and ready to become black vinegar in the stomach.

About Sunstroke.

The subject of sun-stroke should at once be carried to a cool, airy place, if in the daytime, to the shade of some tree or wall and there be laid upon a level surface, the clothing gently removed and the head raised a few inches by a folded garment. The entire body, particularly the head and chest, should be sponged off with cold water; cold, wet cloths may be wrapped around the head. Some think it is far better to dash the water, in large dipperfuls, on the bare surface to produce the reaction which is essential to recovery. This is proper only in severe cases; in ordinary cases that are met with among people who are living rather easy or unlaborious lives, we think sponging or sprinkling is sufficient. The object of the treatment is, of course, to reduce the temperature of the body to its normal condition, and as soon as such a decline of heat is noticed the cold application should be stopped and the patient removed to a dry spot, and the whole surface of the body mopped off with towels.

Where the facilities are at hand we think it an excellent method to wrap the man in a large sheet or light blanket, and place him in a water bath with a temperature between 80 and 85 degrees, and then lower the temperature gradually by means of ice until the patient is conscious, or his temperature is about normal. The time of immersion should not exceed an hour. If stimulation is necessary, aromatic spirits of ammonia may be used, ten or fifteen drops being given in a table-spoonful of water every few minutes. If there is a tendency to convulsive disturbance or delirium, a few drops of chloroform or ether sprinkled upon a handkerchief and held for a short time, not more than five seconds, within an inch or two of the patient's mouth will prove sufficient, this being repeated every minute or two until the excitement subsides.

Some physicians advise the administering of brandy or whiskey; we do not think that necessary, if ammonia be at hand. It is probable indeed that in most cases of heat-stroke alcoholic liquor is an injurious excitant. After the restoration of the person to consciousness he will feel very weak, and he should be permitted to rest and sleep as much as possible.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE.

A Night Climb in Norway.

I SHALL never forget that climb (writes Thomas Nelson Page). We were hardly out of the road before we began to ascend, and I shortly had to stop for breath. My guide, however, if silent was thoughtful, and he soon caught my gait and knew when to pause. Up through the dusk we went, he guiding me, now by a word telling me how to step, or now turning to give me his hand to help me up a steep place, over a large rock, or around a bad angle. For a time we had heard the roar of the torrent as it boiled below us, but as we ascended it had gradually hushed, and we at length were in a region of profound silence. We had been climbing about three hours when suddenly my guide stopped, and unwinding his rope from his waist, held it out to me.

I obeyed his silent gesture, and binding it around my body gave him the end. He wrapped it about him, and then taking me by the arm, as if I had been a child, he led me slowly along the narrow ledge around the face of the wall, step by step, telling me where to place my feet, and waiting till they were firmly planted. I began now to understand why no one ever went "over the mountain" in a day. We were on a ledge nearly three thousand feet high. If it had not been for the strong, firm hold on my arm, I could not have stood it. As it was I dared not think.

Suddenly we turned a sharp angle and found ourselves in a curious semicircular place almost level, and fifty or sixty feet deep in the concave, as if a great piece had been gouged out of the mountain by the glacier which must once have been there.

"This is a curious place," I ventured to say. "It is," said my guide. "It is the Devil's Seat. Men have died here."

His tone was almost fierce. I accepted his explanation silently. We passed the singular spot and once more were on the ledge, but it was not so narrow as it had been the other side of the Devil's Seat, and in fifteen minutes we had crossed the summit and the path widened a little and began to descend.

THE DAY DAWN.

SOMETIMES I sicken at the long delay, and very often wonder when all wrongs will cease and all men as well as all nations, be happy and free; but I always close with the doxology, because final triumph is sure. The sea lifts itself up waiting for the footsteps of him who trod it centuries ago, and the mountains are ready to swing their forest branches at the shout of the great jubilee. I put my ear to the ground and I hear the coming tramp of the Redeemer's victory. I lift up my eyes to the hills and I see them kindling with the glories of descending morn. I turn to the east and I hear the crash of falling mosque and pagoda. I turn to the west and I see the watchfires on the tablelands of Oregon and hear the breath of the Spirit sweep across the prairies. The desert will soon blush into carnation rose and silver-tipped lilies. Yea, all the earth is to become a temple of praise: grass and flowers the tessellated floors; mountains and pillars, tapestried with morning mist; the ocean the baptismal font; illimitable forest the wind-swept organ-pipes, and the vast heavens the dome into which shall roll as the Atlantic surges beat the beach the doxology of ransomed hemispheres, Jesus for ever! May you and I join in that grand consummation.

THE DUMPS.

ALMOST every nature, however sprightly, sometimes will drop into a minor key, or a subdued mood that in common parlance is recognized as "the blues." There may be no adverse causes at work, but, somehow, the bells of the soul stop ringing, and you feel like sitting quiet, and you strike off fifty per cent. from all your worldly and spiritual prospects. The immediate cause may be a northeast wind, or a balky liver, or an enlarged spleen, or pickled oysters at twelve o'clock the night before.

In such depressed state no one can afford to sit for an hour. First of all let him get up and go out of doors. Fresh air and the faces of cheerful men and "pleasant women, and frolicsome children, will, in fifteen minutes, kill moping. The first moment your friend strikes the key-board of your soul it will ring music. A hen might as well try on populous Broadway to hatch out a feathery group, as for a man to successfully brood over his ills in lively society. Do not go for relief among those who feel as badly as you do. Let not toothache, and rheumatism, and hypochondria go to see toothache, rheumatism, and hypochondria. (Anon.)

block in Brooklyn lives a doctor, an undertaker, and a clergyman. That is not the row for a nervous man to walk on, lest he soon need all three. Throw back all the shutters of your soul and let the sunlight of genial faces shine in.

Besides that, why sit ye here with the blues, ye favored sons and daughters of men? Shone upon by such stars and breathed on by such air and sung to by so many pleasant sounds, you ought not to be seen moping. Especially if light from the better world strikes its aurora through your night-sky, ought you be cheerful. You can afford to have a rough luncheon by the way if it is soon to end amid the banqueters in white. Sailing toward such a blessed port, do not have your flag at half-mast. Leave to those who take too much wine "the gloomy raven tapping at the chamber door, from the night's Plutonian shore," and give us the robin red-breast and the chaffinch. Let some one with a strong voice give out the Long-metre Doxology, and the whole world "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

SHALL WE RESPOND?

THERE has been much talk about liturgies in the churches, and whether or not audiences should take audible part in religious service. While others are discussing that point, let us say that all the service of the Church ought to be responsive, if not with audible "Amen," and unanimous "Good Lord, deliver us," then with hearty outburst of soul. Let not the prayer of him that conducts public service go up solitary and alone, but accompanied by the heart-felt ejaculation of all the auditory. We sit down on a soft cushion, in a pew by architectural skill arranged to fit the shape of our back, and are tempted to fall into unprofitable reveries. Let the effort be, on the part of every minister, to make the prayer and the Scripture-reading and the giving out of the hymn so emphatic, that the audience cannot help but respond with all the soul. Let the minister, before going into the pulpit, look over the whole field and recall what are the styles of bereavement in the congregation, whether it be widowhood, orphanage or childlessness; what are the kinds of temporal loss his people may have suffered, whether in health, in reputation, or estate, and then get both his shoulders under these troubles, and in his prayer give one earnest and tremendous lift, and there will be no dullness, no indifference, no lack of multitudinous response. The reason that congregations have their heads bobbing about in prayer-time is because the officiating clergyman is apt to petition in the abstract. He who calls the troubles of his people by their right names, and tenderly lays hold of the cancers of the souls before him, will not lack in getting immediate heart-felt, if not audible, response.

While we have not as much interest in the agitated question of liturgies as would make us write three lines about it, we are interested more than we can tell in the question: How shall the officiating ministers, in all the churches, give so much point and adaptedness and vigor and blood-red earnestness of soul to their public devotions, as shall make all the people in the church feel that it is the struggle for their immortal life in which the pastor is engaged. Whether it be in tones that strike the ear, or with spiritual emphasis heard only in the silent corridor of the heart, let all the people say Amen!

YOUR OWN DOCTOR.

THERE are books proposing that we all become our own medical attendant. Whenever we are seized with any sort of physical disorder we are to take down some volume in homeopathy, allopathy, hydropathy, and running our finger along the index, elicit upon the malady that may be afflicting us. We shall find on the same page the name of the disease and the remedy. Thus: chapped hands, glycerine; cold, squills; lumbago, mustard-plasters; nervous excitement, valerian; sleeplessness, Dover's powders.

This may be very well for slight ailments, but we have attended more funerals of people who were their own doctor, than obsequies of any other sort. In your inexperience you will be apt to get the wrong remedy. Look out for the agriculturist who farms by book, neglecting the counsel of his long-experienced neighbors. He will have poor turnips and starveling wheat, and kill his fields with undue apportionments of guano and bone-dust. Look out just as much for the patient who in the worship of some "pathy," blindly adheres to a favorite hygienic volume, rejecting in important cases, medical admonition.

In ordinary cases the best doctor you can have is a mother or a grandmother who has piloted through the rocks of infantile disease a whole family. She has a salve for almost everything, and knows how to bind a wound or cool an inflammation. But if the mother be dead or you are afflicted with a maternal ancestor that never knew anything practical and never will, better in severe cases have the doctor right away. You say that it is expensive to do that, while a book on the treatment of diseases will cost you only a dollar and a half. We reply that in the end it is very expensive for an inexperienced man to be his own doctor; for in addition to the price of the book there are the undertaker's expenses.

THE CRIPPLED.

A CELEBRATED surgeon told me of a scene in the clinical department of one of the New York hospitals, when a poor man with a wounded leg was brought in before the students to be operated on. The surgeon was pointing out this and that to the students, and handling the wounded leg, and was about to proceed to amputation, when the poor man leaped from the table, and hobbled to the door, and said: "Gentlemen, I am sorry to disappoint you, but, by the help of God, I will die with my leg on." What a terrific loss is the loss of our physical faculties!

The way the battle of Crecy was decided against the French was by the Welshmen killing the French horses, and that brought their riders to the ground. And when you cripple this body, which is merely the animal on which the soul rides, you may sometimes defeat the soul.

Yet how many suffer from this physical taking off! Good cheer, my brother! God will make it up to you somehow. The grace, the sympathy of God will be more to you than anything you have lost. If God allows part of your resources to be cut off in one place, he will add to it somewhere else. As Augustus, the emperor, took off a day from February, making it the shortest month in the year, and added it to August, the month named after himself; so advantages taken from one part of your nature will be added on to another.

PICKLED CHRISTIANS.

THERE is a class of persons in the community whose usefulness we have just found out. We never realized until now what they were made for. They are struck through with acidity. Their disposition is celebrated for its crabbedness. You find them in every circle. They are especially known in churches as fault-finders. Their teeth are always on edges. They are critical of minister, elder-ship, or choir. Whatever is done, they act as though they could have done it better. You sometimes feel like suggesting to them the propriety of going to some other church, or retiring into less conspicuous position. You look upon them as a nuisance, and hindrance. Stop! You are wrong. They have their practical uses. Church life, if happily conducted, is a banquet at which the sweet predominates. There is the sugar of helpful words, and the saccharine of genial association. The banquet is in danger of becoming flat and insipid. There ought to be at least one vinegar cruet in the castor. You need not give variety to the feast. You do not more need spices than pickles. Now you know the use to which some people can be put. Do not cast them out. Do not let them be the means of exasperation. Employ them at the Church banquet. Tarts are good in their place. Brethren, pass around the pickles.

BRIEF NOTES.

The election of Dr. Phillips Brooks to the Bishopric of Massachusetts, has been confirmed. His consecration is appointed to take place on October 14, in Trinity Church, Boston, of which he is rector. Bishop Williams of Connecticut, will be the Consecrator, and Bishop Potter of New-York, the preacher.

The University Extension work has been organized in Chicago. Applications for branches have been received from Cleveland, Indianapolis, Fort Wayne and Altoona. The Superintendents of Instruction of nearly all the States of the Union have written to express their sympathy with this movement and offer their co-operation to the American Society.

An offer to educate a lady missionary by the Kindergarten System (Frobel Method), has been sent to this journal. The lessons will be free, but the pupil will be expected to pay for her own material. Any lady desiring to avail herself of this offer should write to Mrs. Wm. DeWolf, 291 Main Street, Hackensack, N. J.

The work at the Central Union Mission in Washington, D. C., is making excellent progress. The Gospel wagon, of which a picture has been published in this journal, has again been much blessed in its journeys. Many men and women who resisted all efforts to induce them to attend Church have listened to the Gospel from this wagon and have been won for Christ.

During the early part of last week more favorable reports were received of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's condition. Later in the week, however, it was stated that he was again showing an aversion to food and his friends were becoming very anxious about him. Mrs. Spurgeon and the other members of his family desire to express their thanks for the sympathy which has been manifested in the sufferer's affliction and they entreat all believers to continue pleading for his restoration to health, if it be the Lord's will.

A contribution of ten dollars toward the support of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD S. S. Missionary in the Southwest has been received from The Young People's Association of the Emanuel Reformed Church of West Philadelphia. Among other kind expressions contained in the letter enclosing the contribution is the following: We, one and all, heartily endorse Brother Paxson's labors and our prayers are that God may bless him more abundantly in the future than in the past. May the never-changing God bless the people of the Southwest.

A shocking fatality which causes a severe loss to the cause of foreign missions occurred at Elmira, N. Y., last week. The Rev. J. Wellington White and his wife, the well-known missionaries so long engaged in successful work at the Macas Mission in China, and who have been home on a brief vacation, were killed by a passenger train on the Erie Railroad. They were driving in a carriage over a level crossing when a train travelling thirty miles an hour struck the vehicle, killing Mr. and Mrs. White and two of their children. They were to sail for China on September 16.

Extensive arrangements are being made to render the Camp-meeting, which opens at Round Lake, N. Y., on August 22nd, a great success. It will be under the charge of Rev. Thomas Harrison and invitations have been sent to many distinguished ministers to participate in the services. Among them are Dr. Strobbridge and Rev. Stephen Merritt of New York; Dr. J. H. Coleman of Troy, N. Y.; Rev. W. W. Foster, Jr., of North Adams, Mass.; and Rev. J. W. Eaton of Albany. Beside these, who belong to the Methodist Episcopal Church, invitations have been sent to two Baptist ministers—Rev. W. H. Main of Buffalo, and Dr. L. M. S. Haynes of Troy, N. Y. Dr. W. W. Bathershall of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Albany, and Dr. O. H. Walshe, Reformed

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Bismarck and De Blowitz—A Cabinet Resignation—The Chinese Troubles—Our Growing Commerce—Chautauqua's new Principal—Earthquake and Cloudburst.

CROWNED heads and Cabinets abroad are busy talking of the extraordinary statements published by M. De Blowitz, the famous correspondent of the London Times, in which he gave an entirely new and startling version of Bismarck's fall from power. De Blowitz asserted that the old Emperor William himself had determined upon the removal of Bismarck from the Chancellorship, and had even selected Von Caprivi as his successor; therefore the fall of the great Chancellor was not at all due to the present Emperor. Further, De Blowitz added, on receiving notice of his dismissal, Prince Bismarck was excited and angry and the Princess even more so than her husband. Later, when the young Kaiser sent his portrait to Bismarck, the Princess was exasperated at what she considered an insult, and gave orders that the portrait be sent to the stables at Friedrichsruhe. This was told to the Emperor afterward. All these and other matters were related to De Blowitz by Count von Munster, the German Ambassador at Paris and although their publication has given rise to a tremendous sensation, the Ambassador has not yet seen fit to deny their truth.

Secretary Noble to Resign.

THE intended resignation of Gen. John Willcox Noble, Secretary of the Interior, is somewhat of a surprise to the politicians. It is understood that this step is taken with the full approval of the President, and that the most cordial relations exist between the two. Gen. Noble, if he leaves the Cabinet, will probably be appointed to a foreign mission, or to one of the new judgeships, ranking next to the Supreme Bench. He has desired to retire for some time past. He first came into prominence as Colonel of an Iowa regiment during the war. He rose to the rank of Brigadier-General. After the close of hostilities, he practiced law at Keokuk, Ia., and distinguished himself by his warfare on the illicit whisky trade. He is an old classmate of President Harrison, the two having passed several years together in Miami University. Gen. Noble is also a graduate of Yale. He was born in Ohio in 1831.

The New Chautauqua Principal.

IN the selection of Dr. Rainey Harper, the celebrated scholar and President of the Chicago University, as Principal of the Chautauqua System, one of the ablest men in the United States has unquestionably been chosen. Dr. Harper was born in New Concord, O., in 1850, being of Scotch-Irish ancestry. He was educated at Muskingum College (taking a B.A. degree at fourteen) and Yale University. His first post was as principal of a College in Tennessee, and the next at Dennison University, Granville, O. In 1879 he accepted the Professorship of Hebrew in the Baptist Theological Seminary at Morgan Park, Ill. He organized the Summer School System ten years ago, and has ever since been closely identified with its progress. A portrait of Principal Harper is given above.

PROF. R. HARPER.

A French Railroad Horror.

Sunday pleasure has again received a frightful rebuke in the disaster that befell two excursion trains near Paris, lately. Both trains tenoy, when, near St. Mande, they came into collision. The second crashed into the first, wrecking a number of coaches of both trains. To crown the horror the cars caught fire, and the groans of the dying mingled with the hissing of steam and the outcries of the onlookers. Fifty were killed, most of them being crushed out of recognition. The driver and fireman on the second train were burned alive. The funeral of the victims took place at St. Mande on the 30th, at the expense of the Commune.

Chili's New President.

ANOTHER turn was given to the Chilean kaleidoscope ten days ago, by the election of Claudio Vicuna as President to succeed Balmaceda. Vicuna, (whose portrait is given in this column) is said to be choice of the Dictator, whose presidential term ends on Sept. 18, next, when his successor will assume office. Whether this change indicates a continuance of the Balmacedist influence in control or not, remains to be seen. The Congressional or anti-Balmacedist party has issued a statement declaring Vicuna's election void, because, while President of the Cabinet, he organized a revolutionary movement in January last, in violation of the Constitution, and also because his election was not carried out according to legal forms and only a portion of the voters were permitted the right of suffrage. Reports continue to circulate of insurgent gains by land and sea. Balmaceda expects that when his new warships arrive, he will be in a position to end the rebellion and restore peace to the country which is now prostrate and almost bankrupt through the long war.

Our Growing Commerce.

A most interesting and important statement has just been issued by the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, reviewing our foreign commerce and immigration during the year ending June 30, 1891. From this showing, it appears that the total value of the commerce during that time was the greatest in the history of the government, being $1,729,330,896, exceeding that of 1890 by $82,000,000. An increase is shown in almost all our imports of merchandise, while there has been a decline in imports of wool, silk, hemp, and their manufactures and also in breadstuffs and cereals. Still, the exports have exceeded the imports by $39,519,914. Cotton is still king of exports, showing $200,708,898, as against $127,668,000 for breadstuffs, and $138,176,638 for provisions. Since the new tariff went into operation, the total imports for that period show an excess over the corresponding period last year of $31,436,000. In the same period, the imports admitted free were nearly $87,000,000 in excess of those of 1890, while the value of dutiable imports shows a decrease of $55,500,000. 555,496 immigrants arrived during the fiscal year, an increase of 140,272. In that time Russia sent us 28,245 immigrants, principally Hebrews.

Signs of Revolution in China.

REBELLIONS are few and far between in the Celestial Empire. When they do occur, they are either quickly successful or they are put down with a hand of iron that spares neither old nor young in the general slaughter. Such was the case with the famous Taeping rebellion, which was only suppressed after the sacrifice of thousands of lives. Experienced observers declare that all the signs point to another rebellion. The recent attacks on the missionaries and native converts, far from being merely local fanatical outbreaks, as was at first supposed, are now shown to be the work of a number of secret societies, banded together to oppose foreign influence ostensibly, but in reality to commit such outrages on foreigners as must draw down the vengeance of other powers on the Chinese government and thus afford the plotters an opportunity of raising the standard of revolt under the guise of patriotism. Meanwhile, our missionaries are compelled to face untold dangers. Riots have occurred at Yang Chow, Nanking, Wusuch, Kin-Kiang and other cities. School-houses have been fired, chapels and missionary dwelling-houses looted, and European missionaries ruthlessly killed. Thus far no American missionary has been a victim, although the Baptists and Congregationalists have been repeatedly in grave peril. A Catholic mission at Yankao was destroyed and four Christian chapels at Kiangai, as well as the French Orphanage at Haimen. The government is now fully determined to deal firmly with the rioters and to protect the foreigners.

Earthquake and Cloudburst.

SUNDAY, July 26th will long be remembered in Evansville, Ind. After a hot day, came a sultrier evening. At 8:30, a distant shock of earthquake was felt; then a noise like thunder, then another shock more violent than the first, and lasting several seconds. The city rocked and swayed with a lateral motion from north to south, windows rattled and buildings leaned to one side in a threatening way. It was an hour when the churches were full and the congregations were panic-stricken. They rushed out pell-mell to the streets, trampling women and children in their haste. At a Baptist Church, several persons were badly hurt, but fortunately none fatally. On the same day, a general storm visited Nevada, Iowa, Delaware, Minnesota, and part of Pennsylvania. The town of Austin, Nev., was nearly drowned out by a cloudburst which flooded the streets, tearing up rails, water-mains and buildings. Council Bluffs, Ia., was similarly flooded and many people were driven from their homes. In some parts of the country, severe hail-storms occurred on the same day, making the 29th altogether a remarkable day for the violence and variety of its weather. At Williamsport, Pa., thirty-five houses were destroyed by the storm, the roof of one building collapsing before its inmates had time to escape. Several persons were badly hurt.

Mimic Naval Warfare.

OUR "Naval Reserve," the new organization which bears the same relation to the Navy proper that our National Guard does to the regular army, has been playing at mimic war on board the magnificent vessels of the White Squadron during the past week. The warships Chicago, Boston, Newark, Yorktown, Stonington, Atlanta and Concord, have been for several days engaged in naval manoeuvres off Fishers' Island on the Atlantic Coast. The members of the Reserve for the first time since the formation of their organization, had experience on real warships on the 29th ult., when the gun-deck of the Stonington was turned over to the amateurs and the great cannon loaded with shell for practice. The other vessels of the Squadron also put out targets and soon there was a scene that bore all the appearance of a genuine combat at sea, shells screaming across miles of ocean, and the air heavy with smoke and the smell of powder. On the following day a mimic attack was made on Fishers' Island by the Reserve. Many distinguished military and naval officers witnessed the first outing of the Reserve as real men-o-war's-men. Rear-Admiral Walker, commander of the Reserve (whose portrait we give), is an officer of wide experience in naval matters and has been highly complimented for the marked efficiency of the organization.

ADMIRAL WALKER.

At a Conference of Quakers held at Westbury, N. Y., last week, war and peace occupied a good deal of the time in discussion. Opinions agreed that soldiers and police were necessary evils and that the big new guns now being introduced would soon kill all the fighters, and the civilized world would then be ruled by peace-loving men.

O'Brien and Dillon Released.

WILLIAM O'Brien and John Dillon, the Irish patriots who have been undergoing imprisonment in Galway Jail for inciting tenants to refuse to pay rent, were released on the 30th ult. On arriving in Dublin, they received a tremendous ovation. The occasion was seized ed as an opportunity for another Anti-Parnell demonstration and the factions came very near a collision. Dillon and O'Brien both declare that the Irish party will soon be reunited, but not with Parnell as leader.

GIBES AT FAITH.

"He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him: let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him." Psalm 22: 8.

DAVID experienced what Paul described as "cruel mockings." Note the adjective cruel: it is well chosen. Mockings may not cut the flesh, but they tear the heart; they may shed no blood, but they cause the mind to bleed internally. Fetters gall the wrists, but the iron of scorn entereth into the soul. Ridicule is a poisoned bullet which goes deeper than the flesh, and strikes the centre of the heart. David in the wilderness hunted by Saul, and on the throne abused by Shimei, knew what it was to be the butt of scorn, the football of contempt. Many a time and oft was he the song of the drunkard, and the byword of the scoffer.

But what have I to do with the son of Jesse? My heart remembers the Son of man. What if David suffered despising and scorn? He knew it in small measure compared with our blessed Lord. Well is it said, "The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord." My brethren and sisters in Christ, if you have to pass through a like painful experience, count it no strange thing, for a strange thing it is not. Reproach is the common heritage of the godly.

I. The first thing to which I shall call your attention at this time is, that a truly gracious man is like David and like the Lord Jesus, in that

His Trust in God is known.

Even the enemies of this holy man who is mentioned in the text, and, as I interpret it, even the enemies of our divine Lord and Master, never denied that he trusted in God. This, indeed, is the commencement of their scoff: "He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him." From which I gather that every gracious man should have an apparent, manifest, public trust in God. He should not merely trust him in his heart alone, but that trust should so enter into his entire nature that he does not conceal it nor think of concealing it.

What, then, ought a child of God to do in order to show that he really does trust in the Lord? How did Jesus do this? Well, I think that in our Lord's case it was his wonderful calmness which compelled everybody to see that "he trusted on the Lord." You never find him in a flurry; he is never worried nor confused. He is beset behind and before with men who try to catch him, but he is as self-possessed as if he spoke among friends. He does not appear to be the least on his guard, and yet instead of their catching him, before long he either catches them, or else they retire saying, "Never man spake like this Man." He was always cool, peaceful, ready, self-composed. What that is of Christ on board ship in a storm! While they that are with him are afraid that they will go down, that the wind will blow them into the water, or blow the water over them, so that they will certainly be drowned, what is he doing? Why, he is asleep: not because he forgot them—no; but because he knew that the vessel was in the great Father's hands. His sleep ought to have made them feel at ease. Whenever the captain can afford to go to sleep, the passengers may go to ages everything would not have gone to bed if he had not felt that it was all right in the hands of the Highest, who at any moment could stay the raging storm. I wish we could be similarly restful; for then even our enemies would say of us, "He trusted on the Lord."

Brethren, this ought also to come out not merely in our calm and quiet manner, but also by our distinct avowal. I do not think that any man has a right to be a secret believer in the Lord Jesus Christ at this time. You will tell me that Nicodemus was so; that Joseph of Arimathea was so, and I answer "Yes"; but therein they are

Not our Exemplars.

These weak brethren were forgiven and strengthened; but we may not therefore presume. Times, however, are different now: by the death of Christ the thoughts of many hearts were revealed, and from that day those secret disciples were among the foremost to avow their faith. Nicodemus brought the spices, and Joseph of Arimathea went in boldly and begged the body of Jesus. Since that day when the Christ was openly revealed upon the cross, the thoughts of other men's hearts are revealed too; and it is not now permissible for us to play hide-and-seek with Christ. Our Lord does not reckon upon leading a body of followers who will always keep behind the hedge, hiding themselves in holes and corners whenever there is anything to be done for his glory, and only running out at meal-times when there is something to be got for themselves. I know some professors of that sort, but I have very little to say to their credit: they are a cowardly crew. So, then, I say first a calm belief, and, secondly, an open avowal should cause even our adversaries to know that we have trusted in the Lord.

And, then, I will add to that, that our general conduct

Should Reveal our Faith.

The whole of our life should show that we are men who rejoice in the Lord; for trusting the Lord, as I understand it, is not a thing for Sundays and for places of worship alone: we are to trust in the Lord about everything. Faith is a thing for the closet, and the parlor, and the counting-house, and the farmhouse; it is a light for dark days, and a shade for bright days; you may carry it with you everywhere, and everywhere it shall be your help. Oh, that we did so trust in the Lord that people noticed it as much as they notice our temper, or our dress.

Once more, I think this ought to come out most distinctly in our behaviour during times of trouble; for then it is that our adversaries are most likely to notice it. You, dear sister, have lost a child. Well now, remember that you are a Christian woman, and sorrow not as those that are without hope. Do let the difference be real and true, and do not be ashamed that others should observe it. When your neighbor lost her child it occasioned a quarrel between her and God, but it is not so with you, is it? Will you quarrel with God about your baby? Oh, no; you love him too well. And you, brother, you are perplexed in business, and you know what a worldling does: if he has nothing more than outward religion, he complains bitterly that God deals hardly with him, and he quarrels with God; or, perhaps, to make things better, he does what he ought not great deal worse. Many a man has plunged into rash speculations until he has destroyed himself commercially; but you, as a Christian man, must take matters calmly and quietly: it is not yours to speculate, but to confide. You are now to play the man, and in the power of the Holy Ghost you are now with resignation—with more than that—with a sweet acquiescence in the Divine will—to show men

How a Christian can Behave.

Oh, that you and I might in all these ways so live that all who see us should know that we are believers in the Lord Jesus Christ! It would be ridiculous if a man went into society with a label on his breast, "This man trusts in God," and it would be a pretty clear sign that he needed to be thus ticketed. I would have you shun all distinctive phylacteries in matters of religion as too much flavored with the leaven of the Pharisees; but when the possession of godliness proclaims its own self, even as a box of precious spikenard tells its own tale, you need not be ashamed of it. Display and ostentation are vicious, but the unrestrained use of influence and example is commendable. In these days when men glory in their unbelief, let us not be bashful with our faith.

II. Secondly, this trust is

Not Understood by the World.

"He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him." Observe that they restricted the Saviour's trust to that point—"He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him." But now, in the first place, our faith is not confined to merely receiving from God. No, brethren; if the Lord does not deliver us we will trust him. See how firmly Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego stood to it that they would not bow before the image which Nebuchadnezzar had set up: "Our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up." There was great faith in that "if not." We must not live and wait upon God with a kind of cupboard love, just as a stray dog might follow a man for bones; but we must speak well of our God even if he scourge us, for therein lies both the truth and the strength of faith.

And, dear friends, our faith is not tied to time. That is the mistake of the statement in the text. They said, "He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him"—as much as to say, "If God does not deliver him now his trust will have been a folly, and God will not have answered to his confidence." But it is not so. Brethren,

If we are in the Fire

to-night, and we are trusting in God, our faith does not mean that we expect to come forth from the furnace at this very hour. Nay, we may not come out to-night, nor to-morrow, nor next month, it may be not for years. We do not tie God down to conditions, and expect him to do this and that, and then if he does not in his wisdom see fit to do it, threaten that we will trust him no more. Receive what he is going to give you, and take gratefully the painful preliminaries. High palaces must have deep foundations, and it takes a long time to excavate a human soul so deep that God can build a gorgeous palace of grace therein. If it be a mere cottage that the Lord is to build in you, you may escape with small troubles; but if he is going to make you a palace to glorify himself withal, then you may expect to have long trials. Your eminence in grace can only come by affliction. Will you not have trust in God, if severe trials are ordained for you? Yes, of course you will.

So, also, our faith must not judge at all by present circumstances. The ungodly world judges that God has not deand are at present distressed by it. Oh, how wrongly the world judged of Christ when it judged of him by his condition! Covered with a bloody sweat and groaning out his soul to God beneath the olives at midnight—why, they that passed by who did not know him must have judged him to be a man accursed of God. Yes, but you see they only saw a little of our blessed Master's career; they only looked upon a span of his existence; what a grievous error it was to have estimated his life by his brief passion; knowing nothing of its grand intent! Outward circumstances must never be made the tests of the value of pious trust in our God. If with this faith of ours we are praying and pleading and God does not answer us, does not help us, but leaves us in the dark, yet still let not our trust waver. If any man walk in darkness and see no light, let him trust and trust on until the light shall come.

III. Thirdly, this true

Faith will be Mocked at some time or other. It is an honorable thing to be a believer in God, but there are some who think the very reverse, and these begin to scoff at the believer. Sometimes they scoff at faith itself: they count faith itself to be a folly of weak minds. Or else they mock at one particular Christian's faith. "Oh," they say, "he professes to trust in God. This man talks after this mad fashion! Why, he is a working man like other people—works in a shop along with me. What has he to do with trusting God any more than I have? He is conceited and fanatical." Or in other circles they cry, "This is a man of business; he keeps a shop, and I dare say he knows as much of the tricks of the trade as we do, and yet he talks about trusting in God. No doubt he pretends to this faith to win religious customers." Faith in God is a thing to be revered rather than reviled. True religion is sanctified common-sense. It is the most common-sense thing in the world to put your trust in one that cannot lie. If I trust myself, or trust my fellow-man, I am thought to be in the first case self-reliant, and in the second case I am judged to have a charitable disposition; yet in either case I shall, sooner or later, prove my folly; but if I trust God, who can bring a reason against my confidence? God give us more faith in himself. No doubt we may expect to have all the more of the laughter of the ungodly, who will make a spectacle of us for our faith; but what of that? We can bear mockery and much more for his sake who died for us.

Philosophic Gibes.

And then men scoff at the very idea of divine interposition. They judge the Lord's deliverance to be the main point of our faith. "He trusted God that he would deliver him." "Look," they say, "he fancies that God will deliver him, as if the Creator had not something else to do besides looking after him, poor miserable creature that he is! He is nothing to God—a mere speck—the insect of an hour, and yet he trusts in God to interfere on his behalf." The philosophers laugh whenever you speak of divine interposition, and count that we must be in the last stage of lunacy to expect anything of the kind. They believe in laws, they say—irreversible, immutable laws, that grind on, like the great cogs of a machine which, when once they are set in motion, tear everything to pieces that comes in their way. They do not believe that God fulfills promises, or answers prayers, or delivers his people. Their God is a dead force, without mind, or thought, or love, or care. The object of the ungodly man's scorn is the idea that God should ever interfere to help his people in human affairs; but do you stand to it, O true believers; for he does still show himself strong on the behalf of them that trust in him.

Ungodly men are exceedingly apt to find life and walk of faith. Their cry of "Let him deliver him" implies that was in a serious difficulty from which he could not extricate himself. This is no novelty to the believer, but it makes rare fun for the ungodly. What is the good of faith if the believer suffers like others, and endures the same pains, and losses, and diseases as others? So the men of the world argue. They would be believers too if it would bring them in a fortune, or a handsome salary, or at least a loaded table and a full cup. But when they see a saint in the pit with Joseph, or in the dungeon with Jeremiah, or among the dogs with Lazarus, they sneer and cry, Is this the reward of piety? Is this the recompense of godliness? It seems hard for us to be mocked by the base ones of the earth, to become the song and the byword of the ungodly; yet this has happened to the excellent of the earth and will happen yet again. Set your account that this is a part of the covenanted heritage, and accept it with joy for Christ's sake.

Their Victim

IV. Now, I must close with this point: the time shall come when

Faith shall be Justified.

I think it is no small thing to have the ungodly bearing witness that "He trusted in God that he would deliver him." I have known what it is to be exceedingly grateful to ungodly men for helping me to believe that I am truly a child of God. Somebody, years ago, uttered an atrocious lie against me—an abominable slander. I was very low and heavy of spirit at the time; but when I read it I clapped my hands for joy, for I felt, "Now I have one of the marks and seals of a child of God, for it is written, 'Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake.'" The love of the Lord's brethren and the hatred of the Lord's enemies are two things to be desired.

Another justification awaits us, and in due season it will come. Brethren, the day will come when God will deliver his people. You will be brought out of your trouble—it may not be immediately, but it will be seasonably. You may most wisely in the meantime learn to glory in your tribulation; your bitters shall turn into sweets, and your losses into gains; your sorrows shall be your joys, your struggles your triumphs—perhaps in this life this transformation may occur, even as the Lord gave to Job twice as much as he had before; but certainly in the life to come you will find the tables turned. Then, what will the ungodly say? They say now, "He trusted on God that he would deliver him;" but then they will have to say as they gnash their teeth,

"God Has Delivered Him."

Brethren, at the last great day ungodly men will be witnesses on behalf of the saints. If any doubt whether the saints trusted in God, the wicked will be compelled to come forward and say, "They did trust, for we laughed at them for it." Of this and that man they shall say, "He trusted on God that he would deliver him." In that day the unbelieving will be swift witnesses against themselves; for as they ridiculed the children of God here, they will have it read out before them as evidence of their enmity against the Lord: and how will they answer it? If I had no other amusement whatever, I would not for merriment sake mock the people of God.

But whether ye revile or flatter, it is all one to us. We are at a pass with you: we do trust in God that he will deliver us, and we cannot be removed from this confidence. O ye mockers, we will not be fooled out of our hope, nor jested out of our peace. We cannot find any one like our God to trust to, and so we will not depart from him in life or death, but will rest in him, come what may, even till we see

THE TWO WITNESSES.

The Symbolical Meaning of their Persecution, Death, Exposure and Rapture.

BY MATTHEW HABERSHON.

OW dark is the state of the church as it appears under the influence of the ruling powers of the empire, that is as it is exhibited under the seven seals! In vain do we attempt to discover, after, at least the first seal in the early ages anything like the appearance of real vital godliness in its external aspect. We see nothing but a state of gradual decay, corruption, and extreme wickedness, ending in the most awful apostasy. We hear indeed the voice of martyrs crying for vengeance, giving fearful intimation of what was the aspect of the times; and we behold altogether the most convincing proof that "the outer court was indeed given to the Gentiles," even to the moment that the mighty angel proclaimed that "time was no more;" that is, until forty and two months were ended.

As little, or less, can we discover of the true Church, in the horrors of the tremendous judgments of the first six of the trumpets. To the question, then. Where are we to look for it? In reply, in the account given in this place (Rev. 11: 1-14), under the symbol of two witnesses; and here we find the situation accurately portrayed, as being that of mournful sorrowing and depressed, "clothed in sackcloth"—and as trodden under foot by the "Gentiles," or the paganized Christians—or, as it is expressed by Daniel, "worn out." For speaking of the little horn of the papacy, he says, "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High"—the Lord's witnessing Church—"and think to change times and laws: and they shall," he adds, and the language bears directly upon the prophecy before us, "be given into his hand, until a time and times, and the dividing of time"—they shall be given into his hands to wear out and tread under foot forty and two months—or, they shall prophecy or bear their testimony a thousand two hundred and three score days clothed in sackcloth. The narrative, the persons, the incidents, and the duration of time, in all the cases are the same.

Perhaps the arrangement that will set the closing scenes which are here described in the clearest and most convincing light, both as regards the persecution described in the last chapter, and the glorious deliverance now about to be considered, is to connect them with the same closing scenes described in the seventh chapter of Revelation.

Thus connected they will stand as follows: "And after overturnings and wars of the sixth seal, or of the French Revolution, had ceased, I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding four winds that the hurricane of war which will be let loose upon a guilty world, on the sounding of the trumpet of the seventh angel of the coming or the third woe, should not deluge the world with misery and slaughter, until the servants of God, the saints of the Most High, the Lord's witnesses, should be secured from its fury. And every individual member of the true Church, in every part of the world was, during a most severe persecution of three years and a-half purified, and made white, and tried, witnessing in the face of hunger and thirst, and oppression, and sorrow, a good confession for Christ.

"And after three days and a half, the Spirit of life from God entered into them; and they stood upon their feet; and great fear fell upon them which saw them. And they heard a great voice from heaven, saying unto them, Come up hither. And they ascended up to heaven in a cloud; and their enemies beheld them." (vers. 11, 12.)

It was after this translation to heaven, that the Apostle beheld the great multitude which no one could number, from all nations, and tribes, and peoples, and tongues, stand before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands. He beheld this great multitude, this cloud of witnesses, who had come of the great tribulation; and he heard their song, ascribing the salvation to God and to the Lamb! On this event transpiring, on this great deliverance being effected and not before, the second woe will be past! the Ottoman empire falls! and, behold, the third woe cometh quickly!

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

S. A. RICHARDSON, — We refer you to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 22, in which the answer to your question appears.

F. A. F., Scranton, Pa. Did Christ prophesy that the temple at Jerusalem should be destroyed and never rebuilt? Did he ever prophesy that the Jews should return to Jerusalem?

The answer to both questions is: No. The Saviour declared the temple should be destroyed and that not one stone should remain upon another.

N. E., Sag Harbor, L. I. How many miracles did Christ perform?

The Oxford Teacher's Bible gives the number at thirty-six, the Bagster Bible at 35. The former is correct. It has been a frequent subject of dispute whether or not the miracles recorded in the Gospels as being performed by Christ were not to some extent duplicated accounts of the same event.

MRS. E. G. D., Cubberson, O. Why is the figure seven used in the Bible in preference to other numbers and of what is it typical?

Seven is the type or symbol of perfection, and in this sense it was doubtless used in Scripture. A similar instance is the use of the number forty, which, popularly interpreted, signified many, as we, when meaning to indicate a considerable number, say "a score or two."

G. J. T., Tucson, Ariz.—Does God justify the State in taking a murderer's life? What is the best course, from a Christian standpoint, in the interest of society and morality, to adopt in dealing with murderers?

We submit this question to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It concerns a subject about which there is much difference of opinion and we would be pleased to hear from them regarding it. We will ask all who write to state their views as briefly as possible.

K. O., Baltimore, Md. Why is it naturally supposed that the forbidden fruit was an apple?

Although it is usual to speak of the forbidden fruit of Paradise as an apple, there is nothing in Scripture to indicate what sort of tree the "Tree of the Knowledge of good and evil" really was. The apple is and always has been a typical fruit and in this sense probably was selected by the commentators. "Apples of Sodom," "Apples of discord," "the apple of the eye," are familiar expressions, all being used in the same typical sense.

A YOUNG SUBSCRIBER, New York City. Is dancing consistent with Christian life?

While dancing may be harmless in itself, the promiscuous contact of young people and the attitudes and embraces that seem to be inseparable from the custom, are prone to lead to mischief. Many have been lured to ruin by the fascination of the dance. Its tendency to antagonize many elements of Christian life and character should cause it to be omitted from the list of allowable amusements.

SUBSCRIBER, Heagesville, W. Va. Which is the strongest religious denomination in the United States numerically, which the next strongest and which takes precedence financially?

The Methodists are first in point of numbers. Recent estimates place their membership strength in this country at 1,458,441 and that of the Baptists at 1,040,303. These figures are now considerably increased but the relative positions are the same. The wealthiest denomination in the United States is probably the Episcopalians. One of its properties in New York City alone (Trinity Church and parish), includes real estate valued at hundreds of millions of dollars.

J. B., Cleveland, O. 1. Does the Bible justify the use of alcohol? 2. Was the wine made by Jesus at Cana of Galilee, when he performed his first miracle, alcoholic or not?

1. The Bible is distinctly against alcohol. This question was eloquently answered by John G. Woolley in an address on Gospel Temperance at the Minneapolis Christian Endeavor Conference, which we would advise you to procure. 2. The wine made by Jesus at Cana is called in the Greek "omios" which means the pure juice of the grape. It was not uncommon in that grape-growing country for a host to press, with his own fingers, a cupful of wine from the grapes for the refreshment of his guests. In such wine there could be no alcohol.

MRS. B. Nora Spring, Ia. How old would Christ have been had he lived till now?

birth are not agreed upon definitely by Christian authorities. The Dionysian era, which was generally adopted by the early Christian Church, in the sixth century after Christ, placed the birth of the Saviour in December, the year being counted from its beginning to its end as the first year of the era, A. D. The Duke of Manchester says that according to Epiphanius, and Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, A. D. 40 was the date of the Crucifixion. The Duke, calculating from all the available data of a reliable character, declares that A. D. 6 was the earliest year of Christ's birth. This would make him at the date of the Crucifixion 34 years of age, the date of the latter being A. D. 39. Had he remained in the world till now in human form, he would have been 1885 years of age.

J. W. H., Marlborough, Monmouth Co., N. J. What king established the National Church of England, and when?

There is no National Church of England, so-called. The Church of England may be said to have had its origin in the reign of Henry VIII, after his quarrel with the Pope. In Edward VI's reign it was confirmed. The Common Prayer-Book, Catechism, and Communion Service ritual were introduced between 1540 and 1553, also the 42 Articles. At that time the presiding genius of the Church was Archbishop Cranmer. The Articles were revised and reduced to 39 in 1562.

L. STERLING, Maxwell, Ont. What privilege does the freedom of a city confer on the recipient?

Formerly the freedom of a city was highly prized for various reasons. A resident could not start any business without first securing the freedom of the city for which he had to pay a considerable sum. These freemen or "burgesses" enjoyed other privileges, besides. It was considered a high honor to a distinguished visitor to present him with the freedom of the city. In later times, such a presentation has become a mere formal compliment, and is only observed in a few of the greater cities.

W. M. Jr., Chillicothe, O.—Can I take an oath in the witness-box without offending God, seeing that Christ said: "Swear not at all."

The judicial oath or solemn asseveration or promise, as in the presence of God, that you will tell the truth, should not be confounded with oaths of another character. An oath to take vengeance, uttered in the name of Deity is an illustration of the perverted use of a solemn adjuration. So, also, is an oath taken in levity. An appeal to God, or to any sacred thing, was a custom among the ancient Hebrews who used such oaths in private and official business. The Christian custom of taking judicial oaths was founded upon the Jewish, the oath on the Gospels in Court being the legitimate adaptation of the Hebrew mode of placing the hands upon the Book of the Law. There are certain sects, including the Menonites, Quakers and Moravians, who apply literally the words of Christ, "Swear not at all," and therefore regard all oaths as unlawful. In view of all the facts, the taking of a judicial oath, or promise before Deity to tell the truth and render exact justice in the cause at issue, must remain a matter to be decided by the conscience of the individual.

MRS. B. F. D., Tecumseh, Neb. Please inform me what Chautauqua originated from and the true meaning.

Chautauqua is a well-wooded point of land jutting out into Lake Chautauqua in the Western part of New York State, about 460 miles from New York City. A camp-meeting was formerly held there which was conducted by prominent ministers and members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Two of these—Mr. Lewis Miller of Akron, O., and Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., conceived the plan of holding a Sunday School Assembly there, which was done in August, 1874, and was very successful. Another was held the following year, and an organization formed to buy the ground from the Camp-meeting Association. At first the meetings were for the benefit of Sunday School Teachers only, but they have gradually broadened so as to include scientific studies. The Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle was formed in 1878 and has proved the most successful of its developments. Its object is to arrange courses of study for people who without its aid might read discursively and with no definite plan. The Chautauqua University, an outgrowth of the Chautauqua Assembly, was

TO RAISE THE FALLEN.

The Industrial Alliance Experiment Shortly to be Tried in this State.

PROGRESS in elevating the fallen is the order of the day on both sides of the Atlantic. While General Booth of the Salvation Army, is energetically pushing forward his Industrial Christian Alliance plans in England, by which he hopes to improve the moral and social condition of thousands of British workingmen, an organization with somewhat similar purpose has been formed in New York City. It is incorporated under the laws of the Empire State with the title and designation of the "Industrial Christian Alliance of New York." Absolutely unsectarian, its objects, as stated by the founders, are to restore the fallen and the helpless to self-respect and self-support and to give industrial and religious training to neglected children. This it proposes to accomplish through the methods found in the Gospel.

The organizers and incorporators of the Alliance, (which has its headquarters at No. 45 Broadway), include such notable names as those of William L. Strong, Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D., Arthur B. Claflin, E. B. Harper, Edwin Packard, Louis Klopsch and the Rev. Drs. William M. Taylor, R. R. Meredith, John R. Paxton, Chas. Cuthbert Hall and many others. Its officers are Mr. George D. Mackay, President; James G. Beemer, Vice-President; William Howard Hoople, Treasurer and E. G. Draper, Superintendent of Industries. Among them are men who have been active Christian workers for many years and others who have already become known in connection with schemes of a philanthropic and Christian character in New York and elsewhere.

In thus seeking to establish on a broad and liberal scale, an organization for the reclamation of the fallen, the Alliance aims at no Utopian idea. Its conductors simply desire, with all the energy and ability they possess, to follow the advice of the Saviour in going out to the highways and hedges and bringing them in. It invites the cordial Christian support of good men and women everywhere in its work.

One of the foundation principles of the Industrial Christian Alliance, is the acceptance of the divine decree: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou earn thy bread," and also of Paul's injunction: "If any will not work neither let him eat." It believes that the charity which simply relieves is immediate necessity, tends to pauperize, instead of cultivating the spirit of independence. With this fixed idea in mind, the Alliance will receive, bathe, feed and lodge all who desire to reform and are willing to work. It will establish simple industries and will require a reasonable amount of labor in return for the benefits to its proteges. In no sense will the home be permanent; there will be a time limit of probably sixty days, during which every effort will be made to reclaim the inmate give him or her an outfit of clothing and if he be a mechanic, a kit of tools. Attached to the Alliance will be a free labor bureau through which positions will be secured for graduates. A feature of the daily routine will be the religious services. They will be evangelical in character.

It is proposed to establish a model Industrial Farm, on the lines laid down by Gen. Booth in England. There men and women who can be best helped by country life and work, will be sent to this farm, which will be made as nearly self-supporting as possible. Away from the city and the vicious associations that formerly surrounded them, they will have a better prospect to begin life anew. The main work of the Alliance at the outset, however, will be confined to the city where its Central Depot, comprising Homes for men and women, and a Mission building connecting, is expected to be in full operation by September next. The Rescue work, which is a leading feature of the Alliance programme, is of the utmost importance. In this branch of the Master's service, the Alliance will have the active cooperation of Sister Charlotte Resseguié, the daughter of a Baptist clergyman, who has been the instrument whereby many have been reclaimed from the ways of sin. This excellent woman, who herself had a most trying experience, was the wife of a man who proved to be a gambler. His influence drew her down until she had reached a dangerous point on the road that leads to destruction. A stranger in New York, she chanced to pass the Florence Mission, where C. N. Crittenden kindly took her in. There her eyes were opened; she saw the enormity of her guilt and she found a loving Saviour. Full of joy, she went home and told her husband, and though he scoffed and scorned at first, such was the strength and fervor of the wife's pleadings, that he yielded his heart to the Lord also. From that time, he was a most devoted servant of the Master until his death last October.

Sister Charlotte at one time possessed considerable means but she is now poor in the world's wealth, though always cheerful, helpful and hopeful. There are few more devoted women in the field working for the good cause than this Christian lady, who has passed through the fire and come out purified and chastened and prepared for her mission of reclamation. She represented the Alliance and its work at the International Christian Workers' Convention, held at Hartford, Conn., last year. For several years past, she has been the night missionary in charge of the outdoor work of the Florence Mission. Her duties have brought her into contact with many of the fallen in the dives and slums of the city, hundreds of whom have been reclaimed through her efforts. Mr. Draper who will be in charge of the practical conduct of the Homes, has been for several years connected with the Rescue Work in the Florence Mission, which carries the message of Salvation into darkest New York, for the saving of those who have gone astray.

A PRIZE FIGHTER'S MAGNANIMITY.

AMONG the applicants for admission into a Congregational Church recently, was a prize-fighter who gave the following account of his conversion: "Men of our class know our position and rank, pretty close. We sometimes make mistakes with new men, but when we have once fought with a man we know whether it is any use to try again if we are beaten. I used to boast when I was in boastful mood that I could fight any man, but I knew and my pals knew that there were some men I dare not face. One of these was a man whom we used to call Ned. I used to dread him most perhaps because he lived in the same ward and I saw more of him than others. He was a fearful hitter. Well, it astonished us all to hear that Ned had got religion. I thought about it a good deal and wondered if Ned was shamming. One day I met him and he spoke to me. I did not want to hear about religion and we got to high words, and at last I gave him a slap in the face. I expected to be knocked down. To my amazement Ned did not strike a blow. He looked at me almost like a woman and he said, 'God forgive you, Tom. It's a mean thing to hit a man who is trying to do you good.' I was kinder dumbfounded, and I got to thinking what a mighty thing religion must be to change a man like that. There's a deal more to tell about the way I was brought to get religion myself, but when the Dominie asks me, what sermon or passage of Scripture first led me to think of religion, I am bound to say it was neither." It is now as it was in the early days of the Church, men take knowledge of the consistent Christian that he has been with Christ

GOD'S CARE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning August 16th. Matt. 6: 25, 33: Luke 22: 35.

WHAT better assurance of the fact is needed than that Christ gave? "Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things." What more is needed? The son at college, or away from home on his father's business, does not distress himself by conjuring up visions of financial difficulty. His father knows that he will need money and is not the man to leave him in the lurch. If he worried and fretted and was in apprehension of lack of means, those who saw him would think that he doubted his father's love or his power to provide.

It is not a lesson of indolence. "Behold the fowls of the air." The birds are busy all day building their nests, searching for food and chirping merrily all the time. Industry, prudence, foresight are not depreciated. What is forbidden is the foreboding of calamity against which no provision can be made. Having done all in our power, having exercised the sagacity we have, let us cheerfully meet the future, knowing that God cares for us.

It is a lesson on discrimination of values. "Is not the life more than raiment?" A father is not concerned about the fashion of his son's clothing or the elegance of his manners if that son is at the point of death. His concern is for his recovery; the other things can wait. Anxiety about the soul's condition, about its safety, is to be encouraged. Until that is settled by faith in Christ all else may be postponed as of small importance.

The measure of the need is the measure of the supply when there is implicit trust. "According to your faith," is God's rule. George Muller, Pastor Spurgeon and others have trusted God for great things. They have undertaken the support of hundreds of orphans with no means but those God would send. Again and again in the history of those institutions there has been neither money nor food in hand for the morrow, but it has always been sufficient to pray, and help has come on time. Never have those hundreds of helpless children gone without a meal or clothing.

The promise of such a Being deserves confidence. Destitute immigrants are not allowed to land in the United States lest they become a public charge. But the destitute Jewish immigrants may land. Only last week an order was issued discriminating in their favor. Why? The Collector of the Port holds the assurance of wealthy Hebrews in New York that the immigrants of their race will be provided for. He therefore admits them, knowing that those who give the indemnity are abundantly able to fulfill the engagement and, having given their word, will fulfill it. Granted the premises of power and faithfulness, all is clear. They who worry and fret imply a doubt of one of these in God's character. His word is pledged: "All things shall be added unto you."

THE SILVER BRICK.

A SIGNIFICANT incident is related by Mrs. Bottom in the Silver Cross. A lady who is now one of the King's Daughters had in her possession a little silver brick. Many years ago the silver in that brick had been dug from the mine and been given to her by one near and dear to her, who regarded it as the first fruits of an enormous fortune. He believed that the mine would yield many tons of the precious metal and he proved his faith in it by investing all his fortune in the working of that mine. But it failed. Very little more silver ever came from it. When it was clear that there was nothing to hope from the mine and that all that had been invested in it was lost, the little silver brick was no longer an emblem of vast wealth coming, but became an emblem of disappointment, frustrated hopes and lost fortunes. It was carried from place to place, was used as a paper-weight and its very presence was a weight upon the memory and the heart. The day came when the sorrow of that heart was lightened by the thoughts that came with the wearing of the little Silver Cross, and then the owner took the silver brick which represented so much grief to her and made an offering of it with the request that it might be made into silver crosses for her sisters in the Order. It was a beautiful act and it typifies a consolatory thought. As "men will one day wear on their heads as ornament the dust of their lowly trust," so there will come a day when the gold of faith and love which have come from trials bravely endured will become a crown for the head of the sufferer.

AN EPWORTH CAMP-FIRE.

THE following is a description of an Epworth League's celebration, at Merrick, L. I., which a correspondent of the Christian Advocate sends to that journal: The afternoon was devoted to an "Epworth Camp-fire," which was as enthusiastic and spiritual as it was original and unique. The Rev. D. A. Jordan, who presided throughout the day, had "drafted" a preacher who had been an old soldier to lead the camp-fire. The leader described the different kinds of camp-fire—in snug winter quarters, in well-ordered field camp, at guard or picket, rendezvous, etc., but said that your true camp-fire is at the close of a day of battle, when the enemy has been driven from the field and routed. And such a camp-fire has two indispensable features: 1. All distinctions of rank are abolished—officers and privates all gather around the fire on equal terms; 2. Every man has his "say" in relating the adventures and victories of the day.

Accordingly, at the "command" of the leader, presiding elders and preachers all came down from the platform into the straw with the young people, and benches were drawn up at the sides and in front to complete the circle. A fervent season of prayer kindled the fire, and then came the testimony of victory under the lead of the great Captain. For an hour and a half the line of song and testimony continued with increasing interest, much of it expressed in military phraseology. A season of prayer and consecration concluded the service, and the camp-fire "broke up" with mutual salutations of Christian joy between the young people.

SEASIDE HOMES.

THE Boston Young Women's Christian Association has added a seaside home to its other benevolent work. For the power to do this it is indebted to Mr. Jordan who owns a hotel at Nantasket, which he has placed at the disposal of the Association for the season as a home for working-women. It affords accommodation for one hundred and twenty-five persons.

The Philadelphia Y. W. C. A., is receiving continual testimonies to the benefits derived from its work of the same kind. A letter from a friend of one of its beneficiaries, which is published in the Association's monthly, Faith and Works, is a specimen of these testimonies. The writer says: "A delicate girl and the main support of a widow, her visit to your beautiful home last summer made a new creature of her. She was much better than usual all winter." The Association has arranged for 345 girls to visit "Sea-Rest" this summer. Wealthy persons desiring to do good with their money and not knowing how to go about it may take a hint from these facts.

Y. M. C. A. World's Conference.

A LARGE part of the delegation to the World's Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations sailed from New York on Wednesday last by the City of Paris. The conference is to be held in Amsterdam, Holland, opening on August 12, and continuing to August 16. The United States delegation is the largest ever sent to a World's Conference. The International Committee has issued credentials to Associations in twenty-one States; New York has twenty-five delegates and Pennsylvania twenty-two. Canada is sending seven delegates.

A GOOD MOTTO.

GOD helps the man who helps himself. I hold that this is true, In all the busy ways of life There's much depends on you. Your hand must strike the blow and make Some effort if you'd win, And God will help the work along That earnest hands begin.

So in the work of life, my friend, Be ready for your part; Take up the tasks God sets for you With willing hand and heart, And rest assured, my friend, of this; He'll help in time of need, God helps the man who helps himself, And only such succeed.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Describes Some Things to be Seen in the Oldest City in the World.

WELL, my little travellers," said Uncle John, when the children had gathered as usual for their evening chat, "whither shall we go this evening? Shall it be to some new and undiscovered country, or shall we make a trip to the oldest city in the world for a change?"

"Yes, yes!" cried the group of listeners. "Let us go to the oldest city in the world."

"But where is it?" interrogated Milly, her blue eyes wide with childish interest at the prospect of such a journey.

"Why, it's Damascus," said Tom.

"Tom is right," said Uncle John. "I mean Damascus. You may remember that a week ago, I told you about the street vendors there, and about the Arabs. Well, Damascus was once accounted one of the most beautiful and prosperous cities in Western Asia. It was and still is the seat of many industries, and indeed its name signifies 'activity.' It lies in a beautiful plain at the eastern base of the Anti-Libanus hills and with the river Awaj flowing past it on the south. Due east is the great Arabian desert. Josephus, the famous Hebrew historian, tells us that Damascus was founded by Uz, a grandson of Shem. You may remember that the Bible tells us that Abraham had a steward who was a native of that city. In King David's time, Damascus had a king and a powerful army and the Israelites overcame and conquered their whole territory, so that the Syrians who had held the city, became servants to David. The country round about Damascus is a vast battle-ground, where ancient armies, kings and princes have fought."

"What an unfortunate city!" remarked Ted. "It must have been terrible to live there, with all these wars going on."

"Yes," said Uncle, "and even the people who were nowise involved in the quarrel of the kings did not always escape, for at one time the city was captured by the Assyrians and all the inhabitants taken prisoners and carried off into slavery."

"And what nation holds it now?"

"The Mohammedans. It was seized successively by different nations and nearly 1,200 years ago it opened its gates to the followers of the Prophet. For four hundred years it was the Oriental stronghold of the Moslem religion. All the efforts of Christian nations failed to dislodge it. You have read in your histories about the great Crusades. Some of the bravest battles of these days were fought before the walls of old Damascus. Baldwin and Conrad, and other famous Knights of the Cross led forlorn hopes there, but all their heroism never succeeded in displacing the crescent. The old-time Christians regarded the Moslems as a scourge, sent specially to punish Christians for their sins and the Church of Christ for the falling away of its members."

"There were brave Moslems, too, Uncle, were there not, as well as brave Crusaders?"

"One of the bravest men the world has ever seen was the Sultan Saladin, the Moslem hero of the Third Crusade. When I visited Damascus, I went to his tomb. See, here is a photograph of it. Note the splendid sarcophagus, carved and ornamented, with Oriental designs in relief. It is many centuries old and is a wonder of rare workmanship. On top is the stone coffin said to contain the body of the great Sultan. The sarcophagus is in a temple or mausoleum, which is held as sacred by the Moslems."

"Saladin was a Kurd of noble birth and became a soldier in his youth. At the siege of Alexandria, when the Syrian army to which he was attached, was in danger, he gave the first evidences of fine generalship. His skill won him the title of the 'Victorious Prince' and he was made Emir or Governor of all Egypt. On the death of Prince Nouredin, Saladin, whose ambition was great, managed to establish himself as Sultan of Egypt and Syria. Then this brilliant pagan began a terrible warfare against the Christians whom he defeated many times. In a battle at Tiberias, in 1187, Saladin destroyed the army of the King of Jerusalem and took the monarch and many nobles prisoners. He followed this up by storming Jerusalem and capturing it and almost every other fortified place in the Holy Land."

"Why did God permit the Christians to be sick man for many years, died at Damascus. He was a splendid soldier, a faithful friend, and for an infidel, a man of great goodness of heart. He never broke a treaty and it is an illustration of God's mysterious ways of punishing men that he should have raised up such a warrior as this barbarous Kurd, to be a hammer in the side of the Christians."

"All that remains of this great conqueror whose name, like that of Timur the Tartar who followed him, was once a terror to the nations, is this crumbling monument of stone. But there was a Christian warrior who arrived at Damascus long before Saladin and who, though he came with no army, yet won a great victory there."

Uncle John paused a moment. Seeing the interested faces wearing a puzzled expression, he added:

"I refer to Paul the Apostle, who planted Christianity there, whence it spread all through Syria. The Moslems tried in vain to stamp it out, slaying thousands of Christians. Then Timur, whom the Arabs called el Wahsh, 'the wild beast,' swept the city, with all the horrors of savage conquest, slaughtering thousands of people in a day, and destroying fine buildings, manufactures, libraries and temples."

"Timur, like Saladin, is now forgotten, while Paul has left to us and the whole world a legacy of priceless value, and a name and fame worthy of one of the greatest soldiers of the Cross."

"What is that hymn you were singing to-day, Milly?" asked Uncle, turning to the fairy at his knee.

In her sweet, lisping voice the child repeated the verses beginning:

Am I a soldier of the Cross,
A follower of the Lamb,
And shall I fear to own His cause,
Or blush to speak His name?

"That's the right kind of a soldier, children," said Uncle John, while tears stood in his eyes. "It's the very best service in the world, and one in which the faithful soldier is always sure to conquer. Remember Paul, a basket on her arm who showed a variety of book-marks, watch-cases, needle-books, and trinkets. "I'm sorry I can't buy anything to-day," said the young lady. "I haven't got any money with me. Your things look very pretty."

She stopped a moment and spoke a few words to the little girl, and then as she passed on she said again: "I'm very sorry I can't buy anything from you to-day."

"Oh, miss!" said the little girl, "you've done me just as much good as if you had. Most persons that I meet say: 'Get away with you!' but you have spoken kindly and pleasantly to me and I feel a heap better."

How little that pleasant word cost, yet how highly it was valued! If it were not for the every-day angels, this world might be a very dull matter-of-fact place indeed.

Happy Marriages.*

THERE are few events in which people take more interest than a wedding, and when all the humorists and satirists have had their say, the fact remains that next to the assurance of heaven itself, there is probably no greater blessing on earth than a happy marriage. Granted good health, good temper and Christian love, those happily married may easily triumph over all the common ills of life. There is no greater leveller than happiness in marriage. If death makes all men equal, so does love as truly. A little house, and a little in it; a great house, full of fine things in silks and satins and silver and gold. If the rich home were bereaved, what but the happiness of the poor one would be envied? When the poor one loses that which made it bright, what on earth can repair the loss?

Money has nothing to do with happy marriages, nor education much; except that education of sentiment which, it seems, may go on without the help of books or even of learning to spell and that education of the soul which is God-given. But let no one despise imperfect happiness in marriage; what there is of it cannot be matched, so long as it is of the right quality.

City Waifs in the Country.

This is the season when kind-hearted men and women, taking pity on the child-waifs of the great city, invite them out for a week or two to enjoy the fresh air of the country and the free rambles among the woods and meadows. Hundreds of these "Fresh Air Fund" excursions have been formed in different parts of the country and the physical recuperation and moral benefit enjoyed by the juvenile guests are not to be exaggerated.

Here is a letter we have received from a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that may have a personal interest for some little city lad:

ODESSA, SCHUYLER CO., N. Y.
JULY 20, 1891.

DEAR EDITOR:—I have noticed by the papers that they are sending children from the city to the country for fresh air. We would entertain a healthy blue-eyed boy, from three to five years old, for a time, as we have lost our little one. If he should like to stay with us we would make a good home for him.

There is a world of pathos in this simple letter. What a hint of gentle, Christian generosity and consideration for the poor little city waifs it conveys. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be pleased to forward to the writer of this letter any communication that may be received on the subject.

The Value of Gentleness.

THERE is a Persian legend which says that one day a stranger knocked at the door of Ibrahim's tent and asked to be fed and refreshed. The worthy patriarch took him and set viands before him, and when he had eaten and drank, he rose to depart. Ibrahim reminded him that he had not yet given thanks to God for his meal, whereupon the stranger began to revile the Deity. The patriarch, astonished at such conduct, set upon the offender and gave him a severe beating. When he had driven him away, the sage heard a voice calling him:

"Ibrahim! Ibrahim!" it said, "Why didn't thou beat the stranger thus?"

"Alas, Lord!" replied the patriarch, "he deserved it and more, for did he not ridicule thy holy name?"

"True; yet I have borne with him these three-score years and with his revilings, while thou, having seen and heard him but an hour, hast beaten him without mercy."

The patriarch fell on his face and cried aloud to God for pardon for his intemperate conduct. The lesson—so the tradition runs—had the effect of making him the gentlest of men thereafter.

so punished?" asked the children, in wonder at the recital.

"Because they had at different times, sinned and shown themselves as cruel and rapacious as the Moslems. They had plundered caravans, broken treaties and entered on wars of conquest. These were the Christians of Syria and Palestine," explained Uncle John. "Well after such overwhelming reverses in Asia, the Christians of Europe were aroused at the success of the infidels and sent out great armies, headed by the French and English kings in person, to redeem the Holy Land from the Turk. Their bravest leader, Richard, the Lion Heart, twice defeated Saladin and wrested from him the coast line of Palestine from Joppa to Tyre. A year after this reverse, Saladin, the first 'Soldier of the Cross,' whenever you think of Damascus."

Every-day Angels.

THE man or woman who has a kind, pleasant word and a laugh are to be counted as among the angels of our every-day existence. They have the happy faculty of seeing the bright side, no matter how dark may be the reverse. Their trust in God's goodness is apparent in every word and action of their lives, and the sunshine in their heart is infectious.

Particularly is it delightful to know one who can be sweetly gracious, even to those in the lower grades of life. A young lady had gone out walking. She forgot to take her purse with her. Presently she met a little girl with

THE BELL OF THE ANGELS.

It is said somewhere, at twilight,
 A great bell softly swings,
 And man may listen and hearken
 To the wondrous music that rings,

If he put from his heart's inner chamber
 All the passion, pain and strife;
 Heartache and weary longing
 That throb in the pulses of life;

If he thrusts from his soul all hatred,
 All thoughts of wicked things,
 He can hear in the holy twilight
 How the bell of the angels rings.

Let us look in our hearts and question:
 Can purer thoughts enter in
 To a soul if it be already
 The dwelling of thoughts of sin?

So, then, let us ponder a little—
 Let us look in our hearts and see
 If the twilight bell of the angels
 Could ring for us—you and me.

THE WILD WHITE ROSE.

It was peeping through the brambles,
 That little wild, white rose,
 Where the hawthorn hedge was planted
 My garden to enclose.
 All beyond was fern or heather
 On the breezy open moor;
 And within was sun and shelter,
 And the wealth of beauty's store;
 But I did not heed the fragrance
 Of flower or of tree;
 For my eyes were on that rosebud,
 And it grew too high for me.

'Tis wiser far to number
 The blossoms at my feet,
 Than ever to be sighing
 For just one bud more sweet.

My sunbeams and my shadows
 Fall from a pierced Hand;
 I can better trust His wisdom,
 Since His heart I understand,
 And maybe in the morning,
 When His blessed face I see,
 He will tell me why my white rose Grew just too high for me!

A NURSE'S STORY.

A LADY who visits the almshouses to speak to the inmates about Christ was conversing recently with one of the nurses in the infirmary who has done much good in telling the sick and dying of the way of salvation. The nurse said that one of the worst patients she had was just dead. He had been under her care and had been most abusive to her using blasphemous language. She reproved him gently. The next day he was removed to another ward. "I did not see him again" said the nurse, "for three weeks, one day he asked for me, but was told by his own nurse that he could not see me. That day I happened to go to his ward for something, when the nurse told me about him, adding, 'I wouldn't go to him if I were you, after the way he treated you;' but I went, and found him very ill. He said 'I have been thinking about you so much, and that I should not like to have to account to God for my bad words; but I have asked Jesus to wash out my sins, and he has heard me. I don't think I shall get better, do you, nurse?' I told him that I did not, and that he had probably not many hours to live. 'Then take my hands in yours,' said he, 'and hold them till I've crossed the river. I'm afraid, but stay with me to the end. I'll tell you when I'm over, and then you may let me go.' I did hold his hands, and in two seconds he said, 'It's all right, I'm over,' and his spirit passed away."

A BAD BARGAIN.

A DISTRESSING scene at a death-bed is described by a Christian physician, who vainly tried to impart comfort to a despairing soul. He was summoned hastily to attend a young man, who had been injured in a street accident. He examined the patient and then honestly told him the sad news that he had but a very short time to live. The young man was astonished. At length he looked up in the face of the doctor, and with a despairing countenance, said, "I have missed it—at last." "What have you missed?" inquired the tender-hearted physician. "Doctor, I have missed the salvation of my soul." "Oh! say not so. Do you remember the thief on the cross?" "Yes, I remember the thief on the cross. And I remember that he never said to the Holy Ghost—Go thy way. But I did. And now he is saying to me—Go your way." He lay gasping awhile, and looking up with a vacant, staring eye, he said, "I was anxious about my soul a little time ago. But I did not want to be saved then. Something seemed to say to me, 'Don't put it off, make sure of salvation;' but I said to myself, 'I will postpone it.' Yet I could not get my own consent to do it, until I had made a bargain with myself that I would take it up again, at a time not remote, and more favorable. I meant to have made my salvation sure. And now I have missed it—at last." "You remember," said the doctor, "that there are some who come at the eleventh hour." "My eleventh hour," he rejoined, "was when I had that call of the Spirit. I have had none since—shall not have. Oh, I have missed it!" This was said with such indescribable despondency, that nothing was said in reply. After lying a few moments, he raised his head, again exclaimed in agony and horror, "Missed it at last!" and he died.

A FAMOUS THOROUGHFARE.

The wanderer in Piccadilly, (says Scribner's Magazine), who likes to muse on the changes of human fortune, the turns of that wheel which the Buddha contemplates, may please himself by reflecting that, along this way passed the carriages of the Princess de Lamballe and of Madame du Barry. The former dined with the Duke of Queensberry here, before the Revolution. But it was during the Revolution that Madame du Barry, in company with the Prince of Wales, sat at the ducal table. From Number 20 Sir Francis Burdett was taken to prison, though he had barricaded his house, provoked a riot, and defied the Speaker of the House of Commons, just eighty years ago. Number 94 was Lord Palmerston's dwelling, from 1835 till his death in 1865; here he gave political parties, and this was the last fortress of contented Whiggism. In Number 139 Byron parted from Lady Byron, "in the utmost kindness," said Moore. She was going to visit her father, who wrote to the poet that she would return no more. What mysteries passed in Number 139, part of the poet's old house, we shall never really know; the cause of the separation is said to have been so simple that nobody could ever find it out. Some poets are "gey ill to live wi'," as Mrs. Carlyle said about her son.

A LEGAL INQUIRY.

How an Infidel Jurist was Convinced of the Truth of the Bible.

NOT very long ago, an aged lawyer of great eminence and talent, who, from early life, had imbibed infidel principles, met an elder of the Presbyterian church, who was also a lawyer, and said to him, "I wish, sir, to examine into the truth of the Christian religion. What books would you advise me to read on the evidences of Christianity?"

The elder, surprised at the inquiry, replied, "That is a question, sir, which you ought to have settled long ago. You ought not to have put off a subject so important to this late period of life."

"Is it too late?" said the inquirer; "I never knew much about it, but I always supposed that Christianity was rejected by the great majority of learned men. I intend, however, now to examine the subject thoroughly myself. I have upon me, as my physician says, a mortal disease, under which I may live a year and a half or two years, but not probably longer. What books, sir, would you advise me to read?"

"The Bible," said the elder.

"I believe you don't understand me," resumed the unbeliever, surprised in his turn: "I wish to investigate the truth of the Bible."

"I would advise you, sir," repeated the elder, "to read the Bible. And I will give you my reasons. Most infidels are very ignorant of the Scriptures. Now to reason on any subject with correctness, we must understand what it is about which we reason. In the next place, I consider the internal evidence of the truth of the Sacred Scriptures stronger than the external evidence."

"And where shall I begin my investigation?" inquired the unbeliever. "At the New Testament?"

"No," replied the elder; "begin at the beginning—at Genesis."

The infidel bought a commentary, went home, and sat down to the serious study of the Scriptures. He applied all his strong and well-disciplined powers of mind to the Bible, to try rigidly but impartially its truth.

As he went on in his perusal, he received occasional calls from the elder. The infidel freely remarked upon what he had read, and stated his objections. He liked this passage—he thought that touching and beautiful—but he could not credit a third.

One evening the elder called, and found the unbeliever walking the room with a dejected look, his mind apparently absorbed in thought. He continued, not noticing that any one had come in, busily to trace and retrace his steps. The elder at length spoke:

"You seem, sir, to be in a brown study. Of what are you thinking?"

"I have been reading," replied the infidel, "the moral law."

"Well, what do you think of it?" asked the elder.

"I will tell you what I used to think," answered the infidel. "I supposed that Moses was the leader of a horde of banditti; that, having a strong mind, he acquired great influence over a superstitious people; and that on Mount Sinai he played off some sort of fireworks, to the amazement of his ignorant followers, who imagined, in their mingled fear and superstition, that the exhibition was supernatural."

"But what do you think now?" interposed the elder.

"I have been looking," said the infidel, "into the nature of that law. I have been trying to see whether I can add anything to it, or take anything from it, so as to make it better. Sir, I cannot. It is perfect."

"The first commandment," continued he, "directs us to make the Creator the object of our supreme love and reverence. That is right. If he be our Creator, Preserver, and Supreme Benefactor, we ought to treat him, and none other, as such. The seconds forbids idolatry. That certainly is right. The third forbids profanity. The fourth fixes a time for religious worship; and if there be a God, he ought surely to be worshipped. It is suitable that there should be an outward homage, significant of our inward regard. If God be worshipped, it is proper that some time should be set apart for that purpose, when all may worship him harmoniously and without interruption. One day in seven is certainly not too much, and I do not know that it is too little. The fifth defines the peculiar duties arising from family relations. Injuries to our neighbor are then classified by the moral law. They are divided into offences against life, chastity, property, and character. And," said he, applying a legal idea with legal acuteness, "I notice that the greatest offence in each class is expressly forbidden. Thus the greatest injury to life is murder; to chastity, adultery; to property, theft; to character, perjury. Now the greater offence must include the less of the same kind. Murder must include every injury to life; adultery every injury to purity, and so of the rest. And the moral code is closed and perfected by a command forbidding every improper desire in regard to our neighbors."

"I have been thinking," he proceeded "where did Moses get that law? I have read history: the Egyptians and the adjacent nations were idolaters; so were the Greeks and Romans; and the wisest and best Greeks or Romans never gave a code of morals like this. Where did Moses get this law, which surpasses the wisdom and philosophy of the most enlightened ages? He lived at a period comparatively barbarous, but he has given a law in which the learning and sagacity of all subsequent time can detect no flaw. Where did he get it? He could not have soared so far above his age as to have devised it himself. I am satisfied where he obtained it. It came down from heaven. I am convinced of the truth of the religion of the Bible."

The infidel,—infidel no longer—remained to his death a firm believer in the truth of Christianity.

A CHINAMAN'S LOGIC.

In a sermon by Rev. T. R. Stevenson, published in the Chinese Recorder, the following fact is stated: A missionary in one of our Chinese cities labored long and apparently unsuccessfully. He was becoming discouraged when one day a Chinaman astonished him with the remark: "I want your God to be my God." The missionary answered, "What do you mean?" "I wish to be of the same religion as you." "Why do you?" "Because if your God is like you, he must be good." It is not in China alone, that inferences are drawn from the lives of Christian men. When the light shines, men glorify God as Christ said they would. (Matt. 5: 16.)

FAMILY PRAYER IN PERSIA.

A MISSIONARY in Persia was recently entertained for a night in the course of his journey by a family of converted fire-worshippers. He was interested in seeing how they continued their former habits of worship while praising God. He says: "The children had been put to bed, and after some conversation with us the husband and wife rose and stood in the middle of the room facing one another. In this attitude they had been accustomed to sing their hymn to the setting sun. Now the man began by chanting the Lord's Prayer in a high key, and then he repeated without book the beautiful Eighteenth Psalm beginning: 'I love thee, O Lord, my strength.' Then the seventieth Psalm: 'Make haste, O God, to deliver me.' Finally the hundred and third Psalm 'Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name.' The woman's voice joined the man's, and both sang with plaintive and monotonous voice. When they ceased their worship, the mother, still standing in the centre of the room, was asked by her husband if the children were all well; if they were sleeping soundly; if the cattle had been carefully stalled. She replying satisfactorily, they retired to rest."

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars. At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—Cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

A CHINESE MARTYR.

How a Native Christian was Hounded and Lashed by his Persecutors.

IN view of the recent attacks on Christians in China, resulting, as already stated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the cruel murders of white teachers and native converts, the following narrative of persecution for the Saviour's sake, will be found specially interesting. The details are obtained from C. F. Johnson, M.D., formerly of Peotone, Ill., but now a missionary, at Ichowfu, North China. The following facts are taken from his letter published in the Interior: A man who had charge of the collection of taxes in his district, was arrested for misappropriation of the government funds and sent to the nearest city to be arraigned before the judge. In passing through one of the villages on his way he made his escape. The official, exasperated at losing the prisoner, declared that the Christians must have aided in the escape. He sent to the village where the prisoner was last seen and arrested a man named Gung, a well-known native Christian. Gung was able to clear himself of the charge, for he was not in the village when the man passed through. He would have been released, as a matter of course, if he had not been a Christian, but as it was he was kept in prison.

The animus of the proceeding was perceived when he was brought before the chief official. "What do you mean," he was asked, "by following after these foreign devils as you do? Don't you know they are trying to break down the government of China and the religion of China and bring in a foreign government and a foreign religion? What do you mean by following them and helping them?" Then the old man stood up before that official—as strong in his faith as was Paul before Agrippa—and said: "Your honor, I am not following the foreigners. I believe there is one true God in heaven, who sent his Son into this world to save sinners, and I am trusting in that Son to save me from my sins. This is not the foreigners' religion; this is the world's religion, and I believe it."

He was not allowed to say any more. At a signal from the great man the guard seized him and threw him down. He was sentenced to receive four hundred lashes and they were administered there and then. He was thrust back into prison and three separate times afterward he was brought out and beaten. Then, finding he would die rather than deny Christ, he was released, and his friends carried him to Chefoo for treatment by the medical missionary. His back and shoulders were covered with wounds where the bamboo rods had cut deep into the flesh. Under careful treatment he recovered. His friends then begged him to lodge a complaint against the official who had beaten him illegally, but Gung firmly refused. "Leave him to God," he said, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay saith the Lord." They continued to urge him as opportunities occurred, to present the case to superior officers, but they could not move him, and finally the news came that the culpable official had died a most miserable death.

CONVERTS AMONG SLAVES.

It is true now, as it was in the time of Christ, that "to the poor the Gospel is preached" and true also, that while the rich turn away the common people hear it gladly. An instance of this kind is given in a letter to the Independent by the Rev. W. R. Manley, one of the American Baptist Missionaries in India. He has been laboring among the Telugus and he says that, though representatives of all classes are to be found among the converts the majority are out-castes, or people whom the Brahmins regard as having no caste at all. These are the Pariahs of the Tamil country, the Malas and Madegas among the Telugus. They were for ages the serfs of the Sudra farmers, the practice of selling them into actual slavery having continued well on into the present century, in the Tamil country at least; and their condition, as a class, is one of subjection to constant oppression and injustice. The Malas are the weavers of the country, while the Madegas are the leather dressers and coolie laborers. According to a custom which prevails in certain parts, the Madega enters into a contract to make for his Sudra master a certain number of pairs of sandals, besides repairing them when necessary, and also to work in his fields when called. The contract is usually for a year, and the stipulated price is paid in grain, a portion of which is given in advance. But the slightest pretext is made an excuse for keeping back part of the pay, and thus they are subjected to all sorts of injustice, not infrequently losing the greater part of what they have earned.

But poor and despised as these two classes are, they are the ones from whom the thousands of converts in the Telugu Mission have come, and the large majority have come from the Madegas. The cleanly intelligent Brahmins and the fine stalwart Sudras are kept by dread of losing caste from accepting Christ, while the poor neglected Malas and Madegas by thousands have received with joy the news of salvation. They are not model Christians, Mr. Manley says, but compared with their former condition and compared with their heathen neighbors the improvement is wonderful. They have altogether abandoned the repulsive practices which most disgraced them and they are growing daily in knowledge and grace.

A PERNICIOUS FASHION.

Few persons know the origin of high-heeled shoes. It is believed that they owe their invention to Persia, where they were introduced upon sandals in the form of wooden blocks, for the purpose of raising the feet from the heated sands of that country. The Persian heel for men was about two inches in height, while those of the women were much higher, varying from eighteen inches to two feet. They had all the effect of a pair of stilts, and gave the wearer a most distressing gait, of which that produced by the modern high heel of fashion is a mild reproduction. Next they came into vogue in Venice, where they were designed to keep wives from going abroad gossiping, and were called "chapineys." The Venetian sort were profusely decorated, and the rank of the wearer was determined by their height and adornment, some being over half a yard high. In both countries, however, they were used only for a limited period, the effect upon the health of the wearers being decidedly bad. In this country the high-heeled shoe has become a craze with many ladies. Physicians declare that it is ruinous to health and distorting to the body, besides being ungraceful. On moral as well as physiological grounds it is to be condemned as being on a par with many vanities denounced in the Scriptures.

A PERSECUTOR SURPRISED.

THE magnanimity of a Christian wife in China has heaped coals of fire on her husband's head. Mr. Meadows of the China Inland Mission writes: "In one of our out stations there is a woman whose husband has beaten her times without number for attending the services. The preacher dare not visit her, and no disciple, male or female, was permitted to enter the house. A short time ago he beat his poor wife so severely as to be afraid that he had gone too far; and he began to regret his violence. Shortly afterward he was seized with a serious illness, and was unable to rise from his bed or help himself. 'Now,' he thought, 'my wife will pay me back for my ill-treatment. She will not attend to me, so I must do the best I can for myself.' His wife, who was slowly recovering from his cruel treatment, did all she could to make him comfortable, and even used up her little savings to buy some delicacies. This was all done with such Christian grace and patience, without one unkind word, that the husband was astonished, and began to think, 'There cannot be anything very bad in the religion of Jesus, or my wife would not have acted in this manner towards me.' From that time he has given her full liberty to attend the service." Mr. Meadows mentions that she and a few other converts have opened a mission room and pay a native teacher to conduct the services.

A TITLED CRUSADER.

AN extraordinary mission in the great African desert has sprung out of Cardinal Lavigerie's mission work. He has organized a band of men whom he calls, "The Armed Brethren of the Sahara" and a few weeks ago he held at Biskra on the borders of the Desert a solemn service at which he dedicated them to their work. At their head is a man of the spirit of Ignatius Loyola. He is the Vicomte de Brissac, formerly well-known in the sporting world of Paris, but now devoted heart and soul to the service of their Church. With him are twelve others, none of them more than thirty-five years of age, who have bound themselves to the work and to celibacy for the space at least of five years. These Templars, as they may be called, are, partly like the Trappists, devoted to industry. They are to cultivate dates and palms in the oases of the Desert. They are to care for the wounded and the sick, and to secure them from violence. They have erected a home which they call "the house of the brethren" which is the first of those which may be established on the confines of the Sahara or in its oases; and they are from their position to be regarded as at once loyal to France and to their Church.

A MISSIONARY ON A BED OF ADDERS.

MRS. ELLEN CUSHING, who, with her husband, has been engaged in missionary work in Burmah for many years, in addressing the Foreign Missionary Union at the last anniversary meeting in Philadelphia, told the following incident of life in that wild country: "We had been travelling through the country away from any settlement for several days," she said, "and one afternoon, when it was unadvisable to proceed farther that day, feeling very tired I threw a blanket upon a pile of dead leaves and lay down to have a quiet nap. I had hardly closed my eyes when, feeling something crawling on me, I looked, to find with horror that it was a deadly brown adder. The reptile was nearly five feet long, and he was sliding slowly across me. To move or cry out would have been instant death, so I determined to lie perfectly still and pretend to be without life. Closing my eyes and holding my breath I waited until the adder crawled slowly along and over my face. His cold, slimy body in touching my face produced such a sensation that it was nearly more than I could do to remain passive, but I managed to do so until the reptile had gotten away some distance, and then I jumped up and screamed just like a woman. The coolies and my husband ran to my assistance, and when they stirred up the leaves on which I had made my bed adders came squirming out in all directions. It seems that I had laid on a nest of them."

A QUESTION AT A BALL.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Indian Witness, warning its Christian readers against dancing, relates the following incident: Miss — was preparing for confirmation and felt the solemnity of the vows she was about to make; at once she gave up dancing, and in vain worldly friends urged her to join in this amusement; but, meeting a Christian lady, by whom she was told that "dancing was no harm," Miss —, being very fond of the amusement, returned to it. She still regarded herself as a Christian, and would certainly not have resumed dancing but for her friend's assurance that there was "no harm" in it. At a ball shortly afterward she asked her partner in the dance, "Are you a Christian?" His reply was, "No; nor you, or you would not be here!" She quitted the ball-room and sought counsel from another Christian lady, who spoke of pleasures that were everlasting and led her to Jesus. She felt dancing to be out of the question, and has since then been satisfied with the joy she has in Christ.

A FRIEND AT COURT.

In a letter to the Church from Tabriz, in Persia, the Rev. S. G. Wilson speaks of the advantages already accruing to the mission work there through the appointment of Dr. Holmes to be consulting physician to the Vali-Ahd or heir-apparent. He says: It was on the ground that it gave us recognition and encouragement that it was opposed by the Mollahs. His highness was so much interested in an exhibition of the powers of the microscope that he then and there insisted on purchasing the instrument for his own use. Photography and telegraphy are already matters of practical knowledge to the prince. The Amir-i-Nizam, the governor who showed Dr. Nelson honor, has required considerable attention. Besides, the fees accruing from such practice, the friendship of the authorities is worth much. Not long ago one of the colporteurs of the American Bible Society was robbed and beaten by some villagers. The governor, when appealed to through the English Consul, immediately sent his soldiers, punished the villagers, and refunded the value of the property. As many cases at law are allowed to hang on interminably, the promptness in this case was due to friendship for our physician.

Stumbling Stones Removed from the Word of God.

BY REV. ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D. D.

18mo. Cloth, 50 cents.

In this little book many supposed difficulties of the Bible are shown not to be such in fact, and such simple rules of interpretation of a general character are laid down as to make clear the literal truth of many passages which to some minds have previously been doubtful or only capable of the explanation that they were used metaphorically. The book is especially timely now that general interest is turned towards the interpretation of the Scriptures.

IN SIN'S STRONGHOLD.

The Brave Work that is Being Done for Christ by the "Salvation Army" Lasses—A Mission in the New York Slums.

It would be hard to decide which is the most sin-steeped spot among the slums of New York. There are places in the great city to which a parallel can only be found in the festering purlieus of London and Paris, where vice openly flaunts itself and sin holds sway, defiant of law and public opinion. Such a spot is, or rather till lately was, on the corner of Roosevelt and Oak Streets. It would have been difficult to find a drearier or more cheerless section to live or die in on Manhattan Island. It has been aptly called the

for to it the hardest class seemed to gravitate naturally. With its saloons add foul-smelling tenements, its rowdies and viragos, its criminals and unfortunates, it was a neighborhood from which the honest poor would shrink in dismay, and in passing which the respectable citizen would keep a sharp lookout for thugs.

To this forbidding quarter, two years ago, there came to live two quiet-looking girls. They took a room in the very worst part of the section, at a spot notorious for its brawls and disturbances. Their first care was to make their tenement room clean and sweet. True, they had no carpet for the floor; but the boards were scrubbed as white as stout arms and rough brushes could make them. The furniture was strong and serviceable, like the dress of the new inmates, who wore plain calico gowns and ample white aprons.

By-and-by, the denizens of the "wickedest spot in New York" found the new-comers a subject for gossip. Curiosity was aroused regarding them, their means of living and their habits. Yet no evil could be said of the two pleasant-faced young women, who were so kind and neighborly and who proved ever ready to assist those living near-by. They seemed to like to help, just for the pleasure of helping, and their perseverance in these ways made friends even of the rough folk by whom they were surrounded. Besides, if there was a sick man or woman about, they visited the invalid, cleaned up the sick-room, fed the children, if there happened to be a brood, as is generally the case in tenements, and talked so gently the while that people when they came again. And the neighbors knew that whenever their own larder ran short there was always a bit to be had from the strangers' cupboard, or a cup of fragrant tea. Altogether, they were a puzzle to the slum which they had selected to live in, but an exceedingly pleasing puzzle, nevertheless. By their simple ways and kindly acts they won the hearts of the rough class and their respect as well. Never a word of offence would be uttered while they were near, and the lips that at other times were brimming with oaths and vulgarities, were suddenly sealed as soon as the twain came in view.

Six months passed before the neighbors knew that the two gentle girls who had come to live among them and who had made such a conquest, were Salvation Army women. When the fact finally leaked out, they

Forgot to Scoff and Jeer,

as they had often done at the Army. These girls deserved better treatment and even the worst among the men were too gallant to deride them, now that they had donned the familiar uniform of the Army. The girls were Staff Captain Emma Bowen, a sweet-faced Englishwoman, and Mary Johnson, a Swede. Both had seen service in the Army, Miss Bowen having served two years in England before coming to America, and Miss Johnson, who was converted in New York, having been four years engaged in similar work in the metropolis. Bright-faced, cheery-voiced and strong-limbed, they brought to their new field of work a vigor and wholesome energy that were good to see. They showed the shiftless mothers of that neighborhood how to keep house, to care for their children and to win their lazy, spendthrift husbands from

The Soul-Wrecking Saloons.

They preached little but they sang a good deal; they were skilled with the needle, and soon the housewives of the district learned to respect and trust them.

The children, too, no longer roamed idly about the streets, ragged and unkempt; for the Salvation lasses took care that the toddlers should be amused rationally and kept clean as well. In fact, what with the children and the adults, they had altogether too much to do, and it soon became apparent that the outpost of the Army needed reinforcements. They needed more soldiers and more money. Contributions were started and soon a special fund was forthcoming to carry on the mission in the slums. Captain Brown secured the assistance of

Seven Young Women

and at the same time the mission was extended up into Chrystie street, and down into Cherry and Water streets. The mission rooms at Oak and Roosevelt streets were extended by the addition of two more apartments and these were devoted to the use of the children whom the mothers sent there to be cared for daily. Fifteen or twenty are regularly cared for at the present time. There is no pleasanter place in town than this simple nursery, where the little waifs, redeemed from the barren prospects of a life of misery, are taught to love the Saviour and become moral, honest and useful members of society.

The illustrations which appear in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD afford some idea of the quarters occupied by these noble women who deserve to be accounted heroic workers in the Christian cause. Staff Captain Emma Bowen and her lieutenant, Miss Johnson, together with Lieutenant Pavid, another devoted and successful worker, are shown in an interesting group, with some of

Their Little Nursery Charges.

Their work is any work that comes to hand. They are expert in wielding brush and broom, and they practice the doctrines of the good old proverb which declares that "cleanliness is next to godliness." They brighten up whatever they touch and cheer all whom they approach. They bring sunshine to the heart as well as to the house. Their inspiring songs and simple eloquence attract sympathetic audiences at the mission rooms, where the fervor of the services is attested by the hearty choruses on the part of men and the tears of the women. The hymn "Jesus will save You," rarely fails to bring tears to the eyes of the hardened sinners. The text-slips and printed hymns distributed by the mission band are eagerly taken.

"We are never molested in the street" said one of the Salvation lasses, to the writer. "No little thing of about seven or eight. The Mission women had taken her to the nursery in pity and cared for her, because her mother, who had been on a prolonged debauch, was suffering from an attack of delirium tremens and the child was left uncared for and absolutely without food. Nor is this an isolated case. It is a familiar experience to find the children of such parents left to wander the streets and pick up such stray morsels of food as they can, while their hardened parents are too maudlin to even notice their existence.

Such a Mission as this goes to the very foundation of Gospel work and reaches a stratum of humanity so as to be beyond the reach of other agencies. There is, perhaps, no other way in which the slums can be purified than by the adoption of practical methods, such as are employed by Staff Captain Bowen and her little band of courageous women, who, denying themselves even the most ordinary comforts, devote their lives day and night to the rescuing of their fellow-men and women. Yet, with all the disadvantages attending their lot, the Salvation lasses are happy; happy in the knowledge that they are serving the Master faithfully among the lowly, and that they are the chosen means of reaching those matter at what hour of the night we may be called on to go out to duty, we are safe. The roughest men know us and treat us with perfect politeness. They recognize that we have come here to do good and they put no obstacles in our way.

Degraded and Utterly Fallen

"It wasn't always this way, though, she added with a smile. "They Called us the 'Unknown Women' and stared us out of countenance, if that were possible. Whatever rows may be going on—and there are often people getting roughly handled—we are never challenged or insulted. I think we could find a score of champions if we but raised a finger anywhere in this district."

One of the waifs whom the writer saw when he called at the Mission, was a bright who otherwise would be among the forgotten outcasts who never hear the glad tidings. Their work has been abundantly blessed, too, in these few years. Slowly, but surely, the wicked neighborhood is being revolutionized by their godly influence and example. Practical charity and the Gospel have proved in their case an infallible combination for fighting sin in its stronghold, and the "wickedest place in New York" has already yielded a harvest of souls to Christ through their humble instrumentality. Transient philanthropic efforts in the congested east-side districts have hitherto accomplished little.

They look forward hopefully to the day when the Mission in the Slums will be extended to include all the plague-spots in "Darkest New York."

A POOR INVESTMENT.

"Ye have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money." Isa. 52: 3.

THE Lord's people had gone headlong into sin, and as a punishment they had been carried captive to Babylon. They found that iniquity did not pay. Cyrus seized Babylon, and felt so sorry for these poor captives that, without a dollar of compensation, he let them go home. So that, literally, my text was fulfilled: "Ye have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money."

There is enough Gospel in this text for fifty sermons. There are persons here who have, like the people of the text, sold out. You do not seem to belong either to yourselves or to God. The title-deeds have been passed over to "the world, the flesh, and the devil," but the purchaser never paid up. "Ye have sold yourselves for nought."

When a man passes himself over to the world he expects to get some adequate compensation. He has heard the great things that the world does for a man, and he believes it. He wants two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. That will be horses and houses, and a summer resort, and jolly companionship. To get it he parts with his physical health by overwork. He parts with his conscience. He parts with much domestic enjoyment. He parts with opportunities for literary culture. He parts with his soul. And so he makes over his entire nature to the world. He does it in four installments. He pays down the first installment, and one-fourth of his nature is gone. He pays down the second installment, and one-half of his nature is gone. He pays down the third installment, and three-quarters of his nature are gone; and after many years have gone by he pays down the fourth installment, and lo! his entire nature is gone. Then he comes up to the world and says: "Good-morning. I have delivered to you the goods. I have passed over to you my body, my mind, and my soul and I have come now to collect the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars." "Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars?" says the world. "What do you mean?" "Well," you say, "I come to collect the money you owe me, and I expect you to fulfill your part of the contract." "But," says the world, "I have failed. I am bankrupt. I cannot possibly pay that debt. I have not for a long while expected to pay it." "Well," you then say, "give me back the goods." "Oh, no," says the world, "they are all gone. I cannot give them back to you." And there you stand on the confines of eternity, your spiritual character gone, staggering under the consideration that "you have sold yourself for nought."

I tell you the world is a liar; it does not keep its promises. It is a cheat, and it fleeces everything it can put its hands on. It is a bogus world. It is a six-thousand-year-old swindle. Even if it pays the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for which you contracted, it pays them in bonds that will not be worth anything in a little while. Just as a man may pay down ten thousand dollars in hard cash and get for it worthless scrip—so the world passes over to you the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars in that shape which will not be worth a farthing to you a thousandth part of a second after you are dead. "Oh," you say, "It will help to bury me anyhow." Oh, my brother! you need not worry about that. The world will bury you soon enough from sanitary considerations.

Post-mortem emoluments are of no use to you. The treasures of this world will not pass current in the future world; and if all the wealth of the Bank of England were put in the pocket of your shroud, and you in the midst of the Jordan of death were asked to pay three cents for your ferriage, you could not do it. There comes a moment in your existence beyond which all earthly values fail; and many a man has wakened up in such a time to find that he has sold out for eternity, and has nothing to show for it. I should as soon think of going to Chatham Street to buy silk pocket-handkerchiefs with no cotton in them, as to go to this world expecting to find any permanent happiness. It has deceived and deluded every man who has ever put his trust in it.

History tells us of one who resolved that he would have all his senses gratified at one and the same time, and he expended thousands of dollars on each sense. He entered a room, and there were the first musicians of the land pleasing his ear, and there were fine pictures fascinating his eye, and there were costly aromatics regaling his nostril, and there were the richest meats and wines and fruits, and confections, pleasing the appetite, and there was a soft couch of sinful indulgence on which he reclined; and the man declared afterward that he would give ten times what he had given if he could have one week of such enjoyment, even though he lost his soul by it! Ah! that was the rub! He did lose his soul by it! Cyrus the Conqueror thought for a little while that he was making a fine thing out of this world, and yet before he came to his grave he wrote out this pitiful epitaph for his monument: "I am Cyrus. I occupied the Persian Empire. I was king over Asia. Begrudge me not this monument." But the world in after years plowed up his sepulchre.

The world clapped its hands and stamped its feet in honor of Charles Lamb; but what does he say? "I walk up and down, thinking I am happy, but feeling I am not." Call the roll, and be quick about it. Samuel Johnson, the learned! Happy? "No. I am afraid I shall some day get crazy." William Hazlitt, the great essayist! Happy? "No. I have been for two hours and a half going up and down Paternoster Row with a volcano in my breast." Smollet, the witty author! Happy? "No. I am sick of praise and blame, and I wish to God that I had such circumstances around me that I could throw my pen into oblivion." Buchanan, the world-renowned writer, exiled from his own country, appealing to Henry VIII. for protection! Happy? "No. Over mountains covered with snow, and through valleys flooded with rain, I come a fugitive." Moliere, the popular dramatic author! Happy? "No. That wretch of an actor just now recited four of my lines without the proper accent and gesture. To have the children of my brain so hung, drawn, and quartered, tortures me like a condemned spirit."

I went to see a worldling die. As I went into the hall I saw its floor was tessellated, and its wall was a picture-gallery. I found his death-chamber adorned with tapestry until it seemed as if the clouds of the setting sun had settled in the room. The man had given forty years to the world—his wit, his time, his genius, his talent, his soul. Did the world come in to stand by his death-bed, and clearing off the vials of bitter medicine, put down any compensation? Oh, no! The world does not like sick and dying people, and leaves them in the lurch. It ruined this man, and then left him. He had a magnificent funeral. All the ministers wore scarfs, and there were forty-three carriages in a row; but the departed man appreciated not the obsequies.

I want to persuade my audience that this world is a poor investment; that it does not pay ninety per cent. of satisfaction, nor eighty per cent., nor twenty per cent., nor two per cent., nor one; that it gives no solace when a dead babe lies on your lap; that it gives no peace when conscience rings its alarm; that it gives no explanation in the day of dire trouble; and at the time of your decease it takes hold of the pillow-case, and shakes out the feathers, and then jolts down in the place thereof sighs, and groans, and execrations, and then makes you put your head on it. Oh, ye who have tried this world, is it a satisfactory portion? Would you advise your friends to make the investment? No. "Ye have sold yourselves for nought." Your conscience went. Your hope went. Your Bible went. Your heaven went. Your God went. When a sheriff under a writ from the courts sells a man out, the officer generally leaves a few chairs and a bed, and a few cups and knives; but in this awful vendue in which you have been engaged the auctioneer's mallet has come down upon body, mind, and soul: Going! Gone! "Ye have sold yourselves for nought."

How could you do so? Did you think that your soul was a mere trinket which for a few pennies you could buy in a toy shop? Did you think that your soul, if once lost, might be found again if you went out with torches and lanterns? Did you think that your soul was short-lived, and that, panting, it would soon lie down for extinction? Or had you no idea what your soul was worth? Did you ever put your forefingers on its eternal pulses? Have you not felt the quiver of its peerless wing? Have you not known that, after leaving the body, the first step of your soul reaches to the stars, and the next step to the farthest outposts of God's universe, and that it will not die until the day when the everlasting Jehovah expires? Oh, my brother, what possessed you that you should part with your soul so cheap? "Ye have sold yourselves for nought."

But I have some good news to tell you. I want to engage in a litigation for the recovery of that soul of yours. I want to show that you have been cheated out of it. I want to prove, as I will, that you were crazy on that subject, and that the world, under such circumstances, had no right to take the title-deed from you; and if you will join me I shall get a decree from the High Chancery Court of Heaven reinstating you into the possession of your soul. "Oh," you say, "I am afraid of lawsuits; they are so expensive, and I can not pay the cost." Then have you forgotten the last half of my text? "Ye have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money."

Money is good for a great many things, but it can not do anything in this matter of the soul. You can not buy your way through. Dollars and pounds sterling mean nothing at the gate of mercy. If you could buy your salvation, heaven would be a great speculation, an extension of Wall Street. Bad men would go up and buy out the place, and leave us to shift for ourselves. But as money is not a lawful tender, what is? I will answer: Blood! Whose? Are we to go through the slaughter? Oh, no; it wants richer blood than ours. It wants a king's blood. It must be poured from royal arteries. It must be a sinless torrent. But where is the king? I see a great many thrones and a great many occupants, yet none seem to be coming down to the rescue. But after awhile the clock of night in Bethlehem strikes twelve, and the silver pendulum of a star swings across the sky, and I see the King of Heaven rising up, and he descends, and steps down from star to star, and from cloud to cloud, lower and lower, until he touches the sheep-covered hills, and then on to another hill, this last skull-shaped, and there, at the sharp stroke of persecution, a rill incarnadine trickles down, and we who could not be redeemed by money are redeemed by precious and imperial blood.

We have in this day professed Christians who are so rarefied and etherealized that they do not want a religion of blood. What do you want? You seem to want a religion of brains. The Bible says: "In the blood is the life." No atonement without blood. Ought not the apostle to know? What did he say? "Ye are redeemed not with corruptible things, such as silver and gold, but by the precious blood of Christ." You put your lancet into the arm of our holy religion and withdraw the blood, and you leave it a mere corpse, fit only for the grave. Why did God command the priests of old strike the knife into the kid, and the goat, and the pigeon, and the bullock, and the lamb? It was so that when the blood rushed out from these animals on floor of the ancient tabernacle the people should be compelled to think of the c ing carnage of the Son of God. No blood no atonement.

"Oh," says some one, "the thought of blood sickens me." Good. God intended it to sicken you with your sin. Do not act as though you had nothing to do with that Calvarian massacre. You had. Your sins were the implements of torture. Those implements were not made of steel, and iron, and wood, so much as out of your sins. Guilty of this homicide, and this regicide, and this deicide, confess your guilt to-day. Ten thousand voices of heaven bring in the verdict against you of guilty, guilty. Prepare to die, or believe in that blood. Stretch yourself out for the sacrifice, or accept the Saviour's sacrifice. Do not fling away your one chance.

It seems to me as if all heaven were trying to bid in your soul. The first bid it makes is the tears of Christ at the tomb of Lazarus; but that is not a high enough price. The next bid heaven makes is the sweat of Gethsemane; but it is too cheap a price. The next bid heaven makes seems to be the whipped back of Pilate's Hall; but it is not a high enough price. Can it be possible that heaven cannot buy you in? Heaven tries once more. It says: "I bid this time for that man's soul the tortures of Christ's martyrdom, the blood on his temple, the blood on his cheek, the blood on his chin, the blood on his hand, the blood on his side, the blood on his knee, the blood on his foot—the blood in drops, the blood in rills, the blood in pools coagulated beneath the cross; the blood that wet the tips of the soldiers' spears, the blood that plashed warm in the faces of his enemies." Glory to God, that bid wins it! The highest price that was ever paid for anything was paid for your soul. Nothing could buy it but blood! The estranged property is bought back. Take it. "You have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money." O atoning blood, cleansing blood, life-giving blood, sanctifying blood, glorifying blood of Jesus! Why not burst into tears at the thought that for thee he shed it—for thee the hard-hearted, for thee the lost?

"No," says some one; "I will have nothing to do with it except that, like the enemies of Christ, I put both my hands into that carnage and scoop up both palms full, and throw it on my head and cry: 'His blood be on us and on our children!'" Can you do such a shocking thing as that? Just rub your handkerchief across your brow and look at it. It is the blood of the Son of God whom you have despised and driven back all these years. Oh, do not do that any longer! Come out boldly and frankly and honestly, and tell Christ you are sorry. You cannot afford to so roughly treat him upon whom everything depends.

I do not know how you will get away from this subject. You see that you are old out, and that Christ wants to buy you back. There are three persons who come after you to-day: God the Father,

God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost. They unite their three omnipotences in one movement for your salvation. You will not take up arms against the Triune God, will you? Is there enough muscle in your arm for such a combat? By the highest throne in heaven, and by the deepest chasm in hell, I beg you look out. Unless you allow Christ to carry away your sins, they will carry you away. Unless you allow Christ to lift you up, they will drag you down. There is only one hope for you, and that is the blood. Christ, the sin-offering, bearing your transgressions. Christ, the surety, paying your debts. Christ, the divine Cyrus, loosening your Babylonish captivity.

Would you not like to be free? Here is the price of your liberation—not money, but blood. I tremble from head to foot, not because I fear your presence, but because I fear that you will miss your chance for immortal rescue. This is the alternative divinely put: "He that believeth on the Son shall have everlasting life; and he that believeth not on the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." In the last day, if you now reject Christ, every drop of that sacrificial blood, instead of pleading for your release as it would have pleaded if you had repented, will plead against you.

O Lord God of the Judgment day! avert that calamity! Let us see the quick flash of the cimeter that slays the sin but saves the sinner. Strike, omnipotent God, for the soul's deliverance! Beat, O eternal sea! with all thy waves again the barren beach of that rocky soul, and make it tremble. Oh! the oppressiveness of the hour, the minute, the second, on which the soul's destiny quivers, and this is that hour, that minute, that second!

Some years ago there came down a fierce storm on the sea-coast, and a vessel got in the breakers and was going to pieces. They threw up some signal of distress, and the people on shore saw them. They put out in a lifeboat. They came on, and they saw the poor sailors, almost exhausted, clinging to a raft; and so afraid were the boatmen that the men would give up before they got to them, they gave them three rounds of cheers, and cried: "Hold on, there! hold on! We'll save you!" After awhile the boat came up. One man was saved by having the boat-hook put in the collar of his coat; and some in one way and some in another; but they all got into the boat. "Now," says the captain, "for the shore. Pull away now, pull!" The people on the land were afraid the life-boat had gone down. They said: "How long the boat stays. Why, it must have been swamped and they have all perished together." And there were men and women on the pier-heads and on the beach wringing their hands; and while they waited and watched, they saw something looming up through the mist, and it turned out to be the life-boat. As soon as it came within speaking distance the people on the shore cried out: "Did you save any of them? Did you save any of them?" And as the boat swept through the boiling surf and came to the pier-head, the captain waved his hand over the exhausted sailors that lay flat on the bottom of the boat, and cried: "All saved! Thank God! All saved!" So may it be to-day. The waves of your sin run high, the storm is on you, but I cheer you with this Gospel hope. God grant that within the next ten minutes we may row with you into the harbor of God's mercy. And when these Christian men gather around to see the result of this service, and the glorified gathering on the pier-heads of heaven to watch and to listen, may we be able to report all saved! Young and old, good and bad! All saved! Saved for time. Saved for eternity. "And so it came to pass that they all escaped safe to land."

LIGHTNING EXTINGUISHED A FIRE.

C REMARKABLE incident of damage being checked by the agent which caused it, is reported by the Journal of Lewiston, Me. It says that in a recent thunder storm a barn at South Windham, was struck by the electric fluid and one end of it was broken down and set on fire. Instead of going to earth the fluid followed the service-pipe supplying the building with water and entered the main pipe running to Portland, making a large hole in it. The heavy pressure sent the water over the ridge-pole of the building, and extinguished the fire. Ministers and Christian workers have often witnessed spiritual phenomena, of which this incident is a type. The Holy Spirit often uses the Word of God to cause poignant distress and again uses the same Book to heal the wounds it has made, by revealing Jesus the Saviour from sin and eternal death. (Gal. 3:24.)

A STRANGE REUNION.

A BROTHER and sister were reunited under romantic circumstances, in New Haven, on July 25. In 1870 a gentleman and his wife, who resided in Baltimore, Md., were in Chicago on a visit. They had with them their two children—a girl of ten years of age and a boy of two. The father was seized with paralysis and died before the visit to Chicago terminated. The mother placed the two children in a school, temporarily, while she settled up her husband's affairs and decided on a new place of residence, more in accord with her changed circumstances. Before the business was done she, also, died very suddenly. The children were thus orphaned, and when the great fire occurred and the school was burned, the teachers of the school did not know who were the children's nearest relatives. They were finally adopted by two different families. The boy attracted the notice of a trainer of wild animals who, needing a child to assist him in some of his sensational performances, asked for and obtained possession of the boy. Meanwhile, the family who adopted the girl removed to Oshkosh, Wis. The trainer took the boy around the country with him using him in his exhibitions. He died a few months ago in New York, but, shortly before the end, he called the boy, then a fine young man twenty-two years old, and told him all he knew of his history. Then inquiries were set on foot for the missing sister. The result was the discovery of her in Wisconsin. She was delighted to hear that her brother was still living and she immediately set out for the East, and met him in New Haven after a separation of twenty years. She was not like those who even after they have heard that their Elder Brother is seeking them, with a heart full of love, to save them from endless misery, are careless of his appeals. (Heb. 2:17.)

TELL-TALE TATTOOING.

NEARLY two years ago a young man earning good wages as a lithographer made the acquaintance of a Brooklyn girl. They were attached to each other from their first meeting and eventually became engaged. The young man having satisfied the girl's parents of his steady habits and his ability to support a wife, they gave their consent to the engagement. He visited her frequently, took her to various entertainments and proved himself a most devoted lover. As an evidence of his sincerity and fidelity he had the back of one of his hands tattooed with a star and an anchor, which, as he explained to the girl, was intended to indicate that she was the star to which all his hopes were anchored. Anew he vowed that he would be true to her as long as the marks endured. Early this year, however, his manner toward the girl grew cold; his visits became more rare and finally ceased altogether. He was sought but could not be found. As there was ground for a criminal charge, the matter was put in the hands of the police, but they, too, were unable to trace the missing lover. On the night of July 26, however, the detective who had charge of the case was in New York and noticed two young men standing in the strong light of an electric lamp. One of them rested his hand on the shoulder of the other as they talked. That hand bore the tattoo marks which the detective relied on as a means of recognition and he promptly arrested the owner of the hand. The culprit doubtless wishes, by this time, that he had obeyed the Levitical law which forbade tattooing, (Lev. 19:28) as it led to his identification. The time is coming when a mark on the hand or the forehead will bear an infinitely more serious signification. It will identify those who serve Antichrist (Rev. 13:16,) and those who are faithful to God. (Rev. 14:1.)

CAPSIZED SHIPS.

NEARLY every incoming vessel which has reached New York during the past month has reported having passed some derelicts tossing about the North Atlantic. The peculiarity of the reports lies in the fact that nearly every one of the wrecked vessels is reported as floating bottom up. The cause that induces a craft that is built to float keel downward to assume the unnatural attitude of pointing it to the skies as soon as abandoned, is a point on which sea-faring people widely differ. It is easy enough to comprehend how an abandoned and helpless vessel, drifting at the mercy of wind and wave, can be thrown on her beam end and even entirely capsized when struck broadside on by an Atlantic wave. But why subsequent waves do not send them back to their normal floating position appears to be a vexed question. Various causes have been assigned for the fact, but seafaring men do not agree as to the true one, though all testify as to the fact. The same peculiarity is observed in human derelicts. They can never right themselves, nor can they be righted by the tides of dissipation which have overturned them. Only when the power of God is exercised in answer to prayer do they regain their proper position. (Micah 7:19.)

A LAW ABUSED.

A LARGE number of persons who have gone to South Dakota to take advantage of its lax divorce law are in consternation at the decision pronounced in a recent case by Judge Aikens. It appears that there is no state in the Union, in which legal residence may be acquired in so short a time and in which divorces may be obtained for trivial causes. The law has been on the statute books for nineteen years, and was enacted by the Territorial Legislature in its early days for the purpose of inducing immigration to the then sparsely-settled prairies of South Dakota, and the act of granting divorces on such a short period of time contemplated that the applicant would remain a resident of the Territory and contribute to the building up of the then thinly-settled commonwealth. But it has been found that husbands and wives from the East, who wish to be divorced go there, stay the required time, obtain the divorce and then go back to the East, thus defeating the object of the law. Judge Aikens, whose Court is in Sioux Falls, where several well-known women are now waiting for a decree, dismissed a suit a few days ago, and in doing so notified the bar that petitioners whose evident intention it was to leave the state, when they accomplished the object for which they came, would get no relief from him. The law was for the benefit of bona fide citizens not for strangers. Other judges have endorsed his action and will follow his example. They appear to have just ground for complaint. Ministers of Churches have often been imposed upon in a similar way. Men and women have obtained admission not because they have been converted and desire to remain and work for Christ, but to gain business advantages, or social status, which object accomplished they neglect their duties and show no interest in the prosperity of the Church. Like the Jews who followed Christ, they seek him not for salvation from sin, but for the loaves and fishes. (John 6:26.)

THE BREAD OF LIFE.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 23, By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 6 : 26-40. Golden Text, John 6 : 34.

AFTER the miracle of the loaves, Jesus "departed again into a mountain himself alone." It is the instinct of a truly spiritual life to be much alone with God: it is the flesh, the natural man which is more at home with fellow Christians than with God himself. In the life of Jesus, everything was prepared beforehand with his Father, and after his mighty works had taken place, Jesus had no desire to tarry where he might perceive the impression they made on man, he was but an instrument acting for his Father.

The need of his disciples in their peril on the lake recalled him, and he went to them, walking on the water. But the very men who had seen him multiplying the loaves, had so little comprehended him that it never struck them he could command the sea also: "They considered not the miracle of the loaves, for their heart was hardened." (Mark 6: 52.) They were occupied with the miracle rather than with him who worked it, and

Jesus has no more to Them

than before. It is an easy work to Jesus to subdue the elements; the hearts of his disciples offer him the most resistance. "They willingly received him into the ship," and his presence effected a wonderful work; winds, waves distance, and all but the unbelief of the disciples yielded before him, "and immediately the ship was at the land whither they went. Jesus in the ship, Jesus in the meeting, Jesus in the family life, Jesus in the undertaking which we may have in hand, and all is changed, distance, time, natural law all things bow before him.

The multitudes which had been miraculously fed by Jesus were unwilling to lose sight of him. They had seen the disciples embark alone, and yet, although Jesus did not accompany them, he was no longer to be found on the Decapolis side of the sea, nor had any other boat left their shore by which he could have sailed; all was mystery to them. So they "took shipping, and came to Capernaum seeking for Jesus," and, in their eager curiosity they asked him, "Rabbi, when camest thou hither?" Jesus can read hearts; if these people sought the Messiah they must be ### Brought to Reality.

Jesus said to them, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled." "Speaking the truth in love!" (Eph. 4 : 15.) Oh how far men will go to derive a little temporal advantage. Jesus says, "Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you."

From self-advantage the people turn to self-effort, from what can we get? to what can we do? "What shall we do that we might work the works of God?" "This is the work of God that ye believe on him whom he hath sent," the Person, the Messiah, whom they were ignoring in their pursuit of temporal gain. "What sign showest thou?" What sign? Had they not eaten of the miraculous supply, and could they, after that, want a sign? Oh how blindly unbelieving is the heart of man? "Our fathers," they say, "did eat manna in the desert." They are after the bread, the means of living, the necessities of time, that which men call the main thing. Jesus has been speaking of "meat which endureth unto everlasting life." But the people's conceptions rise no higher than the things of time and sense, and while they speak of the bread from heaven which God gave to their fathers in the wilderness, they have no eyes to see the same divine hand in the multiplication of the loaves. Jesus says to them, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven." Moses was but an instrument, "but my Father giveth you"—now in the present moment "The true Bread from heaven; for the Bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven and giveth life unto the world."

Like the woman of Samaria, the people make a direct request, "Lord, evermore give us this bread." And to them as to her

Jesus Declares Himself

as the "I am." "I that speak unto thee am he," he had said to her; "I am the Bread of life," he says to them; "He that drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst," he says to her; "He that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst," he says to them. But O how different was the result! The woman of Samaria, sinful, defiled by sin as she was, bowed before Jesus as a Prophet, even before he declared himself as the Messiah, and no sooner had he made himself known to her, than she instantly surrendered, left her water-pot, left her past, and went forth to tell of Jesus! Those men, on the contrary, saw no Prophet in Jesus, and he must needs say to them; "But I said unto you, that ye also have seen me, and believed not. All that the Father giveth me shall come to me, and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Mary Magdalene was not cast out, the woman taken in adultery was not cast out, the thief on the cross was not cast out, the Peter who denied him was not cast out. But these poor unbelieving ones were casting themselves out, judging themselves unworthy of eternal life, (Acts 13 : 46,) seeking first what they should eat and what they should drink, instead of seeking "first the kingdom of God and his righteousness."

The Jews were entirely earthly in their conception, they could not understand a life within which was sustained by something beyond time and sense, they "murmured," and said, "Is not this Jesus, the Son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? How is it then that he saith, I came down from heaven?" Jesus reminded them of their own Scriptures which pointed to direct communication from heaven. It is written in the prophets, and they shall be all taught of God and from this he spoke of how the Father should draw to him those who had heard and learned of the Father. Those who were really true to Old Testament light should be ready to receive their Messiah. But all this was out of their sphere. They wanted to materialize everything, and reduce everything to logic, refusing to believe everything which was beyond the little compass of their experience. O how many are there like them,—men who want to master divine things, to master God's Word, to reduce God's Spirit to system, because they are too earthly, too bound up in their own self-life to understand things divine!

But the mystery of godliness will ever remain a mystery to the natural man. There was something revolting to human conception in the idea, materially considered, that Jesus should give himself for food. "How can this man give us his flesh to eat?" And the answer did not enlighten them. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him." And yet, to the spirit taught of God, how inexpressibly blessed is this truth! Jesus explains it to the hearing heart in the words, "As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father; so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me." Just as there are capacities in our outward natural bodies to take in food, and thereby to replenish the waste and exhaustion of the outward system, so "the hidden man of the heart," the "life hid with Christ in God," possesses the capacity to take in Christ, the Word made flesh, and thereby to recuperate the powers of the inner man. Jesus is "the Bread of life." The manna in the wilderness could not save from death. "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead" (vers. 49, 58), "he that eateth of this bread shall live forever." "This is the bread which cometh down from heaven that a man may eat thereof, and not die."

If our life is sustained by excitement, by religious preachers, by anything short of Christ himself, the elements of eternity are wanting. But to understand this truth, we must live it. "Walk as children of light . . . proving what is acceptable unto the Lord." (Eph. 5 : 8, 10.)

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

LABOR not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life. The first step in the right direction is to realize that we have a soul as well as a body, and that the body is mortal but the soul immortal.

Life is real; life is earnest,
And the grave is not its goal;
Dust thou art to dust returnest,
Was not spoken of the soul.

Yet we slave, worry, fret and scramble for the luxuries of this life, we set our hearts on rich raiment and sumptuous fare for these poor bodies of ours and neglect altogether the requirements of the soul. We look forward to the time when we can say: "Thou hast much goods laid up for many years. Take now thine ease, eat, drink and be merry," and like Esau we sell our spiritual birthright for a mess of pottage. Starved souls and pampered bodies are the result. Oh that God would open our eyes that we might see the folly of this course.

An old man took a Christian friend up to the top of his house, and, pointing with his hand, he said, "That is my land as far as you can see." He told him to look at the pastures for thirty miles around, and see the cows and oxen. "These are all mine," he said. He took him to another point and showed him houses and gardens and stacks stretching away, and said, "These are all mine." He then pointed to the town near by, where were large buildings, and said, "The whole of this is mine. I came to the West a poor boy, and have earned all this myself." When he got through, the Christian visitor said; "Well, what have you got up yonder?" The old man's countenance fell, and he asked, "What do you mean?" "What have you got in heaven?" "I haven't got anything there." "Is it possible a man of your ability, discretion, and prudence would enter eternity a pauper?" A few months from that time the man died as he lived. The world may say he was rich, but the Word of God says he was a fool.

This is the work of God that ye believe on him whom he hath sent. Realizing that we have an immortal soul, and that it is in danger of being lost, we must next believe "that God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life." When once we believe that, we will soon desire to know more about Jesus, and the more we know about him the more we will love him, and the more we love him the more we will desire to be like him and to re-live his life and re-exert his influence, for faith and works go hand in hand. But our ardor must not be so much greater than our opportunities that we fail to avail ourselves of them. There is more true Christianity in the quiet daily ministrations of a consecrated life than in waiting for some unusual opening to manifest our zeal on a wholesale scale.

A goldsmith, who was in the habit of throwing away the cotton waste used in wiping off machinery in his establishment was persuaded by a young man to permit him to remove the waste at stated intervals with a view to smelting out the particles of gold that adhered to it. The consideration was to be one-half the proceeds, but the goldsmith smilingly remarked that he did not think much would come out of it. Imagine his surprise on receiving a check for $120, at the end of the year as his share. So the Christian pilgrim who daily does some little deed of kindness will, at the end of the journey, be surprised to find how large in the aggregate are the riches which he laid up where moth doth not corrupt nor thieves break through and steal.

And I will raise him up at the last day. The day of days toward which all time is tending, for which all days are made, and in the light of which all other days shall fail. The great day when you and I shall stand at the judgment bar of God to render an accounting of our stewardship. It is coming—surely coming and well will it be with us if we then are prepared to meet our God. If you have not already begun your preparation for the last day, begin now—or it may be eternally too late. Better start early and make your calling and election sure. You cannot start too soon.

A young man with no indications of intellectual excellence graduated at the head of his class in the West Point Military Academy. Nobody had expected it and everyone was surprised. Being plied with inquiries as to the means he employed in accomplishing such great honor and distinction, he replied that from the first day he entered up to the last day of the course he always felt that everything would depend on the final examination, and immediately he applied himself with all diligence to acquire himself nobly on that occasion. Whenever he felt tired or when tempted to indulge himself, he always remembered the final examination and that nerved him to renewed effort and increased consecration to the work in hand. And thus by constant application he finally mastered all difficulties and surmounted all obstacles. What an example for the Christian to follow! The Lord graciously help us evermore to remember the great final examination at the last day.

THE TWO HOMES.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for August 23. John 6 : 34. "Lord, evermore give us this bread."

WHAT is to be done with the two children? That was the question under discussion in a family council sitting in the parlor of a desolated home, from which that morning a casket had been carried containing the remains of a widow who had survived her husband only a few weeks. The children in question—Helen and Arthur Edgerton, were in another room, cowering together, and scarcely realizing the extent of the loss they had sustained. Helen, two years the elder, was trying to comfort her brother, to whom she was to be mother and sister both, as she had promised her mother she would be. "You will be a good boy Arthur and always love me and do what I wish you," she was saying. "And you will go to school regularly and not make yourself dirty playing with bad boys."

"I'll be good Helen, never fear, and mind what you say. I promised mamma I would. I shall soon grow-up and then I can take care of you. Brothers always take care of their sisters when their papas are dead."

In the other room a different arrangement for the two orphans was being made. Mr. Dundas, the brother of the dead mother, was explaining his plan. He was a wealthy dry-goods merchant who, having started with a little borrowed capital, was now "good for a million." He considered that his sister married beneath her station, but that did not prevent his being affable to the brother of her deceased husband, who also was present in the family council. This Mr. Edgerton was a poor man—only a proof-reader in a city printing-house, with a salary so small that his wife had great difficulty in making it cover the expenses of their growing family. The two men were the nearest relatives the children had and Mr. Dundas proposed that each should take one of the children. He prided himself on always doing his duty but as he used to say he had found, through life, that it was foolish to do more than his duty, or other people took advantage of you. Otherwise, he would have taken both children. He could afford to do so, if he chose, he was happy to say.

Mr. Edgerton thought it was a pity to separate the children. Now that their parents were dead they would be lonely anyway, and they would need each other. He should like to take them both—here he caught a warning look from his wife's eye—but he could not afford it.

"Well then," said Mr. Dundas, "that is settled. My wife would like the girl. I suppose that will suit you, Mr. Edgerton?"

Mr. Edgerton agreed, but repeated that he "thought it was a pity to separate the poor things."

The "poor things" were called in and informed of the decision with regard to them. Helen had her arm around Arthur's shoulders and she looked timidly from one to another as the plan was explained.

"Oh, I cannot do that," she said, when she understood it; "I promised mamma to look after Arthur. I will not live away from him."

"Little girls must not say they will not do anything," said Mrs. Dundas. "Arthur will not need you. His aunt Edgerton will take good care of him and you will live with me in my nice home. It is all settled."

Arthur had not spoken. He left the pleading to Helen's superior discretion, but his aunt's decisive tones scared him. He threw his arms around his sister and wailed, "O, I can't bear it."

The childish cry of despair touched several hearts in the family council. Mrs. Edgerton's eyes filled and she nodded to her husband. "I guess we will take them both," he said. "We can't afford it very well, but God will help us to provide for the orphans."

Mr. Dundas would have readily consented to this change of plan, but for one consideration. What would people say of him if with all his wealth he allowed his sister's children to be supported by their poor uncle. "No, no," he said, "I expect you find things a pretty tight fit as it is. You cannot afford to keep them. My wife and I will take them both till this trouble wears off a bit, and they can come to you when Mrs. Dundas goes to the mountains in the summer."

So it was settled. The two children packed up their childish treasures and departed with their uncle and aunt for the merchant's splendid mansion.

It was not a happy life they led there. Truth to tell, it was not a happy home for any of its inmates. Mr. Dundas provided money lavishly and considered that having done so much, he had done his duty. He was arbitrary in his rule, and when irritated, took delight in making all around him suffer. Nor were the children more happy. They quarrelled with each other, were arrogant with the servants and in spite of their advantages were growing up ignorant and uncultured. The bread of dependence in such a household could not be anything but bitter.

From the outset Helen and Arthur were made to feel that they were not on an equality with their cousins, and that they ought to be very grateful for having so grand a home. The winter passed drearily and the spring found them looking dull and depressed and spiritless.

"Helen," said Mrs. Dundas, one morning, "I have a letter from your aunt Edgerton. She is ready to receive you. We shall be busy preparing to go to the mountains now, so I think you and Arthur had better go this week."

"Rather poorer quarters than you have had here, my girl," said Mr. Dundas. "I suppose you will have enough to eat, but it will be as much as they can do. It is lucky for you that both your uncles are not poor. We'll send for you again in the fall."

The Edgerton home did seem small and poor to the children when they arrived. But Mrs. Edgerton kissed them both and gave them a hearty welcome. "We can't do as much for you as your Uncle Dundas," she said, "but we will try to make you happy."

There was no doubt about the Edgertons being poor, but none of the family seemed depressed by the fact. The children helped their mother about the household work; the mother was uniformly cheerful and kind.

"Are you very poor, Uncle?" Arthur asked one day when he and one of his cousins were walking with Mr. Edgerton in the public park. A handsome carriage had just passed, and Mr. Edgerton had lifted his hat in salute of its occupants.

"Oh, yes, my boy; I am poor but I manage to get along, thank God."

"Uncle Dundas says you have hardly bread to eat," continued the boy. "You do have enough, don't you?"

"I have bread to eat he knows nothing of," was the reply. "A wise man said once that a contented mind was a continual feast. I fancy I have that kind of feast, and it is very satisfying."

Arthur told Helen about this when he got home, as he told her everything. "What do you think uncle meant, Helen?" he asked.

"I am not sure," said Helen. "I will ask Aunt Edgerton."

"When a man loves God and trusts him about everything," Mrs. Edgerton said, "he is at peace. He does not fret and worry, because he knows God is caring for him. God supports him, and blesses him, and keeps him happy. That is what your uncle meant by having bread to eat that some people knew nothing of."

Helen gave the explanation to her brother. "Well," he said, "Uncle Edgerton is a deal happier than Uncle Dundas. And it is a good deal better here. We are all happier. I would sooner be poor like Uncle Edgerton, and as happy as he is, than be as rich as Uncle Dundas and be always fretting and worrying."

"Would you, indeed, my boy?" said Mr. Edgerton, who had come into the room unobserved by the children. "There is no difficulty about it. Christ offers that bread I told you of to every one who really wants it, and if they will take it they will never hunger for wealth or fame or anything else. It satisfies them. If you and Helen want it, then pray to

THE TWO WITNESSES.

The Symbolical Meaning of their Persecution, Death, Exposure and Rapture.

BY MATTHEW HABERSHON.

HOWEVER we seek to ascertain the precise meaning of the resurrection and ascension of the two witnesses we ought not to keep out of our minds for a moment that it is an event which is to happen immediately preceding the dreadful sounding of the seventh trumpet, and, the consequent utter ruin of the ten kingdoms. They must, therefore signify something that can comfort with such a state of things. Whatever the deliverance is, and a very great and complete one it will be, it must be one that will rise above all the horrors of the seventh trumpet! And as if to mark its completeness the more, it is set in the highest contrast with the event.

It is first said, that at the end of the three years and a half of their sufferings, "the spirit of life from God entered into them; and they stood upon their feet." To perceive the full force of these words we must look back to where it is said, that they have been made war against, and overcome, and killed; and their dead bodies have lain publicly exposed, and not suffered to be put into graves! The death here spoken of is not a literal death, but must be such a death as a church can offer. In like manner must we consider the life to be such a resuscitation as a church can enjoy. As the former appears to signify the entire silencing or extinction of all profession whatever of the religion of the Gospel, attended with circumstances of extreme contempt and ignominy; so the mention of their standing upon their feet, not through any favor of man, but by "the Spirit of life from God" entering into them, carries with it the idea that in the first instance, at the end of the three years and a half, they will, through some wonderful Divine interposition, rise into favor and into power—that is, that they will not only recover their former position "standing again upon their feet," but in a manner and an attitude which will cause great fear to fall upon those who see them!

The expression, "The Spirit of life from God," is very strong and, I consider has a remarkable fullness of meaning. It is the same as is used in Genesis 7: 22, according to the marginal reading. "All in whose nostrils was the breath of life died." It ought to convey to us, whom it so personally and so nearly concerns, an inexpressibly delightful and cheering feeling, that let the enemies of truth and revelation—the enemies of Christ and his saints—vent their impious rage as they may, and conceive, with that infidel Voltaire, that they have at length crushed that which is to them so great a torment, yet their rage is vain and their triumph but short. The Lord's witnesses shall be reanimated with the Spirit of life from God, and stand upon their feet, to the inexpressible confusion and dread of those who hate them; and even in this respect the Lord will vindicate his injured servants.

But a higher award, a nobler triumph than any earthly honor, enjoyment, or any earthly privileges, awaits them! They not only arise again into existence and to consideration, and that to the utter confusion of their enemies: but intimation, in some clear, unequivocal manner, is given them from heaven. They heard, it is said, a loud voice from heaven, that they are to ascend thither; for this loud voice in whatever way it is conveyed, said to them, "Come up hither." There is room for no mistake here, with regard to the language used: the voice was from heaven! the heaven of heavens, where God resides! and it will bear no other meaning. It can be no political heaven; not only this word as used in other places forbids the idea (Rev. 10: 4; 14: 2, 3), but the circumstances which surround it render it impossible. The political heaven, or ruling power consists of those who have been the cause of all the church's sufferings and they now behold its resurrection to political life with "great fear" and therefore cannot have contributed to it. But as if to show that political honor cannot be meant by this great and loud call from heaven the former verse, as above explained, shows they have already attained it. It must be, therefore, that this expression refers to an extraordinary scene; to that most extraordinary scene which we infer must take place from the whole above

A GOOD START.

Truthfulness and Purity.*

GIVE the first place to stern truthfulness. No prevarication; no innuendoes; no shams. Let the strict truth be spoken at all times and at all costs. Not this only; for a lie may be acted as well as spoken. There may be as big a falsehood in omission, or in concealment, as over-statement. As an old Latin proverb has it, "Suppressio veri suggestio falsi," i.e., the suppression of the truth is the suggestion of a lie. Let your word be as good as your oath any day; your promise as valuable as your bond. You are already of consequence in the world, if it is known you can be implicitly relied upon. Strict fidelity is an article of high commercial value. You may have a pleasing address, good manners, and any amount of brain; all that is worth little, if absolute confidence cannot be placed in you. Loathe an untruth as you loathe death. Be jealous of any weakness on this point of character. Stamp it out, if it exists. Let there not be a trace of shuffling or slipperiness about you. Let your employer and your landlady feel you are as true as steel. Be always and sternly exact to your word. Such a reputation is better than great riches.

Again, let your name be a synonym for purity. Let your character, like Caesar's wife, be above suspicion. Have such an abhorrence of the lewd, the vile, the base, that the veriest hint of a charge against you will rebound and fall harmless at your feet.

The Lover of Pleasure.

The inordinate craving for excitement has much to do with the ruin of some young men. The dull routine life of the shop or office they cannot brook. They want thrill, and dash, and sensation. If danger mingles with it, so much the better. A Blondin on the tight-rope; an aeronaut dropping from the skies with a parachute; a Jehu mounted on a fiery charger—these are the sights they like to look upon.

It has been the same in every age; but we should have learned more wisdom by this time of day. "Bring in the giant," shouted three thousand men and women in the temple of Dagon at Gaza. Poor Samson had already had his eyes put out; but they thought he would afford them merriment, and so we read in the Book of Judges that "it came to pass when they were merry, they said, Call for Samson, that he may make us sport. And they called for Samson out of the prison-house; and he made them sport; and they set him between the pillars;" a passage I quote, as almost the only other in Scripture where the peculiar word in our text is employed. Wild, coarse, exciting, sensational pleasure. And—they got it, too. But hear the end of the story. Samson took hold of the two pillars on which the house stood, "and he bowed himself with all his might;" and down came the great building with a crash, burying the whole company in the fatal ruin.

Ah! one moment, mirth, and madness, and shouting, and laughter; the next, three thousand bruised and bleeding corpses.

Such, full often, is the end of riotous pleasure—disappointment, disaster, death. Did you ever know a young man turn out well who read French novels, purchased vile photographs, gave all his spare time to billiards, was enthusiastic on pugilism, and was well up in all the leading horse races?

The Fascination of Gambling.

How it grips the soul like a demon and blunts every feeling of humanity, is illustrated by the anecdote that Walpole tells, of a man who at a gambling-table fell down in a fit of apoplexy, whereon his companions instantly began to bet upon the chances of his recovery; and when the physician came in, they positively would not allow him to minister to the sufferer, on the ground that it would affect the bet. Some of you may recollect that when a good many years ago, the Prince of Wales was lying dangerously ill at Sandringham, his life hanging in the balance, eavy stakes were laid upon the issue. In a recent notorious criminal case, when all the country was waiting with bated breath to know whether an unhappy woman was to go to the gallows, or to be reprieved, I saw it stated that, among a certain class of the population in Liverpool and elsewhere, large sums were staked upon the issue. Some years ago, when in the South of France, I went as a visitor to see that strange place—material paradise and moral hell in one—Monte Carlo, I peeped into the gambling saloon. What a picture! It haunts me still. What agony on those faces gathered around the green table! Hollow eyes, haggard looks, quivering nerves, the em-maddening lust of gain; may I never look on such a sight again! The floor was scarcely dry of his blood where a fashionable young man, having risked and lost his all, had blown out his brains with a pistol! Yet, as though nothing had occurred, these eager players went on with their infernal game!

Bad Company.

Young men, it is impossible for you to be too careful as to the set you are thrown amongst. One night of vile company may neutralize all the blessed influences of an early and pious home. That cynical laugh, that filthy innuendo, that corrupting story, that brilliant lie, may be the fatal poison that shall never be eradicated from your soul. Numbers have cursed to their latest hour the unhappy day when they were lured into the society of men who could do them no good, but only evil.

It was there they were first made acquainted with Agnostic philosophy so-called, and obscene literature; and were inoculated with the virus of rank infidelity. Probably hardened old sinners would have produced little effect upon them, or might even have awakened recoil; but the fact of these being youths of their own standing made their influence overpowering; so that all their pious impressions vanished; "the young men laid hold on them, and they fled."

An Old Legend.

There is an old legend of the Empress Helena, the mother of Constantine, how she went to the Holy Land in order to find the identical cross upon which our Saviour suffered. Excavations were made, and three crosses were found; but how were they to know which was the true one? They brought a human corpse and laid it upon each cross in succession, but as soon as it touched the cross of Christ, it started into life.

The fable may be a very foolish one, but it has its moral.

Ah! my dear brothers, believe me, it is only as you are brought in contact with Jesus Christ and with him as a crucified Saviour, that you know what true life is, and can spring to the ideal of a perfect manhood.

Let no meaner ambition possess you than, through the help of divine grace, to become altogether like your Lord, and to reach "unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."

Dying with him unto sin, and buried with him in the grave of self-renunciation, may you rise with him into the newness of a grander manhood; and after this period of earthly childhood and tutelage is over, may you awake amid resurrection glory, to find all that is weak and sordid left behind, and all your no-

THE UNFAITHFUL MOTHER.

THERE is a heathenish idea getting abroad in some of the families of Americans; there are mothers who banish themselves from the home circle. For three-fourths of their maternal duties they prove themselves incompetent. They are ignorant of what their children wear, and what their children eat, and what their children read. They intrust to irresponsible persons these young immortals, and allow them to be under influences that may cripple their bodies, or taint their purity, or spoil their manners or destroy their souls.

From the awkward cut of Samuel's coat you know his mother Hannah did not make it. Out from under flaming chandeliers, and off from imported carpets, and down the granite stairs, there has come a crowd of children in this day, untrained, saucy, incompetent for all practical duties of life, ready to be caught in the first whirl of crime and sensuality. Indolent and unfaithful mothers will make indolent and unfaithful children. You cannot expect neatness and order in any house where the daughters see nothing but slatternliness and upside-downativeness in their parents. Let Hannah be idle, and most certainly Samuel will grow up idle.

Who are the industrious men in all our occupations and professions? Who are they managing the merchandise of the world, building the walls, tinning the roofs, weaving the carpets, making the laws, governing the nations, making the earth to quake, and heave, and roar, and rattle with the tread of gigantic enterprises? Who are they? For the most part they descend from industrious mothers, who, in the old homestead, used to spin their own yarn, and weave their own carpets; and plait their own doormats, and flag their own chairs, and do their own work. The stalwart men and the influential women of this day, ninety-nine out of a hundred of them, came from such an illustrious ancestry of hard knuckles and homespun.

And who are these people in society, light as froth, blown every whither of temptation and fashion—the peddlers of filthy stories, the dancing-jacks of political parties, the scum of society, the tavern-lounging, the store-infesting, the man of low wink and filthy chuckle, and brass breastpins, and rotten associations? For the most part, they came from mothers idle and disgusting—the scandal-mongers of society, going from house to house, attending to everybody's business but their own, believing in witches, and ghosts, and horseshoes to keep the devil out of the churn, and by a godless life setting their children on the very verge of hell. The mothers of Samuel Johnson, and of Alfred the Great, and of Isaac Newton, and of St. Augustine, and of Richard Cecil, and of President Edwards, for the most part were industrious, hard-working mothers.

Now, while I congratulate all Christian mothers upon the wealth and the modern science which may afford them all kinds of help, let me say that every mother ought to be observant of her children's walk, her children's behavior, her children's food, her children's books, her children's companionships. However much help Hannah may have, I think she ought every year, at least, make one garment for Samuel. The Lord have mercy on the man who is so unfortunate as to have had a lazy mother!

FRETTING.

THERE are two ways of taking warm days. We can fret and fume and complain at the heat, look at the thermometer twenty times a day, and gaze in despair from the blistering pavement to the burning sky. We can be as miserable as we please, and all the palm-leaf fans in the world will fail to cure our unhappy tempers. On the other hand, we can accept the situation. We can avail ourselves of all the comfort there may be about us, and we can quietly go through our business, giving no thought, and certainly no aggrieved thought, to the heat. It would be very pleasant, of course, to spend midsummer days rocking in a boat, with the cool, salt spray blowing in our faces, or swinging in a hammock, lulled by the cradling murmur of the wind among the oaks. But if we must follow our duty-path, and it keeps us in a close office, or a closer kitchen, or wielding a hammer, or stitching at a machine, we shall make matters worse rather than better by continual self-be-moaning.

It is a glorious thing to have got where we can stand on the Apostle's platform, and say from the heart, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, to have learned to be content." In the end, a child of God is sure to conquer circumstances, however adverse, and it is a shame that any one, in whose nature are infinite possibilities, should let himself be conquered by any infelicities of passing life.

These warm days are so affluent, so abounding in vitality, though they drain us a little of our vital force, it is only to give it back by and by in larger measure. They are so rich in beauty. How many summer-dressed hill-sides, just now, are like roseate walls, carved in the coraline clusters of the laurel, from top to bottom, over all their dimpling slopes. How many lovely lakes laugh in the morning, under the white and golden glory of the lilies. How green and graceful are the ferns that grow in shadowy places. How sweet are the bird-songs, poured out through the soft expectancy of the dawn. In the city parks, how velvety are lawns and swards, close-clipped, and resting the eye with their verdure. And the dear little city gardens, so tenderly loved and cared for, how burdened they are with fuchsias, and heliotropes, and delicate mignonette, and lavish petunia. To say nothing of the growing corn, and the ripening fruit, and buckwheat, and the rye, what, on the score of the beautiful alone, should we do without the long warm days?

CORNERS IN LIFE.

PEOPLE talk nowadays of "getting corners" in grain and in gold. Corners are good things to get and to keep, if of the right kind, and obtained in the right way.

Chimney corners are cozy nooks. How expressionless some modern rooms are! Minus mantelpieces, stoves, fireplaces; heated by a register that you have to hunt for, unless it is red-hot. We are devoted to chimney corners, provided they are corners. One can find fellowship with a fire, even shut in a stove. But sometimes, as you get nicely settled, you find a door opening on your back; a cupboard door, swinging scarcely clear of your head, necessitating a running fire of apologies: "Excuse me." "Am I in the way?" "Not at all." "Let me move." "Don't be disturbed." And you conclude that corners are not always corners. Architects are not sufficiently considerate of such matters. Some rooms have no corners. We have lived in one such. It outvied the dining-room of the father of his country in one particular. While that had seven doors and one window, this had seven doors and two windows reducing by so much the chances for corners. We moved out of that house as soon as practicable, and we have adored corners ever since. In planning a house they are our first requisite. There is a charm about them. Comforts are prone to congregate there. The easy-chair, because the rockers will be out of the way; the baby's crib perchance, for the same reason; the family Bible, in easy reach; the knitting-work and the expressive little work-basket, with its burden of buttons and spools, its shining tools and its cheerful contrasts of snowy sewing and gay needle-book. Who does not feel the magnetism of even the memory of some corner? But we must not monopolize this desirable situation. Somebody may be ill at ease elsewhere. Grandpa with his paper and grandma with her work should never be crowded out.

The poet's corner in a country newspaper is coveted by many a sentimental miss. Round corners are preferable to square ones. The latter hurt the children's heads if tables are in question, and people's hearts, if the angles are in the temperament. A corner, in a large company, gives one opportunity for observation. Withal, it is not entirely pleasant to be completely cornered. "Puss in the corner" is a great institution with the children, and puss in the corner purring sleepily, a sedative for the grown people. What would a woman's letter be without these facilities for the inevitable postscript? Men laugh about it, and look for it, knowing that the items condensed in these happy afterthoughts are worth a dozen letters such as we prosy men write. But dearer than any of the aforesaid is that best of all corners, the one which you find has been kept warm for you, through years of trial and separation, in the heart of a friend. By-and-by the weary body will crave a little corner in some cheerful cemetery. Till then let us so live and labor that when our work is done we may not fail to secure a humble corner in heaven.

GOOD FOR NOTHING CHRISTIANS

THE Church needs a change in quality as well as quantity of membership. One half the professed Christians amount to nothing. They go to church. They have a kind regard for all religious institutions. But as to any firm grip of the truth, any enthusiastic service for Christ, any cheerful self-denial, any overmastering prayer, any capacity to strike hard blows for God, they are a failure. One or two things these half and half professors ought to do, either withdraw their names from the Church-roll or else go so near the fire as to get warm. Do you not know that your present position is an absurdity? You profess to be living for God and heaven, but all the world knows you are lying. Wake up! Do something before you are dead. Either help pull the Lord's chariot, or get out of the way. We want more old-style holiness, the kind they had before railroads, steamboats, and telegraphs. A consecrated heart is momentum for all Christian work. Your gun is well enough, but the gun-carriage is rickety, and so unfit for the Lord's battery. The Lord give us all a higher life, a deeper life, a broader life. We cannot do much toward saving others till we ourselves are more surely saved. We cannot pull others out of the surf when our own feet are slipping on the rock. More purity, more faith, more consecration will be more momentum.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Trustees of Union Theological Seminary, New York, have elected Rev. J. H. Worcester, D.D., of the Sixth Presbyterian Church, Chicago, professor of systematic theology, to fill the chair made famous by Prof. W. G. T. Shedd, which Dr. Henry Van Dyke accepted, but was prevented from filling by his death.

The managers of the American Bible Society at their regular meeting on Aug. 6, made grants of Bibles, Testaments and Portions, to the value of about $1,555, for distribution and sale in the United States, in South America, and in Africa. The issues from the Bible House in the month of July were 78,372 copies; issues since April 1st, 320,116 copies.

Major George A. Hilton has been laboring at Vancouver, British Columbia, on the invitation of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. A local journal says that a deep interest has been aroused in religion and temperance by his work. Bible readings, evening addresses and prayer-meetings were held every day during his visit. Some very remarkable conversions took place.

The following statistics of the Presbyterian Church (North) are taken from the official report published by the Observer: Presbyteries, 216; Churches, 7,070; Communicants, 806,796; Ministers, 6,223; Ordinations during the past year, 245; Contributions to Home Missions, $995,626; to Foreign Missions, $784,406. Both the latter items are largely in excess of previous years. The increase in the number of communicants during the year is 30,493.

The Trustees of St. John's Guild in New York, whose appeal on behalf of the Floating and Seaside Hospital fund we published recently, request us to acknowledge the receipt of contributions to the amount of $1,068.75. Additional contributions are earnestly solicited to maintain the work the Guild is doing in giving sea excursions and free quarters by the sea to the afflicted and destitute people of the city. They may be sent to W. L. Strong, Treasurer, 501 Fifth Ave., New York.

Miller Willis a noted Georgia Evangelist is dead. He was an eccentric preacher noted for his original modes of expression. His courage and devotion were extraordinary. He has been known to enter places where no preacher's life would be considered safe. Addressing the crowd of desperate and reckless men whom he would find there drinking or gambling he would utter some brief pointed warning and take his departure. Many wicked men have been led to repentance and change of life by his words.

Jewish refugees from Russia, are arriving in Palestine, says the Jewish Chronicle, in large numbers. In some weeks of late the arrivals from Odessa have numbered from two to three hundred families. Jerusalem is thronged with them. The majority of them are utterly destitute. The colonies founded by Baron Edmond Rothschild and the Alliance Israelite are giving a refuge to all they can accommodate, but a large number are homeless and in danger of starving. Every effort is being made to raise funds to help the unfortunate people but at latest accounts the distress was far beyond the means of the charitable people on the ground.

The Northfield Conference of Christian Workers held three sessions daily last week. Tuesday, Aug. 5th, was devoted to Foreign Missions and addresses were given by Drs. A. J. Gordon, A. T. Peirson, and several returned missionaries. The following day the subject was Home and City Missions and Evangelization. Saturday was given up to practical questions, such as, How to mark the Bible, how to handle enquirers, etc. Dr. L. W. Munhall's address on "The Highest Critics vs. the Higher Critics," was one of the most notable features of the Conference.

Rev. J. H. Chandler, writing to the Congregationalist reports a remarkable awakening in St. Paul, Minn. It has hitherto been considered one of the most hopeless cities on the continent so far as Sabbath observance is concerned; but a strong and influential Law and Order League was formed recently to prevent a prize-fight in the city, and the effort was so successful and elicited so much public support that it is extending its work to the observance of the Lord's Day, with good prospects of success. Roman Catholics and Protestants are working together in the effort.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

The New G. A. R. Commander—Suppressing the Lotteries—Disasters on the Rail—Sunday Ploughing Punished—England and the Fisheries—Domestic and Foreign Notes.

QUEEN Victoria's speech at the prorogation of Parliament, contained a reference to the negotiations between this country and Britain, regarding the seal fisheries in Behring Sea.

These negotiations, while far advanced, are not yet concluded, but the speech implies an expectation of their satisfactory termination. In the House of Commons, notice was given by Mr. William Randall Cremer, that at the next session he would introduce a resolution in favor of concluding a treaty between the United States and England, agreeing to submit all differences to arbitration where they could not be adjusted through the ordinary diplomatic channels. Mr. Cremer is a radical reformer and has become known through his efforts in the direction of substituting international arbitration in the place of war. He is a carpenter and joiner by trade and has been a prominent factor in recent labor agitation.

Woman and the World's Fair.

It is quite settled that the ladies will have a very notable representation at the approaching World's Fair. A Board of Lady Managers has been formed, with Mrs. Potter Palmer, of Chicago, as President, and already there are 115 members, representing every State in the Union. They are now superintending the erection of a fine edifice on the shore of Lake Michigan, which will be known as "The Woman's Building." It will contain an exhibit of paintings and sculptures by women; there will be a great library of female authors; a music room, in which no music other than that composed by the sex will be played; a model kitchen, with women cooks, of course; a hospital and a kindergarten. On the roof will be a flower garden, where the ladies can go to enjoy the cooling breeze from the lake, when the hot season comes. Mrs. Potter Palmer (whose portrait we give) is a native of Louisville and wife of the well-known Chicago millionaire. She is a woman of many accomplishments, somewhat literary in her tastes and with a great deal of public spirit. She has just returned from a foreign trip, during which she enlisted the sympathies and support of many foreign ladies of distinction for the Fair. In several of the principal cities abroad she organized committees of ladies (including a number of American ladies now in Europe) who are doing all they can to make the Fair project popular with the officials of the different countries. The Foreign Committee of the Fair, now in Germany, are greatly encouraged at the reception they have everywhere encountered. It now looks as though all the leading governments of Europe would be well represented in Chicago. To crown the encouraging news in this connection, it is said by Chancellor Caprivi, that Emperor William may go to Chicago next year to attend the opening of the Fair.

Disasters by Rail.

Four cars of the east-bound mail on the Ogdensburg and Lake Champlain Railroad were telescoped at Rouse's Point on August 5th, causing the death of five passengers and the mortal injury of a number of others. The mail collided with a Sunday School excursion train, and all the injured and killed were in the first car of the latter. On the same day, a serious accident occurred on the Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroad near Kalamazoo, Mich., in which a number of persons were injured by the ditching of a train. The 5th was also disastrously signalized by a cloud-burst which flooded Harrisburg, Pa., and a large part of the adjacent country. Hundreds of persons escaped from their flooded dwellings in boats, while live stock, pigs, chickens, cattle and horses were drowned in large numbers. The railroad tracks were under two feet of water for hours. Churches and school-houses were opened to shelter those temporarily homeless. On the 6th inst., ten persons, chiefly Italians, were killed and a number wounded by a collision on the West Shore Railroad, near Port Byron, N. Y. During a morning fog a passenger train dashed into a freight, and the two were almost completely wrecked. The broken cars caught fire after the crash, and the dead were almost cremated and many of the wounded badly burned in the flames.

Politics and the Lottery Evil.

THE Kentucky election, which took place last week, resulted in some surprises. The Farmers and Democrats have a majority in the Legislature, the Democrats carrying the State by about 40,000, defeating the Alliance. The new Constitution has 100,000 majority. John Young Brown for Governor and Mitchell C. Alford for Lieutenant Governor were elected. The People's Party ticket polled only a few thousand votes. The Legislature is strongly Democratic, the Farmer's Alliance having only fifteen members in the Assembly and four in the Senate. There is—in Kentucky at least—a distinction between the Farmers and the Farmers' Alliance, the former acting with the Democrats and without endorsing the Alliance platform. Acting together, however, the Farmers and Farmers' Alliance men could control both houses, as the rural element predominates in both. A great moral outcome of the election is the success of the new Constitution, which suppresses all lotteries, equalizes taxation, provides for needed reforms in cities and introduces the Australian system of secret ballot. In Louisiana, the Anti-Lottery Democrats and Farmers' Alliance have resolved to unite on a ticket at the coming election, and this combination will probably mean the suppression of the notorious Louisiana Lottery also. In Ohio, the Farmers' Alliance held a remarkable convention at Springfield, in which, after a six hours struggle a platform was adopted demanding many needed reforms and some that are radical, including the election of Senators by popular vote, the prohibition of alien ownership of land, universal suffrage, pensions to all honorably discharged soldiers of the late war, and government control of the entire liquor traffic as the only method of regulating the evil. John Seitz, formerly a Greenbacker, was named for Governor.

The New G. A. R. Commander.

AFTER a sharp struggle for the honor of Commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, the choice has fallen upon Gen. John Palmer of Albany, N. Y., who on August 6th, was chosen by the assembled Posts of Detroit as the successor of Gen. Wheelock G. Veazey of Vermont. Among the other candidates were Gen. A. B. Weissert of Milwaukee,

GENERAL PALMER

Gen. Henry A. Barnum of Brooklyn, and Gen. S. H. Hurst of Ohio. Gen. Palmer (whose portrait we give in this column) is the youngest of all the candidates. He entered the contest with the votes of his State, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Rhode Island, and Maryland already pledged in his favor. The Silver Jubilee of the G. A. R. brought from all parts of the country a great gathering of veterans, over 40,000 being in line at the grand march and parade which took place in Detroit on the 4th inst. In the National Encampment, many important questions were discussed affecting the welfare of the organization. The Commander-in-chief, General Veazey, in his annual report, stated the belief that there was greater need than ever of the Grand Army keeping the rival parts of the country together. He suggested a separate department for the colored Posts, but this encountered such opposition that the suggestion was not insisted upon. The report of the Adjt.-General showed 45 departments with 7040 Posts and 398,607 comrades in good standing. During the year, $333,699 were expended in charities, and 5,530 death claims were liquidated. Among the reports of committees was one embodying a bill to be presented at the next session of Congress, providing that every Union prisoner of war who spent not less than sixty days in a Southern prison, shall receive from the government two dollars for every day of his confinement. It was decided to hold the next annual encampment at Washington.

New York's New Collector.

ONE of the most important and influential offices the President has to fill is the Collectorship of the Port of New York. On several occasions this office has become a bone of national contention, as in the great struggle that resulted in the withdrawal of Senator Conkling from active political life. The retirement of Collector Joel B. Erhardt has been followed by the appointment by President Harrison of the Hon. J. Sloat Fassett as Collector. Mr. Fassett, who is a native of Elmira, N. Y., is 38 years of age and has been three times elected as State Senator, being the recognized leader of his party during the last two legislative sessions. His latest distinction was as chairman of an investigating committee that brought to light much of the misgovernment in New York City affairs. He is a warm friend of ex-Senator Thomas C. Platt and, during the last Presidential campaign, was secretary of the Republican National Committee. His portrait is given above.

The Rainmaking Machine.

FRANK MELBOURNE, of Springfield, O., the inventor of the machine which he claims will bring rain at will, says that each operation costs in the neighborhood of $400. It is gas that works on the atmosphere and brings the rain, the gas being liberated from the observatory through a four-inch pipe, extending from the machine twelve feet above the roof of the building. The machine itself is about the size of a small kitchen stove, and is used to mix chemicals which are converted into gas by heat and then liberated. Although Melbourne claims to have already produced rain on seven different occasions, there is no evidence that the machine, which he says cost him $15,000, has ever been successful. He observes as much secrecy about its actual working as there was surrounding the trials of the Keeley motor. He is anxious that the government should give him an opportunity to demonstrate the practical value of the machine, and offers to bring rain to order, if Secretary Rusk will fix a day and select the section in which he wishes it to fall. His process requires a day or two before the rain comes; but when it does come, it lasts several days.

A Sabbath-Breaker Punished.

A REMARKABLE trial took place before United States District Judge Hammond, of Obion County, Tenn., at Memphis, lately. R. M. King, who belongs to the sect known as Seventh Day Adventists, was tried and convicted on a charge of having ploughed a field on his farm on Sunday, the case coming under the State law prohibiting certain forms of labor on the sacred day. Eminent counsel was secured by the Adventists, Don M. Dickinson being of the number, and the case was appealed to the Supreme Court. The conviction was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State and the case was then taken on habeas corpus proceedings to the United States District Court, on the ground that the imprisonment of the accused was in violation of the Federal Constitution. This latest appeal was last week decided adversely. While the decision is based less on the constitutionality of the Sabbath law than upon the fact that King was regularly convicted under the State law of Tennessee, and therefore, not entitled to review by the Federal Court, Judge Hammond stated that it was not necessary to maintain that to violate this Sunday observance custom is of itself immoral, in order to make it criminal in the eyes of the law. While the prisoner, King, did not believe that God had set apart that day for rest and holiness, yet the Court held that if the State, representing the view held by its citizens, believed that the day should be set apart, the State law to that effect must be obeyed. The Sunday laws against labor have generally been sustained by the Courts in this country.

TRIALS OF THE SAINTS.

"They were tempted." Hebrews 11:37.

THE gracious characters of which we read in Scripture were not created by favorable circumstances: they owed nothing to their position, or age, their character was formed from within. Their faith was not produced by the tenderness of providence, they were not put into a conservatory like fair flowers which cannot endure the frost: rather might we say that they were helped to their robustness by the rough winter-blows which swept over them. They were warriors of peace: pilgrims who travelled armed to the teeth, making no holiday march, but contending with giants and dragons. Whoever else may find life a sport, the saints have found it to be real and earnest; their path has been no mere parade, but grim and grisly dangers have beset them; "they were stoned, they were sawn asunder, they were slain with the sword." One form of the opposition which they encountered is the subject of this morning's meditation—"They were tempted."

Dealing with this one form of opposition, "they were tempted," I shall be able to say a great many more practical things than if I were preaching upon "they were stoned," or "they were sawn asunder," for those things happen but now and then, but this record that "they were tempted" is repeated in us all, and especially in you who have lately set out on the heavenly pilgrimage.

I. First I will call attention to

The Universal Truth

of the statement now before us. All the people of God have been tempted to sin. Satan no sooner perceives a child of God renewed in heart and cleansed from defilement than he endeavors if he can to mar the work of the Holy Spirit, to ruin the happiness of the believer, and to weaken his usefulness by leading him into sin. Woe unto the man who is beset by the arch enemy, if he is not abiding in fellowship with the Lord Jesus. If the Lord be away from the believer it will go hard with him when Apollyon himself meets him in deadly duel. The fiend is stronger and craftier than we are, and unless the Lord cover our head in the day of battle we shall find his fiery darts too terrible.

Nor is it Satan alone who tempts the saints. The world is always tempting God's people, and there is no position in life which is free from peril. A man sick of the fever dreams that if he can be placed in another bed he shall feel better: it is but a dream. He turns and tosses to and fro upon his pillow, but as Watts well says,

It is a poor relief we gain

To shift the place but keep the pain.

In this mortal life we may change our position, but we shall never get away from temptation. Temptations are with kings upon their thrones, and with peasants at the plough: they come of plenty and they are born of success and they are born of defeat. Whether our path be rough or smooth we are liable to be tripped up unless a hand unseen shall hold us up. This is true of all who have gone before us—"They were tempted."

But, brethren, if there were no devil and if there were no wicked world it would still be true that the saints are tempted, for every man is tempted when he is "drawn away of his own lust, and enticed;" and there is that within the best of men which might make them into the worst of men if the grace of God did not prevent. Every good man is two men: he finds an I fighting against his real I; the old man, according to its corruptions and lusts, daily warring with the new-born man within him which cannot sin, because it is born of God. Now it is true, not only of you and me, but it has been true of all the people of God, that they have had inward conflicts and spiritual contests within themselves of the most painful kind.

Three Foes.

The saints were tempted: they were persuaded to sin by Satan, by the world, and by the propensities of their nature, and of all the blood-redeemed host it must be said, "they were tempted." Ought not this fact to restrain every man from a self-indulgent despair. Do you know what I mean? I mean this: a man says, "Well, I cannot help it; I am in such a place of temptation that if I give way I may well be excused." Not so, sir; "they were tempted," and yet they did not fall, but held fast their integrity. Using the same weapons, and helped by the same Spirit, your temptations, which are the same as theirs, will be overcome by you, even as theirs were vanquished by them: what has been done by one by the help of God can be done by another.

This fact that all the saints have been tempted should put an end to all murmuring upon that score. Somebody says, "Mine is a hard lot; I have to follow Christ under great disadvantages. My foes are those of my own household." Yes, your lot may be hard, but if you could just peep within the pearly gates and see that brilliant company, who are the peers of the realm of heaven, you would see none but those who once were tempted. Dare you demand a better lot than theirs? Remember your Master was tempted, and shall the disciple wish to be above his Master, or the servant above his Lord? Is there to be some easy by-road to heaven made for you, turfed from end to end, and rolled every morning? You must not expect it; you Must Fight if You Would Reign; carry the cross as others carried it, if you are like them, to wear the crown. The temptations which were endured by saints in all ages must for ever prevent our complaining if hooks are baited for us and snares laid for our destruction. One sweet thought arises here; since the best of saints were tempted this prevents our conceiving that to be tempted is in itself a sin. I have known feeble-minded Christians bemoan themselves and cry, "If I were not exceedingly sinful I should not have these hideous thoughts and dreadful suggestions: if my heart were not full of evil I should not have these blasphemous ideas forced into my poor unwilling brain." Beloved, it is not so. If your heart were wholly the devil's he might not care to worry you, and indeed you would not be worried, but would love sin. It is because you are not his, because you are desperately struggling towards holiness and virtue that, therefore, he tempts you. It is no sin to be tempted, the sin is in yielding to temptation. You are not a castaway because you are tempted, for all the saints in glory were tempted too.

Yea, I think, dear friends, if any of us here present meet with great trials in life, and with very strong temptations to turn back to the world, if God gives us grace to keep towards the New Jerusalem, we may even glory in these trials. If your name is slandered, or you become a loser in wage, or in estate, or in comfort for Christ's sake, you may greatly rejoice; for now you have fellowship with Jesus and his suffering followers. You are entering the confederacy of the bravest of the brave. Now shall you share in "that lordlier chivalry" which belongs not to mailed knights, but to spirits purified and ennobled by the Holy Ghost. These are the blessed ones who endure temptation, who when they are tried shall receive the crown of life which fadeth not away.

In Various Forms.

II. Secondly, let us consider the unlimited breath of the statement. "They were tempted": it does not say how. Brethren, the saints who are in heaven were tempted in all ways. They were tempted by threats, but they were equally tempted by promises. They were put into prison, or they were banished. They were deprived of their goods and of their good names, but they stood fast and firm, and would not yield up Christ, threaten as men might. Then they were tried by bribes: if they would forsake Christ, and turn from the truth, they should be rich and honorable, they should be restored to their families, they should have in some cases every indulgence which the monarch could grant. They were equally deaf to either form of solicitation: they could not be driven, and they could not be drawn: however the net might be spread they could not be taken in it. Against them the enemy has sent forth the arrow which flieth by day, and the pestilence which walketh in darkness, but the Lord has kept their soul alive, and they have glorified his name. Yet very sorely "they were tempted."

Common Trials.

They were tempted both with trials peculiar to themselves, and with trials common to us all. We are apt sometimes to say that this age is not congenial to the strength of grace, and I think there is truth in the remark. We are a set of dwarfs, and it seems hard to grow to the stature of a man in Christ Jesus in the atmosphere which daily surrounds us. We have fallen upon an evil age, in which principle is treated like a football in the streets, and bluster rules the hour; but then the ages in which saints lived long ago had their peculiar temptations too, and they were tempted. Every period since the world began has had its own form of spiritual danger; as weapons of war have changed so have temptations, but the old enmity remains. One age is dark, and ignorance would chill the heart; another is philosophical, and by its false wisdom would overlay the Gospel. The points from which the wind blows may differ, but it always blows against the servants of God who are voyaging to heaven. Say not therefore, O child of God, that others who lived before thee were not tempted as thou art, for they endured temptations which to them were as keen and as powerful as any which have fallen to thy share.

They had also special temptations arising out of their ### Individual Constitutions.

We have every one of us some one weak point. One man is not readily made angry, but he is too cold; another is sensitive, but he is too speedily wrathful. One man is full of love and affection, but he lacks decision; another is resolute, but fails in tenderness. Side by side with the special excellence of any character we usually discover a remarkable weakness, calling for great watchfulness; and of all those who are now in heaven it may be said they were tempted, tempted in some characteristic point, and with some besetting sin. Beloved, if you have to endure the same, mark that you follow a well-trodden path.

As they had their peculiar temptations so they had the common trials of the most ordinary life. Look at Abraham; not only does he stand alone in the sacrifice of Isaac, but he stands with us in our common afflictions. He is tried in his relatives: his nephew Lot is ungrateful to him and leaves him;

Tried in His Servants,

the family is set by the ears by Hagar; tried in his wife, for she complains against him wrongfully; tried in his children, for Ishmael mocks Isaac. His dwellings in tents brought with it quite as much of discomfort and trial as our dwellings in houses. Flocks and herds involve as much care as shops and workrooms. Just such domestic troubles as you and I experience were known to Jacob and David. One man is very like another, and nothing can be more unwise than to set up saintly men who lived ages ago upon a sort of shelf, as if they were unapproachable and inimitable, and belonged to a different race. These heroes are our brothers, their battles are our battles, their victory shall be ours.

III. I must now call your attention to

The Intensity of this Trial,

That I gather from the position of our text, which is very strange. They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with sword. It has seemed to commentators to be so singular that to be "tempted" should be as it were sandwiched in between "sawn asunder" and being "slain with the sword," that they have thought there must be an error in the text. Certainly at the first blush the words look rather out of place, but they are not so. If you live in a place where you hear little else but blasphemy from morning to night you will soon say, "I think I should prefer being in a prison to this." The cut of a whip or the wound of a sword would scarcely cause more pain than to hear the name of Jesus Christ profaned, and to see every holy and precious thing trampled on. When the ungodly persecute cruelly, as they can do even now without violating the law of man, they can tease and worry your very soul; they can embitter every morsel that you eat, make home to be a torture-chamber, and the work-room an inquisition. They will maliciously track you in all your steps with jests, and jeers, and slanders, and hard speeches, and make you live like Marcus Arethus, among the bees, which at last stung him to death. Alas for gentle, timid, loving spirits who have to endure such temptation.

I think Paul did well to put this here, not only because of the painfulness of it, but because of

The Danger of it,

for it is certain that by temptation of this insidious kind more professed Christians have been led away than ever were frightened from the faith by racks, or torments, or fear of death. I have known some unhappy cases where persons have been persecuted by their families for following Christ, and have stood up for him right manfully, so that I have felt great admiration for them for their consistent courage. I have lived to see those very individuals delivered from the yoke of bondage, able to start in life for themselves and to do exactly as they pleased, and, alas, soon after persecution ceased they have grown cold, and have forsaken the way of God. What a strange creature is man!

A Problem.

I want, in conclusion, to answer the question which naturally arises—Why then does God permit his people to encounter so much temptation? Why is the road to heaven so beset with foes? I answer that there are a great many replies to that question, for the Lord answers many designs at one and the same time.

First, persecution and temptation are a sort of sieve, to sift the Church of God. As it is, we have enough hypocrites among us, and if the way to heaven were strewn all along with loaves and fishes, we should have the devil himself going on pilgrimage. There must be these fiery persecutions, that the drossy hypocrites may be purged out. I warrant you there were in the catacombs, when to be a Christian involved almost certain death. They crept into their assemblies at the dead of night, and there gathered to sing hymns to the name of Jesus, and few were the traitors' tongues which joined in the singing. When in our own country any man who had a Bible must die for it, and therefore men hid their Bibles behind the wainscot, or under the floor-boards, few were very eager for Bible-reading. The mocking, the jesting, the jeering which goes on in the world is the sieve constantly moving to shake off the chaff and let the good wheat remain. If we could stop that winning fan we should hardly wish to do so.

Trial and temptation also discover the reality of conversion. Look at this. Here is a man ridiculed for his religion and for his sobriety. He will not touch a drop of the drink which formerly cast him down to his destruction, and therefore his fellow-workmen laugh at him. All sorts of epithets are hurled at him while he is at work. He goes to a place of worship on the Sunday, and for this to the last degree. Who is this man that bears this so patiently? Why the very man who, twelve months ago, could drink as much as any of them, and used to jeer at others; the very man who for twenty years before never entered the house of God. Now, the fact that he can stand against temptation is one of the very best evidences that he is born again and made a new creature in Christ Jesus.

Meanwhile, it does saints good; for painful as it is to them, it drives them to prayer. Many a man lives near to God in prayer who would not have done so if he had enjoyed an easier position. His prayerfulness strengthens him; his having to summon divine aid to sustain him under trial makes him grow in faith and in every grace, and he becomes a better Christian.

It seems to me the trials and temptations of this life are all making us fit for the life to come—building up a character for eternity. You have been in a piano manufactory: did you ever go there for the sake of music? Go into the tuning room, and you will say, "My dear sir, this is a dreadful place to be in; I cannot bear it; I thought you made music here." They say, "No."

We Do Not Produce Music
here, we make the instruments, and tune them here, and in the process much discord is forthcoming." Such is the Church of God on earth. The Lord makes the instruments down here, and tunes them, and a great deal of discord is easily perceptible, but it is all necessary to prepare us for everlasting harmonies up yonder. Have you thought what a wonderful creature man is—a perfect man, made fit to dwell in heaven—he is the last product of divine wisdom, the noblest work of God. It is a wonderful work for God to fashion such a creature. He begins to do it in regeneration, and continues the work in sanctification; and all the endurance of trial, and all the patience manifested by the tried ones, work together to prepare a character which can endure the strain of everlasting bliss, and perform the holy service incident thereto. It may be that all the afflictions and temptations which God permits to pass over us here below are forming us for eternal bliss. Thus is the corn ripening for the garner, the fruit mellowing for the basket. Here the graving-tool and the hammer bring out the beauties which shall shine in the courts of the Lord forever, when of us also the record will be written, "they were tempted."

BLIND BIBLE READERS.

How the Afflicted Ones are Taught to Read God's Word for Themselves.

It has been aptly said, in defining the distinction between the deaf-mute and the blind, that while the former has the realities without the symbols, the latter has the symbols alone, the realities being shut out from him forever. In recent years much has been done to mitigate the lot of these afflicted ones. Grand intellects, like those of Laura Bridgman, the deaf-mute and Henry Fawcett, the blind English statesman and author, are occasionally found that seem to acquire more lustre and purity under heavy affliction. These and many more show that the clouding of one or more senses does not necessarily impair the others; that, on the contrary, the remaining senses are quickened, the imagination particularly is cultivated and taught to supply the hiatus, and the spiritual nature is capable of a high degree of development.

In a former issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD described the methods adopted in teaching deaf-mutes to read, and in opening their minds and hearts to the influences of religion. Sight and motion were their educational channels. The blind, on the other hand, are reached through the senses of touch and hearing. While they are naturally more easily taught,

LEWIS B. CARLL,
The Blind Mathematician.

they experience an equal difficulty, where books are concerned. Unless they are expert in the use of the blind alphabet, all books are sealed volumes except when read to them by others.

But the education of the blind has made rapid strides in recent years and, except among the very poor and neglected, there is now a very small percentage of those afflicted who cannot read. To be able to study the Scriptures for themselves is to them an inestimable gift. One of the most interesting sights in the world is to see, in the Institute for the Blind, a class of pupils reading aloud from the Bible, each in turn tracing with the forefinger, the lines of the Holy Book. Trained to a degree of sensitiveness that seems incomprehensible, they read slowly, clearly, and with surprising accuracy.

The great source of the supply of Bibles for the blind is the American Bible Society, which has printed and distributed no less than thirteen thousand copies of the Psalms, the Gospel, and other portions of Scripture. The letters are raised or embossed, and each is so distinct from all the others as to be at once recognized by the finger. We give below a facsimile of the "Boston raised letter"—the type used in these editions for the blind.

our father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. thy kingdom come.

THE "BOSTON RAISED LETTER."

A benefactor who has conferred an invaluable boon on the blind is Mr. Wait, the Superintendent of the New York Institution for the Blind. If the inventor of the raised letter was the Cadmus, Mr. Wait certainly deserves to be designated as the Gutenberg of the sightless. He is the inventor of what is known as the "point-print" alphabet, which is the only alphabet read by many thousands of the blind.

It consists of a combination of dots and dashes, or "points," produced on stiff paper by a stencil, and resembling to some extent the forms used in Morse telegraphy. The writer makes his indentations on the back of the sheet, from right to left, and when the paper is reversed, the raised dots are distinguishable on its surface when the forefinger is passed across the sheet. This illustration will furnish an idea of the "point-print" system:

P I A N O T O N E

One of the most remarkable blind men in the United States is Lewis B. Carll, of Jersey, who, since the hour of his birth has never seen the light of the sun. A fine mathematician, a graduate of Columbia College, a master of the classics, a chemist and a musician, he is also what is better known than all—a man of sterling faith and piety. With the aid of the "point-print" alphabet he has written a notable work on mathematical questions, and has added to Mr. Wait's invention a series of new combinations to represent fractions and algebraic quantities. This profound scholar finds his blindness no bar to either mental or spiritual progress. His case is an illustration of the possibilities of the blind.

The late Jonathan Burr, of Chicago, left a legacy for the purpose of distributing the Bible among the blind, and by this plan the American Bible Society has been enabled to scatter the precious Word among the afflicted very widely. Last year 826 volumes for the blind were printed and distributed; the greater part gratuitously.

It is impossible to estimate the blessings that flow from a work of this character. A great majority of the blind are poor and unable to provide for themselves. Unlike Mr. Carll they are not gifted by nature with minds that rise superior to their affliction. Their patient, child-like faith and simple trust are increased and their lot in life made infinitely more bearable by the ability to read the Scriptures for themselves.

A WIFE'S REMORSE.

Two weeks ago a lady in Newark, N. J., went to Justice Hayes' court and made a complaint against her husband. She said that some time ago he met with business reverses and fell into a depressed state of mind. He had of late taken to drinking heavily and was now an habitual drunkard. She declared that she was afraid of him and begged the Justice to interfere. Her complaint was taken and a promise given that her husband should be restrained. A few days afterward she learned that her husband had been arrested and sentenced to imprisonment for thirty days. She thought he would have been sent to a home or a hospital for a week and was horror-stricken when she realized that her complaint had involved his imprisonment for a month. She returned to the court and begged the justice to release him, but he replied that the man was now beyond his jurisdiction, and she must apply to the Court of Pardons. This being a tedious process, the wife was much depressed and pathetically deplored her first hasty application to the court. She did not realize the consequence of her action until she found that it was irretrievable. Many persons are in sorrow from a similar cause. It is often better for us when God answers our prayers for the removal of a trial as he answered Paul's for the removal of his "thorn in the flesh," not by granting the petition, but but by giving more grace to enable us to bear it. (II. Cor. 12: 7, 9.)

THE WAITING TIME.

THERE are days of deepest sorrow
In the seasons of our life;
There are wild despairing moments,
There are hours of mental strife;
There are times of stony anguish,
When the tears refuse to fall;
But the waiting time, my brothers,
Is the hardest time of all.

We can bear the heat of conflict,
Though the sudden crushing blow,
Beating back our gathered forces,
For a moment lay us low;
We may rise again beneath it,
None the weaker for our fall;
But the waiting time, my brothers,
Is the hardest time of all.

Yet at last we learn the lesson,
That God knoweth what is best,
And a silent resignation
Makes the spirit calm and blest;
For, perchance a day is coming,
For the changes of our fate,
When our hearts will thank Him meekly
That He taught us how to wait.

SYMPATHY IN REPROOF.

A SUNDAY SCHOOL teacher, on seeing a young scholar misbehave, said to him: "I am sorry you did this, for I had formed a very good opinion of you." The boy went home and confessed to his mother that, if he had known what a good opinion his teacher had held of him, he would not have done wrong. Had the teacher said: "I have had my eye on you for some time, and now I've caught you," the boy would simply have been confirmed in his suspicion that no one expects a boy to do anything but the wrong thing. It ought to be a simple matter to show a child or a man that our first impulse toward him is one of trust rather than distrust. And when one has gone wrong, he will be better helped by our showing that we appreciate the fact that he has gone wrong in spite of the good we believed him capable of, rather than in accordance with our suspicions of him.

A BISHOP'S RETORT.

How completely Bible thought, Bible history and Bible language have entered into our public and social life has frequently been pointed out, and very justly, as an evidence of the divine origin of the Scriptures. It has long been a characteristic of English life also. An illustration of the fact is given in the life of a late bishop who apparently believed in Solomon's injunction to "answer a fool according to his folly lest he be wise in his own conceits."

The bishop in question speaking in the House of Lords against a certain measure, said: "It is not many months since I ventured to prophesy that this iniquitous bill would be brought forward. I am sorry that a prophecy delivered so much against my inclination, has been so soon and fully verified in all its points." An opposition lord, who was somewhat rough in his speech, replied: "That, as the reverend bishop had chosen to call himself a prophet, he knew only one in Scripture with whom he deserved to be compared—that was Balaam, the only prophet who had prophesied against his inclination and he was reproved by an ass." The bishop mildly retorted: "That part of his lordship's allusion which compares me to Balaam I can readily apply to myself, but as to the reproof that was administered to him, I am at a loss to find out to whom it must apply; for sure I am that I have been reproved by no one present but his lordship."

VALUABLE REFUSE.

A CURIOUS series of statistics establishes the value of the refuse of the Paris streets. The figures are almost incredible, and show that the rag-pickers discharge a duty of primary importance. Working at night, busy for hours under the gas-lights, the value of what they collect is estimated at $10,000 each day. Assuredly one half the world does not know how the other half lives. Of course, the conditions of Paris life are exceptional. Population is very close; the tall houses are crammed with inhabitants; there are no gardens, there are but the houses and the streets. The Parisians have a way of emptying all kinds of lumber and refuse into the streets and then the rag-pickers gather in their harvest. A use is found for everything, and metamorphosis never ceases. All the details are interesting, though some are rather disturbing. Rags, of course, go to make paper; broken glass is pounded, and serves as the coating for sand or emery paper; bones, after the process of cleaning and cutting down, serve to make nail-brushes, tooth-brushes, and fancy buttons; little wisps of women's hair are carefully unravelled, and do duty for false hair by-and-by. Men's hair collected outside the barbers' serves for filters through which syrups are strained; bits of sponge are cut up and used for spirit lamps; bits of bread if dirty are toasted and grated, and sold to the restaurants for spreading on hams or cutlets; sometimes they are carbonised and made into tooth powder. Sardine boxes are cut up into tin soldiers or into sockets for candlesticks. All this work finds employment for nearly 20,000 persons who earn from twenty to fifty cents a day. Their utility to the community is enormous. The metamorphosis from refuse into valuable and useful articles suggests a lesson to the Christian worker. How much human refuse is there running about our streets in the shape of neglected children who might after the divine metamorphosis of conversion become useful men and women in the world and gems for the Saviour's crown in the world to come!

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editor, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE PEACE OF EUROPE.

Mr. G. W. Smalley's Warning of Impending Danger from the Franco-Russian Alliance.

THE significance of the news which is cabled to the New York Tribune by its veteran European correspondent, Mr. G. W. Smalley, will be readily appreciated by every student of prophecy. It is an intimation that Europe is not so thoroughly assured of peace as its leading statesmen would have the world believe. Of late the intelligent student of the Word of God who was led to believe that the world is on the verge of stupendous wars, was pointed to the fact that the peace of Europe was assured for many years to come by the renewal of the Triple Alliance of Germany, Austria, and Italy, which was further strengthened by the promise of England's co-operation under certain circumstances. But those who rely on God's Word rather than on the boasts of princes, have not been convinced by the argument.

The prophecies of Holy Writ clearly imply that the last decade of this dispensation, on which, as the most eminent expositors of prophecy believe, we are now entering, will be a period of war such as the world has never yet witnessed. The map of Europe is to be re-arranged. The countries which surround the Mediterranean Sea will be reduced in number to ten; the territories which were not included in Caesar's Roman Empire will again be separated from it; those nations which were included in that Empire will have as much territory and no more than they had then. That will involve among other events the recapture by France of the territory taken from her by Germany, the separation of Ireland from England, the gain of large sections of territory by Greece and the complete dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire. Such a rearrangement of the map of Europe could not take place without a war in which all the great Powers would be involved, and such a war the Bible student has long been expecting.

The object of the Triple Alliance was to prevent any such conflict, and there was good reason for auguring its success. The Powers forming the Alliance possess gigantic armies, thoroughly organized and well equipped. They stretch in a broad belt across Europe from north to south and seem to form, standing together, a powerful peace-preserving force. But it would now appear from Mr. Smalley's dispatch that the very Alliance which was formed to compel peace has incited a rival combination to break it. Russia and France appear to be meditating an agreement to act together. As Mr. Smalley points out, these two Powers are not threatened by the Triple Alliance or by any other Government; it must therefore, be inferred that their object is offensive, not defensive. Should their alliance be consummated, Europe will be divided into two gigantic camps, and the war which the Bible student has been expecting, cannot long be averted. Mr. Smalley says:

The visit of the French fleet to Cronstadt has filled Europe with rumors. The sky is black with them; one or two of extreme gravity, for which there is some authority. The St. Petersburg correspondent of The Times sends one. He receives from a good source the positive statement that negotiations for an ultimate alliance between France and Russia have been going on in Paris. Some kind of agreement has been reached between the Russian Ambassador in Paris and the French Foreign Minister. The French fleet is the bearer of a rough draft of this agreement, which the Czar and his Minister have been considering all the week, amid the blaze of festivities, with Admiral Gervais to help them.

Great quantities of ink have been shed over the visit of the French fleet to Cronstadt. Paris is beside itself with joy. You may almost hear the echo of that fatal cry of the Boulevards in 1870, "To Berlin!" The prospects of an alliance are more freely discussed than the objects of it. What would be the objects? It would be an alliance for war. Of an alliance for defence there is no thought and no need. There is not in all Europe a single power which dreams of attacking either France or Russia. There is no Frenchman or Russian who believes there is.

Feeling in Paris is extremely high-strung. Nor is it merely the journals of the Boulevards in which wild things are said. The President's own organ, La Paix, set the tune, and the rest have danced to it. We want an alliance with Russia, declares this important and usually moderate paper, for defence; and also because we may be compelled ourselves to assume the offensive. That is a very menacing word, and some of the echoes of it are more menacing still.

SEEKING BEST THINGS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning August 23d. John 6: 27.

HOW many feel that life is a dreary circle! To the great masses it is a neck-and-neck race with destitution. The food eaten to-day supplies the strength to earn food for to-morrow. To cease work is to cease to live, as the bird in mid-air must use its wings or drop. Others who are more successful or more fortunate have a store provided for the contingencies of sickness and old age, but the difference is in degree; the store is used to supply the needs of the day which are like those of yesterday, and those that will come to-morrow. The meat, the things of the world, perish in the using. There is no permanent satisfaction in the acquisition of means which simply supply recurrent wants. The man who is compelled by his circumstances to give all his thoughts to the work of earning money is to be pitied, the man who does so by choice is to be despised. Christ's advice, or rather his injunction, was sound philosophy: "Labor not for the meat which perisheth."

But he does not leave us with negative instruction. We are not to cease to labor because the common object is unsatisfactory. There is another object which is worthy of labor. It does not perish but endures unto everlasting life. Christ speaks of it as food. How many a Christian realizes the appropriateness of the simile! It sustains life as nothing else can. It sustains the life of the soul which lives on through eternity. His meaning may be made clear by a simple illustration: Two men purchase books—books enough to fill a large library. One man is content with the possession of them, the sight of them on his shelves; the other man reads his books, makes them his own by study and assimilation. Both libraries are burned. In the one case the books have perished, in the other, they survive in the well-stored mind and are imperishable.

The words are words specially for believers. Sanctification is progressive. We grow in grace. God's docile children are learning all their lives. Every joy, every trial, every success, every failure has its lesson for those who will learn. "Giving all diligence," says the Apostle Peter, "add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity." The ladder of attainment is a hard road, but blessings come at every step and at the end the result is everlasting life. Above all, (and the thought is most encouraging) success does not depend on our own efforts. We are to labor, we are to strive, we are to be receptive; but the fruit—that sustaining food, "the Son of man shall give unto you."

THE PORTLAND TEST.

"CAN you inform me," writes a correspondent, "what are the exact terms of the Portland Test, which is so frequently referred to in the reports and discussions of Young Men's Christian Associations?" The so-called test is embodied in a resolution adopted by the convention which assembled in July 1869, at Portland, Me. Its objects was to secure practical fellowship in doctrine among the Associations thereafter to be organized or re-organized, so that the word Christian might never become a misnomer as applied to them. It is worded as follows:

"Resolved: That the Associations organized after this date shall be entitled to representation in future conferences of the Associated Young Men's Christian Association of North America, on condition that they be severally composed of young men in communion with evangelical churches (provided that in places where the Associations are formed by a single denomination, members of other denominations are not excluded therefrom), and active membership and the right to hold office be conferred only upon young men who are members in good standing of evangelical churches; and we hold those churches to be evangelical which, maintaining the Holy Scriptures to be the only infallible rule of faith and practice do believe in the Lord Jesus Christ (the only begotten of the Father, King of kings and Lord of lords, in whom dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and who was made sin for us, though knowing no sin, bearing our sins in his own body on the tree), as the only name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved from everlasting punishment.

AN INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION.

THE King's Daughters have become so numerous and the circles have so multiplied in other lands that an enlargement of organization has become necessary. Accordingly Mrs. Bottome has applied to the Supreme Court for permission to change the name of the Order, which permission has been granted. The New York Sun, of Aug. 6, gives an account of the court's decision and Mrs. Bottome's reasons for the application, from which the following are extracts:

The order of Judge O'Brien of the Supreme Court changing the name of the Order of the King's Daughters to that of the "International Order of the King's Daughters and Sons," marks an era of advancement in this interesting association. Men and boys were admitted to the order in 1887, the year after it was founded. This was done upon the earnest request of a large number of clergymen and church workers from all over the country. It seems men and boys were admitted to the Order in 1887, the year after it was founded. This was done upon the earnest request of a large number of clergymen and church workers from all over the country. In 1890, the men and boys were more formally recognized than at first, after it was unexpectedly found that the order proved popular among them. At that time Mrs. Margaret Bottome, the President, in a circular, said: "There are not two orders, but two associated bands in one Order. Both branches of the Order should clasp hands, each ready to minister to the other, as occasion may require. In such a fellowship there cannot fail to be glorious service both for God and man. To the women of broad experience and large-hearted helpfulness the members of the Brotherhood should freely bring any of the problems on which it is possible for a woman to lay a helpful hand: while the women of the Order should be able and free to turn to the Sons of the King, who should stand as a truly royal guard, ready to help and shield and save."

The more significant change in the order is indicated by the addition of the word "International" to the title. It is no longer an American order. It spreads all over the world. In the very first year of the order's existence circles of King's Daughters were started in England. From there they spread to Denmark, Japan, Australia, Canada, France, Germany, and Italy. The movement became especially popular in England, where it spread into every city and almost every town, but its growth in other countries was rapid also. All the circles founded abroad adopted the constitution of the American organization and arrayed themselves under the American banner. Of late these foreign circles have become so numerous that there has been a movement in each country to consolidate its own circles into a grand division of the order. In England, Canada, Denmark, Japan, and Australia national organizations have already been made, or are now forming. Then it was determined to re-organize the order into national divisions, having its central governing head in this city. The practical work leading up to this has hardly begun as yet. Eventually, a system of representation for each national division will be arranged, the delegates to meet yearly in convention. This is the general platform proposed by the council upon which the national divisions will be asked to unite:

First—That all branches of the Order accept the constitution under which it was chartered in America so far as it relates to the Order at large; that there be used throughout the world one badge, one membership card, one certificate of membership. Provision to supply these will be made by the Central Council of the Order.

Second—That each country desiring to co-operate with us shall elect a General Secretary whose election shall be confirmed by the Central Council, said Secretary to report yearly, or more frequently if necessary, the needs of the work in her own country, and that the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Missions be the representative in that body of the interests of the Order in all foreign mission fields.

HINTS TO ENDEAVORERS.

PRACTICAL advice which may be useful to some of our readers comes to us in a letter from Deacon Jotham L. Sedgley of Cloverdale, Cal., who is President of the Christian Endeavor Society of the Congregational Church of that town. Mr. Sedgley has had the pleasure of seeing the Society grow from a membership of eight, with which it started two years ago, to a membership of seventy-six, with six committees. He is an enthusiastic believer in the efficacy of this means of usefulness and is anxious that all churches should avail themselves of it.

Among the plans which have been found beneficial at Cloverdale is that of holding a small prayer-meeting before the general one. The members of the Prayer-meeting Committee meet the leader and join with him in prayer in a preliminary meeting, and all are conscious that much strength has been given in answer. Another important matter is the preparation of the Lesson on the topic of the week. In doing this the most earnest effort should be made to put aside worldly thoughts and anxieties in order that the mind may be open to the promptings of the Spirit. The utmost care in the selection of hymns appropriate to the topic, is another piece of advice Mr. Sedgley gives. Much of the benefit of the meeting depends on this. Plenty of music and as good as it is possible to obtain should be a feature of the meeting. A weekly choir practice is recommended as a means to that end. The consecration meeting should be a real and a solemn renewal of the pledge of membership.—Every member should take part and if natural timidity cannot at first be overcome sufficiently to speak, then the members should signify the renewal by rising. But everyone should be encouraged to speak, as individual experience of the power of temptation and the way of victory is helpful to others. Instruction, however, does not exhaust the object of the Society. Fellowship occupies an important place. A warm grasp of the hand has done much before now in encouraging a tried fellow-believer. Not the mere touch of a hand covered with "the non-conductor of a kid glove," but a really hearty handshake in which the heart speaks. Service, the third of the objects of the Society, should be wide-awake, earnest, vigorous, helpful to the Pastor and the Church.

THE SPECIAL meeting of Christian Endeavor Societies of Brooklyn, N. Y., took place in Clermont Avenue North Reformed Church as announced two weeks ago in this journal. The chief subject considered was a plan for aggressive summer work. One of the members outlined a plan to establish a Gospel wagon similar to those used in Baltimore and Washington and reports were read from those places showing the cost and results of the work. It was estimated that after the purchase of the wagon the annual expenses of running it would amount to about $320. The plan is to send the wagon into those localities of the city where church work is needed. Twenty persons can be carried in it who will conduct religious services in the streets. Speakers will address the gathering thus drawn by the singing, and it is thought a great deal of work can be done in this way. Many members heartily endorsed the project. A doubt, however, was raised as to its being constitutional and it was therefore laid on the table for further inquiry.

A TESTIMONY to the value of Christian Endeavor Societies comes from Philadelphia, Pa. Mrs. Elizabeth Weir, of the Grace Baptist Temple in Broad Street, writes that the Society in connection with that church has been much blessed. Meetings are held every Tuesday night. An excellent President and Secretary serve the Society faithfully, and the members are in hearty fellowship and zealous in service. The younger people have a separate society and they are equally enthusiastic. They recently placed a beautiful window in the Temple.

ALL FOR THE BEST.

SECURE is that soul in the midst of affliction.
Who sees in each sorrow the hand of his God,
And, knowing that all things for good work together,
Unquestioned bows 'neath each stroke of the rod;
O blest is that heart that, when tossed by the tempest,
Can cling to this hope as a bird to its nest,
And say, with a faith by each trial made stronger;
"The dear Father knows—it is all for the best."

The seed that, with weeping, we sowed for the Master,
Unquickened, may lie where it fell by the way;
Prayers that were wrung from our heart's deepest anguish,
Unanswered remain, though we cease not to pray;
The Father may hide for a moment his presence,
And the soul by its doubts and its fears be distressed;
But faith whispers low: "Though he slay thee, yet trust him,
The dear Father knows—it is all for the best."

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Describes the Boyhood and Early Training of a Prince—Kaiser William's Youth.

TALES of heroic days possess an irresistible charm for the youthful mind. It lingers over the recital of David's battles, the defence of Horatius, the Spartan bravery of Leonidas, the great wars of Alexander, the Cæsars and the Maccabees. The luminous careers of Winkelried, who took the spears to his breast at Sempach, to secure his country's freedom, the battles of Charlemagne, the great Friedrich and Gustavus Adolphus have for it an attraction that the advance of years cannot wholly dispel.

The story of Saladin, the great Moslem warrior, related by Uncle John last week, had been fully canvassed by the children. "It was easy for anyone to do these things, if he was born a hero," ventured Ted.

The traveller smiled at the naive remark. "Ah, my boy, you mustn't think that every lad who achieved greatness had an easy time of it. History tells us little about the early training they underwent and the discipline that was needed to bring out the strongest points in their characters. Let me tell you how a prince, who was destined to rule one of the greatest nations, spent his boyhood."

There was a murmur of delighted assent from the group.

"I remember being in Berlin," began Uncle John, "when the late Kaiser William, had just concluded his campaign against France. There was a great public demonstration at which all the princes were present. Among them was a little lad, bright-eyed and fair-haired about your own size and age, Tom. He had for a companion a boy about a year younger than himself and both seemed to be a bit frightened at the immense crowds. Sometime afterward, I saw these two lads at their exercise in the park at Potsdam. There are two gymnasiums in the park, fitted up with all sorts of apparatus for the muscular development of the body, and these little fellows, under an instructor, were put through a variety of drills and motions for several hours every day for seven years, Sundays and holidays excepted.

"The elder was Prince William now the Emperor of Germany, and his companion was Prince Henry, his brother. Their father, the late Emperor Frederick, was one of the most exemplary Christians Europe has ever seen—a man of rare talents and greatly beloved by his people. He was averse to war by nature, though brave in the field. He knew that young William would one day be his successor, if the lad lived, so he determined to train him in a manner that would fit him to rule wisely and uprightly. Before all else, he placed the study of the Scriptures in point of importance. The future ruler was taught to govern his temper, to respect his elders, to obey those in authority and to deal kindly with all who were socially beneath him."

"Did he play games in the park, as our boys do?" inquired one of the listeners.

"Probably he did, but his amusements were usually of a more serious sort. He had no time for the ordinary games of children. In a part of the park behind the new palace, at Potsdam, there were sunk in the ground three ship's masts, full-rigged like those of a man-of-war. There was a competent naval drill-master in charge, and the prince and his comrades were daily instructed in the management of a warship's running gear and guns, and became familiar with every sail, rope and spar. A little distance from the masts was a series of trenches thrown up by the lads under the tuition of a veteran army officer. Mock battles took place frequently between the crew of the man-of-war and the land force, and thus the young prince was, like Cyrus and Alexander, taught the art of war even before he knew his grammar. His portrait was taken about that time and it shows a diminutive but sturdy sailor, in regulation costume, with an easy nautical air about him that is very amusing."

A chorus of comments followed, when Uncle John held up to the gaze of the children the portrait of the sailor prince.

EMPEROR WILLIAM II. IN BOYHOOD.
From a photograph taken when he was six years of age.

"You see, youth with him was a rather serious matter," he continued. "His very play was disciplinary and not merely designed to amuse. His boyish sallies were made against fortifications and over breastworks. When he was not resting, he was either fencing, swimming, studying his books or planning out in marches, countermarches, attacks and defence, the work of his future life. I have seen him at the head of his band of boy-troopers, storming a miniature fortress, surrounded by tiny ditches and defended by cannon that fired blank shot. And after taking the fort, he would lead his cadets in pursuit through the whole length of the park, finally overtaking the enemy, with whom he would immediately go into camp, and set to making coffee and cooking potatoes over a wood fire—in fact, meeting as far as possible all the hardships incident to ordinary camp life. To share such a spread on the smooth sward, all the pickets and sentinels would be called in, and while the meal lasted there would be an armistice. After that, the state of war would be resumed till dark drove the pigmy soldiers into the palace."

"He has never been in a real war, has he?" inquired Ted, gazing at the youthful face in the photograph.

"No; and doubtless he wishes he may never need to engage in a conflict that must mean death to thousands and misery to a whole country. When the old Emperor and Bismarck and the Crown Prince used to watch the little prince at his boyish battles, they little thought he would be called so soon to govern the nation. The training he received from a Christian father and mother may have given him a self-restraining power that will avert war many years. The Bible, you remember, says the Christian soldier must put on the whole armor of God, and that his feet should be 'shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace.' It would be a blessing to Europe, and to the whole world, if its princes were clad in this armor," added Uncle John earnestly, "for then there would be an end of bloodshed, and nations would be brothers instead of deadly foes."

Early Christian Training.

THE value of early training in Christian principles is inestimable. Whatever the child is, that, in a majority of cases, the man will be. Our great millionaires, almost to a man, had to begin early to earn their own living and thus quickly developed the acquisitive faculty. The grandest Christians have been those who took in their first inspirations at their mother's knee and the foundations of whose characters were laid before they ever entered school or college.

To learn early is to learn thoroughly, and this is especially true of all that relates to the heart and the conscience. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when ing suggestions from a writer in The Western Rural: "When a rainy day comes, one busy mother whom I know places a large comforter on the sitting-room floor, and provides her small brood with newspapers and scissors. They cut from the paper men, horses, cows, sheep, etc., also, tubs of butter, webs of cloth, buttons, anything, in fact, of which they may think, and open a store. Sometimes they are partners, and all their joint energies are bent toward putting up a first-class store. Sometimes one has a farm, the other a store, etc. As mamma sits by with her sewing, she of course helps them plan, quells any tendency to quarrel, and keeps matters straight generally, as mothers have a habit of doing."

Weeds in Character.

HERE are some traits of character that grow without cultivation; or rather, they grow from the lack of it. Like weeds in the flower-garden, they spring up everywhere and in the most unexpected places. They thrust themselves right in among the best qualities we possess, and assert themselves at a time when we most earnestly desire to be rid of them. Surliness, ill-temper, exaggeration, and gossip are some of the weeds that mar the complete character. Unless the garden of the mind is diligently cultivated and the weeds not merely trimmed down but suppressed, their roots will spread and by and by they will crowd out the flowers and flourish, rank and unmolested.

A violent temper is one of the commonest and most objectionable of these weeds. People soon come to rightly estimate a chronic scold, male or female, and to know how little reason or justice such a temper really has in it. Its authority is soon lost, and by and by it rages to the empty air, since nobody heeds it. It is a weed that soon absorbs and spoils the whole nature, unless checked in time.

Sullenness is a kindred weed. One sullen member will depress an entire household, just as, on the other hand, one sunbeam will lighten up the darkest room. A lady tells this incident: A good woman, the mother of a family, sat thinking how to get rid of a petty annoyance. Arising, she rang the bell. A servant entered in a noisy way.

"Sarah, you may sit down." The girl threw herself sullenly on a chair, averting her face. "I'm sorry to have to find fault in you, Sarah."

"Oh, you needn't be, madam, for I'm quite used to it now."

"I don't think I have ever scolded you. I try to watch myself against that sin. Have I ever scolded you?"

"Well, ma'am, not to say ravin' scoldin' as some do; but you tell me things and make me ashamed of myself."

"I want to be kind to you, poor girl. I was going to ask you to try and be more pleasant to the children. It is now a whole week since a smile has been seen on your face. Now, must I lose my good girl or keep her?"

Sarah looked down, and said: "I think, ma'am, if I do my work well, I might look grave, if it suits me."

"Don't you see, my little girls will catch your sullen ways. No, Sarah, you must be a careful, pleasant girl if you are to stay; and now I want you to decide it for me."

"I'll stay, ma'am." And, as the tears filled her eyes, she added: "You are the best mistress in the wide world."

Years passed, and Sarah remained a cheerful servant. Who shall count the value of words fitly spoken?

How the Lapp Babies go to Church.

RECENTLY we spoke of a plan suggested by a good California clergyman for the establishment of a Church kindergarten, to enable mothers who had no one to attend the babies at home, to come to church. But there is a country where the mothers take their babies to church without the adjunct of a kindergarten, and the little tots don't disturb the minister, either.

No mother in Lapland would think of staying at home on her baby's account. The Lapps are very devoted, Christian people, and go immense distances over the snow and ice to hear the sermon. On arriving at the church door, all the babies, who are wrapped up very snugly in deer-skins, are tucked away in the crisp snow and the dogs are left to guard them, while the parents are in listening to the sermon. It is no uncommon thing to see a score or more little ones out in the snow, and so thickly are they wrapped and so well tucked in, that they never either suffocate or freeze.

It would hardly do to try the Lapp method in this country, however. Our climate forbids it and our delicate ones would perish, where a hardy Lapp would be unharmed.

To Brighten Rainy Days.

RAINY days need not necessarily be dull. There are many ways in which children in the country during the summer, may pass a pleasant rainy day indoors. Here are some interest-

The Captains Bargain

NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

[Published by special arrangement with The National Temperance Society.]

ROBERT could not yet fully realize that the Superintendent was his father. The story had been told so abruptly and amid so much excitement that he had not a clear idea of the reason why he had been so suddenly transferred to Mr. Murray from the midst of the family he so loved. As he sat beside his father in the railroad car, he tried to collect his thoughts, but it seemed so like a dream that he could make nothing of it. It was very clear, however, that his new father meant to separate him completely from the old home and his old friends the Allens.

Mr. Murray wished never to see Lacy again, and especially that district of Lal's Mountain. The plan of his life was changed. He no longer thought of leaving the country. No; now he would stay and do well for Robert. Robert must be educated; Robert must be introduced to friends; Robert must be pushed on in life; Robert would inherit a good fortune; Robert must learn to love his new-found father, better than the people whom he had left; Robert's mind must be weaned from the past. Mr. Murray's heart sang but one song, Robert, Robert, Robert. Why had he not, by divine paternal prescience, recognized his child, years ago, he asked himself. No doubt a mother's heart would have realized the tie which his nature had ignored. One minute he upbraided himself, the next, the Allens.

At last they had left Lacy behind. Few people were in the car. Mr. Murray put his arm about Robert's shoulders, and drew him near to him. He took from his pocket two pictures.

"Here, my son, is your mother's picture, and yours, at the age when you were stolen from me. What a fool I have been not to recognize in you your mother's eyes and hair."

Robert looked at the picture. The lovely young face of his dead mother was very different from the plain, care-worn, mature face of Eliza Allen, but there was the same mother-look in each. He felt sure that his dead mother would have loved and blessed his living foster-mother, for her care of him. In truth, it seemed easier to think of this pictured woman as mother, than of Mr. Murray as father; for Robert's heart was sore, and his sense of justice wounded, by the abuse that the Superintendent had showered on Captain Allen and his family.

When we are young, and our experiences are narrow, we are apt to be severe in judging others, being too ignorant of human nature to make allowances. The other day I heard one say, "How easy your own faults make it for you to forgive others!" Knowledge of our own faults has not always this beneficent effect, but it should have. Robert had neither seen enough, nor felt enough to cover with the mantle of charity his new-found father's wrath. His mind was not with the Superintendent, nor with the future; but with the crestfallen Captain, the sturdy Bop, the weeping Eliza, and Pink.

But Mr. Murray, with his arm clasping closely his new found son, was telling in his ear the painful tale of his loss; of his mother's grief and death of heart-break; of his own long, miserable search, and the years whereof he could write that he "had no pleasure in them." Such a story could not but touch Robert's heart. A mist gathered in his eyes as he looked at the picture of his mother, and he felt that it should be his duty and his happiness to comfort the so-long-wretched father, who was ready to pour upon him all the fullness of his love.

From the story of the past Mr. Murray went to plans for the future. "Robert," he said, "I will do for you whatever you wish. We shall make a man of you. The first thing will be to send you to a first-class school where they will push you on in languages and mathematics. You have wasted your time long enough on such a paltry school as that of the Mountain. You must be hurried up to the level of other boys of your age. And such a school as I will select will attend carefully to your manners. I daresay you have been eating with steel forks, and not using finger-napkins, and have never seen a finger-bowl. All these little refinements of life you must learn, to fit you for the society you will live in. You are fifteen: much can be learned and done before you are twenty-one. Then I will take you abroad; you shall see the world. After two years of foreign travel, you shall come home, and go into business. Or, Robert, perhaps you would prefer the army. If you do, say so. I have influence enough to get you into West Point. The schoolmaster says you are very diligent and bright. In two years' time you could be amply fitted for West Point. You would come out an officer. I should like to see you with a pair of epaulettes on your shoulders. Would you like it?"

"I don't know, Mr. Murray," faltered the amazed lad.

"Mr. Murray! I'm your father, boy."

"Father, I mean—I forgot."

"Yes, yes, I see, habit, habit. Well, we must form a new habit. On second thought, I should not prefer the army. It would keep you from me too much, and then you might be killed in an Indian skirmish, or in a war if we had a war. Your life is too precious."

"How would you like to go to the Polytechnic, and graduate, and be a mining engineer? That is a fine, useful, manly business. We could travel over all the West together. You would become an expert, an authority. When you saw a chance for investment, you would have money to invest, and some venture might be as fortunate as was that of Agassiz, when he bought mines near Lake Superior. If you incline rather to literature, Robert, you could devote yourself to study, study in Europe, and come home to be a college president. That would suit me very well. I should be proud of you. Or, if you have a taste for politics, study law; your money will, at once, give you friends and influence. You could be sent to Congress; be Governor of your State; get one day to the White House! I wonder could I live long enough to see you inaugurated President of the United States!"

In fact, if Captain Allen had been elevated when he found Robert, Mr. Murray was now exalted from the sudden joy of getting back his long-lost boy. He ran on, in a state of excitement, presenting picture after picture of possible honor, fame, luxury, success, to the bewildered lad, who, half his heart yet clinging to the mill, could only hear amazed, and say, "If you wish;" "Yes, if you like;" "Yes, Mr. Murray—I mean, father."

But the train was getting over the ground well, and they were nearing Philadelphia, and the cars were filling. The Superintendent's mind turned to nearer interests. He took a fresh start in planning. The gorgeous card-houses of future honors were abandoned in favor of smaller card-houses of present conveniences. Robert, a handsome, well-grown lad, wore an old, faded, outgrown suit, too short in sleeve and leg, and with more than one patch, neatly set by Eliza. His shirt was of striped cotton, his shoes cowhide, and his blue stockings, knit by Pink, were in plain sight at the ankles. Mr. Murray's fatherly pride took note of these deficiencies, and of the old felt hat that had seen two years' wear, and survived many a lively tussle with Bop and the twins.

"We will get our dinner at the station restaurant," Mr. Murray said, "and then we will go to a tailor, and get you fitted out from head to foot, before we go to a hotel. We will give orders for more clothes too, handsome clothes, the best there are. We must go to a barber's. It is a pity that such beautiful curly hair as yours has been so villainously cut!"

"Mother always cut my hair," said Robert.

"Mrs. Allen? Don't say mother of her, your mother is dead."

But though Robert's heart could say mother of the fair-faced one who had nursed his babyhood, and died for lack of him, he must say mother also of that valiant, self-denying Eliza, who had been true mother to him for the ten years within his closest memory. He was silent at Mr. Murray's pettish remonstrance, but his heart said "mother, mother, mother" of Eliza.

All was hurry and stir until they were in the quiet, handsomely-furnished room of a first-class tailoring establishment.

"I want this young gentleman fitted out with a full wardrobe of your best," said Mr. Murray. "Have you a nice suit in stock to begin on? and you can take his measure for two others. What are the styles? Knee-breeches? Brass buttons, plain cloths, silk-finished cords? Robert, how would you like one suit in deep navy-blue, and one in fine, dark bottle-green?"

"If you please, Mr. Mur—father," said Robert.

"We have a handsome, deep brown corduroy knee-breeches suit, with Norfolk jacket," said the tailor. "Made to order—was a little small. I am sure it would fit this young gentleman."

"Bring it," said Mr. Murray. "Do you keep hats and caps? Can you order a trunk to put the goods in? Will you send out for shoes and slippers to try on? Take it in charge, will you, and fit him out completely at once. Suppose we begin at the furnishing department and get shirts and silk underwear and let him put a suit on. How many of each article should he have?"

The merchant had a conscience. Although here was a rich, lavish, excited customer, he did not think it right to make him buy out the whole store. He said as Robert was a growing boy, a half-dozen of things would be enough. So they adjourned to the furnishing department, and Mr. Murray held up neckties to try their effect on Robert's complexion, and disported himself generally like a mother buying a dress for a pretty daughter's first party, than like the father of a big, muscular lad, who had lived for ten years in a saw-mill and was now about to go to school.

Robert was fairly frightened at the amount of goods bought for him. What! four elegant neckties? His father, Captain Allen, had for two years worn the same black-silk stock fashioned by the prudent Eliza. What! six pairs of fancy-colored half-hose? And how ignominiously were the blue woolen stockings knit by dear little Pink discarded. Robert longed to rescue one, but dared not. What! thirty dollars for that one suit of dark-brown silk corduroy? Thirty dollars! Had Eliza and Pink had as much spent in dress for them for the last three or four years? What would they say,—what would they think to see him now? And to tell the truth, when he saw himself in all his new glory reflected in a long glass, he wished they could see him!

It was long after dark when Robert and his new-found father left the tailor-shop. Measures had been taken for two more suits of clothes, and an overcoat trimmed with fur. Robert could now hardly realize himself. He wore the finest of clothing throughout; on his feet were a pair of the best shoes that eight dollars could buy; his cap cost five dollars. He had hitherto only worn mittens in the coldest weather; now he had on tan-colored kid gloves. A hem-stitched, linen kerchief stuck out of his breast-pocket. A trunk was already nearly packed with what Robert considered a lavish, wasteful, unnecessary supply of clothing, and was to be sent to the hotel. Next, Mr. Murray took his son to a barber-shop to have his hair dressed; and then to a fine bazaar, where he bought him a dressing-case with a quantity of ivory-backed brushes, and other knick-knackery.

"We will now go to the hotel and leave buying your other things until to-morrow," said Mr. Murray.

"You have bought me more than enough, and more than I shall ever use," said the sturdy Robert.

"I have plenty of money," said Mr. Murray. "I know that—but—well, it seems wrong to have all these things when other people have none."

"You have a right to them if your father can pay for them," replied Mr. Murray, proudly.

"You will see how much better it is, being with your true father, than with people like the Allens."

"You give me what I need, with you, and what you can afford," said Robert, earnestly, "and they did the same. It comes to the same thing, sir, as far as I can see—and—I have known my mother to go without clothes that she needed, so that I could have big, steadfast eyes as he spoke; for now he had two pairs of fine shoes, and a pair of worked slippers, and he remembered that his good "mother's" shoes were patched, and Pink's, oh, poor Pink's, were nearly out at the toes!

"You are not bound to measure what you have by what other folks have," said Mr. Murray. "We are going to the hotel. Have you ever seen the Continental Hotel?"

"Outside, I have," said Robert, placidly. "I never went inside that to sell jam and honey and butter, but I went inside a lot of the others."

"My goodness!" cried Mr. Murray. "I don't see what those Allens meant by sending my son about as a huckster!"

"But I was their son then," said Robert, "and I am afraid we might have all starved if we had not tried something like that. I invented the jam-selling, and we made money by it too, and I was awfully glad to do it. They treated me well at the hotels, and some of them told me I would make a fine business man. I hope I will."

"Yes, yes," said Mr. Murray. "I hope, my son, that you will succeed in whatever you undertake."

They walked on in silence to the hotel. Mr. Murray was inwardly resentful that "those Allens" had sent his son on trading expeditions to the doors of hotels and boarding-houses; and Robert was calculating how long it was likely to be before he could go into business, "and make a whole lot of money," and send it in toto to Captain 'Zekiel to pay off the mortgage, repair the mill, build a house, replenish the wardrobes of all the family, and put "well, as much as two thousand in the bank."

They reached the hotel, and were taken to two fine communicating rooms. Then they went down to supper, and Mr. Murray watched Robert's every motion, and kept up a very discomfiting whisper about "do so, don't do so; not this, not that," and poor Robert, who had heretofore eaten his humble meals in blessed peace, was driven nearly out of his wits. Still, Eliza Allen had been fairly careful of her children's manners, and Robert was naturally refined and delicate in his ways, so that really he was conducting himself properly, and Mr. Murray was very proud of him. His hints were chiefly the outgrowth of nervous excitement, and a captious feeling that the pupil of "the Allens" must need correction. Among the persons in the dining hall were several whom Mr. Murray knew, and great was his pride in introducing the tall, handsome Robert as "My son," and hearing the compliments that were paid him.

"I heard you were going abroad, Murray," said one.

"I have changed my mind. I shall remain here to attend to the education of my son, and defer going abroad for five years, until I can take him," said Mr. Murray flushed and happy.

The next day Robert's new father went out with him again. Then there was more buying. A knife; how glad Robert was that his own knife, a gift from Mr. Murray, was accidentally in Bop's pocket, not his, when he left "home." A Russia-leather pocket-book—when could he fill it for them?

"Oh, you must have a Bible," said Mr. Murray, and went in and bought a fine Oxford Teacher's Bible.

Eliza had once given Robert a six-cent Testament on Christmas, and he had left it at "home" on the shelf in the wall at the head of his bed.

"My dear boy, the Bible should be from your own dear mother. What a loss you have had in losing her. She would have taught you and helped you as I cannot. All I can do is to write in this Bible, 'Our Son. In memory of his dead mother.'"

Yes, Robert liked and would value that. But there was the living mother, who had earned the six pence which paid for the little black-cloth Testament. She had written his name in it, and the verse, "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto according to Thy word." And she had taught him texts before he could read; she had told him Bible stories; she had heard him say his prayers, kneeling with Pink on one side of him, and Bop on the other, when they were all little dimpled creatures. It hurt Robert to have all this care of Eliza's ignored, but he saw that mention of the Allens irritated his father. But the glory of that day was a visit to the jeweller's, where Mr. Murray bought a very good watch, with a short, modest chain, and presented them to Robert. Oh, what a watch! It was not in the heart of a human boy to resist such a watch. It was a joy to own that watch, even though he remembered that Captain 'Zekiel had none.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

SADIE R. WILSON, Oakland Cross Roads, Westmoreland Co., Pa. Where can I get a King's Daughter Badge?

Write to the headquarters of the Order. No. 47 W. 22d St., New York City.

M. R., Alexandria, Va. How long a distance is a Sabbath day's journey? I find it mentioned repeatedly in the Bible.

A Sabbath day's journey with the Hebrews was not to exceed the distance between the ark and the extreme end of the camp—in other words, 2000 cubits or 3648 feet, equal to about a mile. The distance was prohibitive, and designed to prevent Sabbath desecration by pleasuring outdoors.

M. M., Bertrand, Neb. When were people named with more than one name?

Surnames cannot be traced farther back than the latter part of the tenth century. About that time, the practice of writing a supernomina, or "overname," began, the addition usually being descriptive either of the place where the person lived or of some personal peculiarity, or characteristic. The "overname" was written above the Christian name. Afterward it became customary in certain parts of the world to assume the name of the sire in addition to one's own; hence doubtless the word surname.

Mrs. L. D., Jacksonville, Fla. A friend says that orange blossoms worn at weddings are a relic of barbarism. Is it true?

As far as can be learned from history, orange blossoms were first worn at weddings by the ancient Saracens and they have been worn on such occasions in Europe ever since the days of the Crusades—some 800 years ago. Their general adoption, however, is a comparatively recent practice. The Saracens were kin to the Arabians and are by some supposed to have been descended from Sarah the wife of Abraham. The orange flower was typical of fruitfulness.

F. McD., Des Moines, Ia. How old is the Manual Training System and who introduced it into this country?

About twenty years ago, Victor Della Vos founded in Russia a new system of educational mechanical training which was, as far as can be learned, the basis of the present system. Dr. John B. Runkle introduced it into the United States, beginning with experiments at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, of which he is Principal. Other leading pioneers of the system were Col. Augustus Jacobson, Dr. Henry H. Belfield of Chicago, Mr. John S. Clark of Boston and the late Mr. Charles Pratt of Brooklyn.

W. G. S., Chicago, Ill. Was the earth created in six literal days as the Bible reads, and if so, is it now only 6000 years old? A well-known professor in one of our Chicago seminaries declares that the mountains of the earth are millions of years old, and I believe science agrees with this statement.

There are three theories of Creation: (1) the old orthodox view, which interprets the Bible literally, and asserts that the work occupied six days; (2) the Restitution view, which holds that the Mosaic creation is merely the restitution of a preceding organic creation which had been previously many times organized and destroyed; (3) the Harmonists' view which interprets the six days mentioned in the Bible to mean six geologic epochs of incalculable duration. The ablest writers on scientific theology in the present day probably hold the last-mentioned view.

W. O. B., Detroit, Mich. When did the custom of wearing black as an indication of mourning originate, and is it right for Christians to wear it as a token of sorrow, when we believe that our loved ones are gone to be with Christ?

The origin of the custom is lost in antiquity. It is probably Egyptian, as in that country, so Herodotus the father of travelers, writes, on the death of any great personage, the men and women of the immediate family covered their bodies with mud and went unclad and with hair dishevelled for many days. The mud, drying on their bodies, gave them a darker hue. Among the ancient Romans, the color for mourning was black, as it now is in modern Europe. In Turkey it is violet, in China white, in Ethiopia brown, in Egypt yellow. Until 1498, it was white also in Spain. The white was supposed to denote purity, the yellow that death is the end of human hopes, the brown that the body would return to its original color—that of earth, the blue that the deceased had gone to the skies to enjoy happiness, the black the deprivation of life which was likened to the shutting out of the light. White or blue would seem therefore to be more appropriate than black for a Christian to wear in memory of the dead. In some communities, there has been a very strong tendency to abolish black as an emblem of sorrow.

J. L. Trenton, N. J. Does the mere belief that Jesus Christ is the Son of God save the Soul? The devils believe and tremble, we are told in Scripture.

The soul cannot be saved by belief in any doctrine or truth whatsoever. Nor can it be saved by works. It is Christ and he alone who saves the soul. He has given himself as a ransom for it and by him men may be saved. He who believes this fact has taken the first step. But the step by which the man avails himself of the benefits of Christ's sacrifice is the crucial one, just as a man may believe theoretically in the skill of a physician, but the decisive point is reached when he knows that he is suffering from a mortal disease and commits himself to the care of that physician, staking all his hope of life on the physician's power to cure him. The soul that trusts Christ to save him, as the sick man trusts the physician, has the faith of which it is said "by grace are ye saved through faith." (Eph. 2:8)

J. B. G., Beaver River Corner, N. S.—I am a farmer of 58. I would like to ask you whether in your opinion a man would be justified in saving property from destruction on the Sabbath day: not life, but hay, grain or other perishable stock, on account of bad weather, fire or flood?

Christ approved works of mercy on the Sabbath and the Christian view takes the ground that works of necessity are also permissible. (See Matt. 12:10, 11.) The saving of life or home or cattle or crops from destruction by a sudden and unforeseen visitation of fire or flood would be a totally different matter from working in the fields on the Sabbath to save the crops from bad weather, drought, etc. "Thou shalt not do any work," is the command. If due precaution were taken to protect property during the rest of the week, it would ordinarily not be necessary to disturb the Holy Day.

Miss H. P. M., Allentown, Pa. How should the Sabbath be spent in a section where there are no Church privileges?

It should be spent in prayer to God, in praise and in meditation on his Word. This is to be done where possible, either in the privacy of one's own apartment, in the family, or in the assembly of the faithful. Where public worship in the sanctuary is not practicable, its substitute is to be found in the assembling of a few in the home and there reading and expounding the Scriptures, first asking a blessing on the effort. There are in isolated parts of this great country many sections without church buildings. Little gatherings of friends and neighbors are held for worship and often a sermon by some devout minister of the Gospel is read aloud by some one present to the edification of all. All labor should be set aside and everything that will distract the mind from the sacred duties of the day. The children, too, should not be forgotten. Their instruction in the Word is an essential part of the duties of the Sabbath. We are glad to learn from subscribers in all parts of the country that the two sermons published weekly in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are frequently used with profit in places where there are no churches.

S. D. B., Bromley, Tenn. Is it sinful for hotels and private families to cook on Sunday?

Under the old dispensation, and while the children of Israel were in the wilderness, God made it clear that he intended that no work whatever should be done on the Sabbath day. It is to be noted that while on all other days their supply of manna was only equal to the daily need, on the day preceding the Sabbath a double supply was gathered. This was a clear indication of God's will in the matter. In accordance with this strict view, there are to-day communities in New England, and also in Scotland, Wales and Holland, where no cooking is done on the Sabbath, provision being made on Saturday for the next day's necessities. Christ, during his ministry on earth, placed a more liberal interpretation on the laws regarding the observance of the day than had till then prevailed. He discouraged such a traditional observance as would have made of it a day of heartless neglects and sanctionless rigors, but countenanced the keeping of it in its true spirit of beneficent usefulness, avowing that "the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath."

CHRIST, OUR REFUGE.

REFUGE of the weary soul
I Would find my rest in thee:
When the storms of sorrow roll,
Speak the word of peace to me.

Tempest-tossed and full of fear.
Doubts arise on every side.

Off Thy voice I cannot hear,
And I fail to see my Guide.

Then O! Christ! to me appear,
Bid the boisterous waves "Be still."

May Thy love dispel all fear,
And with joy my bosom fill,

Help me trust when sight is dim—
Trust, though all seems dark as night.

Casting all my care on him,
To whom darkness is as light.

THE SWISS SUNDAY.

In Switzerland the weekly rest day is protected by law more stringently than in any other country in Europe. This is as it should be, for it is the country which has enjoyed the services and support of the great-hearted and faithful Monsieur Deluz. By a law which came into force on December 1, 1890, "Every servant of railway, steamer, tramway, and other locomotive companies, and the employees of the post-office, will have fifty-two days of rest in the year, of which seventeen must be Sundays. No wage is to be deducted for the Rest Day. Any breach of the law is to be visited with a penalty of from one to two hundred dollars. This law is supplementary to others which secure to the workmen in factories, mills, and workshops their complete liberty on the Lord's day, except in certain cases, for which the authorization of the Federal Council is needed, and even then one Sunday in two must be free. A railway is in course of construction, which connects Yverdon and St. Croix, in the Canton Vaud, which by its constitution is to be free from all Sunday traffic for at least twenty-five years. To obtain this privilege the promoters have cheerfully sacrificed all the money subventions to which they had a claim from the various parishes, the Canton and the State.

In this stirring of men's minds—this energetic pursuit of Sunday Rest—this readiness on the part of the Government to meet the claims of the toiling classes, it is most necessary that Christian men who love God and reverence his law and are jealous for the glory of their God and Saviour, should maintain their hold on the movement and so strengthen it that it may be guided into truly religious and Christian channels. A day wrested from work is good. The day devoted only to self-indulgence and amusements becomes a curse. The Day of Rest is secured for millions, and now the Christian Church must teach them how to use it.

The great benefit which people at this season derive from Hood's Sarsaparilla proves that this medicine "makes the weak strong." ## THE DOOR OF THE HEART

How it was Opened After it had been Closed Many Years.

NOT such a very old man, either, was he, for the wrinkles that marked his visage were not the autograph that time's finger had laid there, and the hand that placed upon the low pine table the well-drained glass, did not tremble so with the weakening that age induces; yet very old, and very wretched looked the sole occupant of the narrow room, with its red curtain, and floor stained with tobacco saliva, and an atmosphere abundantly seasoned by the bar into which it opened.

A hat—it must have been intended for one, half concealed the owner's uncombed locks; and unmistakable evidence of a familiar acquaintance with brickbats and the gutter, did that same hat produce. Then there was a coat, out of whose sleeves peeped a pair of elbows in rejoicing consciousness that they "could afford to be out." Add to these, reader, a tattered pair of trousers, and you have a picture of the wretched being who had just commenced his daily potatoes in the only "grog shop" he was allowed to enter. And yet the wretched, friendless man that sat there, under the stupefying effects of his morning drink, had a heart; and far away up a great many pair of winding stairs in that heart, was a door easily passed by, and on that door, covered with cobwebs of time and neglect, was written "Man."

But while the unhappy man sat by the pine table that morning, the bar-keeper suddenly entered, followed by a lady, with a pale, high brow, mild hazel eyes, and a strangely winning expression on her mild face. The man looked up with a vacant stare of astonishment, as the bar-keeper tendered the lady a seat, and pointed to the other, saying, "That's Bill Strong, ma'am," and with a glance that indicated very plainly his wonder at what she could want there, left her alone with the astounded and now thoroughly sobered man.

The soft eyes of the lady wandered with a sad, pitying expression over old Bill's features, and then in a low, sweet voice, she asked:

"Am I rightly informed? Do I address Mr. William Strong?"

Ah! with those few words, the lady had got far up the winding stairs, and nearer the hidden door than all who had gone before her.

"Yes, that is my name," said old Bill, and he glanced down at his shabby attire, and actually tried to hide the elbow that was peeping out. It was a long time since he had been addressed as Mr. William Strong, and somehow it sounded very pleasant to him.

"I am very glad to meet you, Mr. Strong," responded the lady; "I have heard my father speak of you so often, and of the days when you and he were boys together, that I almost feel as if we were old acquaintances. You surely cannot have forgotten Charles Morrison?"

"Oh! no; Charlie and I used to be great cronies," said old Bill, with sudden animation, and a light in his eye, such as had not shone there for a long time, except when rum gave it a fitful brilliancy.

Ah! the lady did not know, as perhaps the angels did, that she had mounted the stairs, and was softly feeling for that unseen door, so she went on.

"I almost feel, Mr. Strong, as if I could see the old spot upon which your homestead stood, I have heard my father describe it so often. The hill, with its crown of old oaks at the back of your house, and the field of yellow harvest grain that waved in front. Then there was the green grass before the front door, with the huge apple tree that threw its shadows across it; and the old 'portico' with the grape vine that climbed over it, and the white roses that peeped in at the bedroom window, and the spring that went shining and bubbling through the bed of green mint at the side of the house."

Old Bill moved uneasily in his chair, and the muscles around his mouth twitched occasionally, but unmindful of this, the lady kept on in the same low, melting voice.

"Many and many were the hours," so father would say, "that Willie and I used to pass under the shadow of that old apple tree, playing at hide and seek, or lolling on the grass and telling each other great things we meant to do, when we became big men, while Willie's blue eyes would sparkle with hope and happiness; and when the sunset laid a crown of gold on the top of the oaks on the hill, Willie's mother might be seen standing in the portico, with her snowy cap and checked apron, and we would hear her cheerful voice calling, 'Come boys, come to supper!'"

One after another the big, warm, blessed tears went rolling down old Bill's cheeks, and falling on the pine table. Ah! the lady was at the door then.

"I was always at home at Willie's," father would say, "and used to have my bowl of fresh milk and bread, too; and when these had disappeared, Willie would draw his little stool to his mother's feet, and she would tell him some pleasant story of Joseph, or David, or some good boy, who afterwards became a great man, and then she would part Willie's brown curls from off his forehead, and say in a trembling voice I can never forget, 'Promise me, Willie, when you are a man, and the gray hairs of your mother are resting in the church-yard yonder, you will never disgrace her memory.' And Willie would draw up his slight form, lift his blue eyes proudly to his mother, and say, 'Never fear, mother, I will make a good man, and a great one too.'"

Rap! rap! rap! went the words of the lady at the door in old Bill's heart. Creak! creak! creak! went the door on its rusted hinges.

The lady could only see the subdued man bury his face in his clasped hands, and while his frame shook like an aspen leaf, she heard him murmur, amid child-like sobs, "My mother, oh! my mother!" With a silent prayer of thankfulness she approached him:

"But there was one thing my father loved to talk of better than all the rest," she resumed. "It was of the morning you were married, Mr. Strong. 'It was enough to do one's eyes good to look at them,' he would say, 'as they walked up the old church aisle; he, with a proud, manly tread, and she, a delicate, fragile creature, fair as the orange blossoms that trembled in her hair. I remember how clear and confident William's voice sounded through the old church, as he promised to love, protect, and cherish the bright, confiding creature at his side, and I knew he thought, as he looked down upon her, that the winds of heaven would never visit her face too roughly; and then my father would tell us of your pleasant home, and of the bright-eyed boy, and the fair-haired girl that came after awhile to gladden it, and then you know he removed to another part of the country, Mr. Strong, and lost sight of you.'"

Once more the lady paused, for the agony of the strong man before her was fearful to behold, and then in a lower tone she thus spoke:—"I did not forget the promise I made my father previous to his death, that if ever I visited his native place, I would seek out his old friend. But when I inquired for you, they unfolded a terrible story to me, Mr. Strong. They told me of a desolate and broken home.

They spoke of a boy that a father's heart might so well delight in, who had left his home in disgust and despair, for one on the homeless waters; of the gentle, suffering wife, who, faithful to the last, went down with a prayer on her lips for her erring husband, broken-hearted to the grave, and of the fair-haired orphan girl, who followed her mother in a little while. Oh! it is a sad, sad story I have heard of my father's old friend."

"It was I! it was I that did it! I killed them!" cried the old man, lifting his bowed head, and gazing on the lady, every feature expressive of such wild agony, and helpless remorse, that she shuddered at the despair her own words had caused. (Wide, wide open stood the door then!)

A soft hand was laid soothingly upon old Bill's arm, and a voice full of hope murmured, "Even for all this, there is mercy. There is redemption through the atoning merits of Jesus, and you well know your first step towards it. Sign the pledge. In the name of the last prayer of your dying wife, and of the child that sleeps by her side, I ask you, as your friend, Will you do it?"

"I will," said old Bill, while he brought down his closed hand with such force on the rickety pine table, that it rocked beneath it; and a gleam of hope lighted up his features, as he seized the pen and paper the lady placed before him which paper contained a declaration, binding all who signed it, to abstain from the use of intoxicating beverages; and he returned it to her, signed—in bold, legible characters.

He never passed the threshold of the grog-shop again.

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars. At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—Cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

New Edition. Revised by Maj. D. W. Whittle. 12mo, Handsome cloth binding. Price, $1.00.

To a greater extent than any other book, and in an extraordinary recital of facts and interesting incidents, it fully answers that all-important question, "DOES GOD ANSWER PRAYER?"

It also shows that the promises of the Bible are absolutely true, and faithfully fulfilled in the daily lives of those who are constantly trusting in the Lord, and ask His help in their daily anxieties and experiences. It is a book of great comfort and encouragement to Christians, in their doubt, fear, sorrow, or trouble, to trust Him more fully in faith, and show how He who delivered others in times of distress, peril, or solicitude, can hear and deliver them also.

To those who are not Christians, it is a record of undoubted facts from the experiences of individuals now living, proving the real existence and power of God, in controlling circumstances, directing human wills, and all things of faith, showing His nearness and power in daily events of life, and demonstrating that He is not a distant Creator, but ever near at hand.

This book should be in every Christian home, it is invaluable to all Sabbath-school teachers and scholars. It should be given to every child, for it contains pure and healthful instruction to encourage the faith of every one, and aims to lead all to come with more willing minds to learn of the Great Comforter. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price.

CHINESE SUFFERERS FOR CHRIST.

A STORY of fidelity under cruelty and persecution comes from a missionary of the China Inland Mission. He says: Twice over we attempted to plant a mission within the walls or in the district of Kiong-Ning. After we were convinced that the work if done at all must be done by a native Chinaman, an experienced Chinese catechist, Ling Sing-Sing, and four assistants were set apart to plant a mission there. After eleven months of work, in which they had gathered a little congregation of inquirers, a storm of persecution burst upon them. The chapel was pulled down. A band of hired persecutors seized the catechist and three Christian students and hung them up to the branch of a tree by the hair. They flogged them, bidding them "Call now upon your Jesus, and see if he will come to save you." After attempting to suffocate them with a sort of incense, they opened their mouths with a knife, and stuffed a mixture of vinegar and human hair from a barber's shop down their throats. In all this persecution, and in the mockery which followed their being taken down half dead from the tree, these Christians never lost patience or courage.

THE NEED IN JAPAN.

THE Japanese in considerable numbers have made a discovery which is not new, though it is new to them. They find that education alone does not tend to the moral progress of the country. An educated villain is only the more dangerous a villain. He is not improved in morals by his learning. A typical illustration of this general conviction is given by Rev. J. B. Hall of Osaka, Japan, in a letter to the Spirit of Missions. A police magistrate who had formerly been a Confucianist, but had given up that faith without becoming a Christian, was overheard talking with an atheist physician. He said: "At the restoration I thought that what Japan needed to put her morally abreast of the western world was education. I labored hard for the establishment of schools. Now there are good schools in every district of every town and village throughout the empire. We are an educated people. Comparing our list of illiterate people with that of any country of the world, we have as small if not a smaller percentage of persons unable to read than any other nation. But as we have grown more learned our morals have grown worse. I am now thoroughly convinced that more than education is needed. We must have a religion that has life in it, or our country will sink into corruption."

A SURE CURE FOR WEARINESS.

"THERE is nothing which will give a chance for rest to over-tired nerves," says Annie C. Brackett in an able paper in Harper's Magazine on "the Technique of Rest," so surely as a simple religious faith in the over-ruling, wise, and tender Providence which has us in its keeping. It is in chafing against the conditions of our lives that we tire ourselves immeasurably. It is in being anxious about things which we cannot help that we often do the most of our spending. A simple faith in God which practically and every moment, and not only theoretically and on Sundays, rests on the knowledge that he cares for us at least as much as we care for those who are the dearest to us, will do much to give the tired nerve the feeling of the bird in its nest. Do not spend what strength you have, like the climatis, in climbing on yourself, but lay hold on things that are eternal, and the peace of them will pass into your soul like a healing balm. Put yourself in the great everlasting currents, and then you can rest on your oars, and let those currents bear you on their strength."

A FUGITIVE LADY'S LETTER.

THE anxiety naturally caused by the cable reports of rioting in China has been in some measure relieved, so far as the Presbyterian Mission is concerned, by a letter from Mrs. Leaman who, with other Missionaries, was in the district where the rioting was worst. The following is an extract from her letter which is published in the Church at Home and Abroad: Over one month since, the people of Woo-hoo, a city forty miles above us on the Yangtz, became enraged at the Roman Catholic Mission and burned all their buildings. Then the cry was, "Burn all the Romanists," and threats were at once made on Nanking. Soon the threat included all foreigners. We did not feel for a time that the threat meant much, but we wrote to our different consuls and they in turn wrote to our Governor General to take special care of us, which he promised to do. Two weeks of unrest passed by, as we knew not what a day might bring forth.

A kind-hearted Chinaman here and there warned us to fly, as there was great danger. These men were not Christians, but men from whom we had been buying supplies. They told us secretly and as real friends; still we remained on, not willing to leave our beloved work and our dear Chinese Christians. But on Sabbath, May 24, word came to us from semi-official sources, telling us that the women and children ought to be taken away, as a riot was sure to come in a day or two. Oh, what a sad and trying time that Sabbath afternoon was! Mr. Leaman met with a few of the gentlemen of our mission community to decide what to do. We went on with our regular Sabbath School service, but with great fear and trembling, for I did not know what moment we might be attacked.

After the service Mr. Leaman came home and said the gentlemen had decided that all the ladies and children had better go early in the morning. I sent away my dear school-girls to their homes; gathered a few articles together and left our home in the early light of the morning. We did not dare to take much for fear we would attract attention. We were eighteen missionary ladies and fourteen little children. Three of the gentlemen went with us—one of them a physician—as there were a number of sick and weak ones among us.

It is five miles from our home to the steamer landing and often when we get there we have to wait a long time for the steamer—often twelve hours. So we felt anxious for fear an attack should be made upon us before the steamer came. But God stilled the rage of the heathen and kept us in quietness, and the steamer came and carried us away. We did not know that even then the mob was around our homes. They began their work of riot and pillage before we were an hour away from the Mission.

DO THOU THY WILL.

DO Thou Thy will, O God;
 Too long, alas, too long have I done mine,
 And wrought disaster only; now do Thine!
 Thy patient love thus far has born with me,
 And taught my heart Thy better will to see;
 Now would I strive no more to do or be Aught that I may not have, O Lord, in Thee.

Do Thou Thy will, O God:
 I ask not now how long or hard the way,
 If only I may walk with thee always;
 Nor care I what the pain, the shame, the loss,
 Or what the burden of my daily cross,
 If only I may see Thy radiant face,
 And know thy constant love and saving grace.

Do Thou Thy will, O God;
 Though to my shrinking heart and failing sight
 Thy ways seem danger-full and dark as night;
 I would not choose my lot, nor seek again
 To turn aside and shun the path of pain;
 Let me but restfully abide in Thee,
 While Thou dost work Thy perfect will in me.

A BACKSLIDER RESTORED.

THE following incident was related in the course of a recent address by Dr. S. M. Jackson, a Christian physician, who is practising and working for Christ at Brandon, Manitoba: "A gentleman who was formerly in business in London, England, and a member of a Congregational Church there, met with business reverses and came to Canada to try farming. He went out to the far West and took up land a hundred miles beyond Brandon. There, for ten years, he and his wife and children lived a lonely prairie life, and drifting away from God, lost their faith and hope. Not many months ago, the father was afflicted with a malignant disease, and with his wife, went to Brandon seeking medical advice. There he came to us and we earnestly sought to lead him back to God. Returning to his home with the sentence of death professionally pronounced upon him, he could not long rest. He said, 'Wife, I must go back to Brandon, I must see the minister, I can't let it go.' So they journeyed that hundred miles once more to meet the minister, and before he died he found perfect peace in Christ. It was only about two months ago that his widowed wife went back alone to her shanty home on the wide prairie. And yet not alone, for before she left she visited the missionary to tell him that she, too, had found peace in the Saviour. Now, on each Sabbath Day she is gathering together a little Sunday School in her humble abode."

A STRANGE SUPERSTITION.

In pressing upon Christians the duty of not only watching for their Lord, but of keeping alive by faith and prayer their love and consecrated zeal to him, a singular practice was quoted recently by a returned missionary. The speaker was the Rev. W. G. Lawes who has been laboring in New Guinea. He said: Once a year the men of New Guinea set out on a trading expedition. It is an enterprise of great peril, for they are liable to shipwreck on that terrible coast and are also liable to encounter hostile tribes who may attack and murder them and capture their boats and property. There is a prevalent belief that their mothers, wives, or daughters who remain behind have much to do with their safety. If during the absence of their loved ones they keep the fire constantly burning on the hearth the men will return in safety. If through the neglect of the women the fire burns out, the men will suffer loss and probably lose their lives. All the time the expedition is away, the women take no rest, fearing that their fire should go out while they sleep and fearing to commit the duty of watching it to any one else, lest the deputy, not having the same affection for the loved one whose welfare is supposed to depend on the fire being kept up, should drop asleep and allow it to go down. Thus they neglect their personal appearance, their work and all else to attend to that fire, until the shouts of the villagers give the glad news that the expedition is returning. Then they wash themselves, put on their best attire and go forth to meet their husbands and sons. Any woman who during her husband's absence suffered the fire to go out would be held by her neighbors to have proved that she did not love him.

THE LIMIT OF ANGER.

Two men had a quarrel one morning. In the course of the day one of them remembered the Bible command, "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath." Towards evening he knocked at the door of the man whom he had offended, who opened the door, and when he saw who stood there he drew back surprised. Then the first said: "The sun is just going to set." The allusion was understood, the second man's heart was softened, and he replied: "Come in, my dear friend; let us be at peace. Do we not hope to pass eternity together with him who has pardoned us both, and who has taught us this prayer, 'Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us?'"

AN EXORCISM.

A CLERGYMAN had among the members of his church a man whom he had frequently asked to engage in Christian work. The man always declined. He would not pray in the prayer-meetings nor teach in the Sunday School nor do anything for Christ. One Sunday the clergyman preached a sermon on the miracle of the healing of the demoniac (Luke 11:15.) The idle Christian heard the sermon and described it afterward to a blind woman who belonged to the church but had not been present. "I wonder," he said in conclusion, "that the day of miracles has gone by, they must have convinced many people." The blind woman said how glad she felt at the visit and asked him to pray with her before he left. He was surprised and a little confused, but he did not like to refuse. He knelt and prayed with her. "It is almost a miracle," the woman said as they rose from their knees. "The dumb devil is cast out of you at last. Don't let him come back."

FORTY YEARS AFTER.

How the Notorious "Five Points" was Morally Transformed—A Glorious Record of Mission Work—Women and the Gospel.

WHEN the complete history of mission work in this country comes to be written, the women of America will be credited with a glorious record. There is hardly a single mission of prominence, whose operations in the Gospel field have been marked by success, which has not been sustained, if not indeed established, by generous-hearted Christian American women.

One of the most remarkable missions in many respects is that founded forty-one years ago in New York City, and known as the Five Points Mission. In the year 1850, a number of members of the Ladies' Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who were interested in aiding the destitute poor, met for consultation as to the best methods of doing missionary work on a more extended scale than they had hitherto attempted. One of them suggested the opening of a mission at the Five Points. At that time "The Points" was a distinctly dangerous locality, full of vile characters and the resort of thieves, burglars and desperadoes. There were in the neighborhood dark, underground chambers where murderers hid, and where even the police never dared to enter unarmed. Brawls, robberies, and assaults were of daily occurrence; the buildings were of the most wretched and dilapidated sort, and the whole neighborhood teemed with drunkenness, wretchedness, and suffering; yet all this sin and misery were within a stone's throw of Broadway, with its palatial buildings, magnificent stores and almost regal wealth. It was only a few blocks north of the City Hall and the Courts of Justice; and here, in this populous and swarming section, were eighty thousand poor and destitute children, familiar with almost every form of wickedness and crime. The place was full of five and ten-cent lodging-houses, narrow, smoky, ill-smelling alleys, bordered by rooms that rented at from two to ten dollars a month; dark dens where human beings herded together like brutes, where children were born amid surroundings such as heathen degradation could scarcely equal.

It was a brave thing for these Christian ladies to thus undertake to attack sin in its own stronghold. In selecting Five Points (which is located at the junction of what then were known as Little Water, Anthony, Orange, Cross and Mulberry Streets), they could not have chosen a better ground to open the war on vice. In the centre of this swarming focus was a plot surrounded by a rickety fence and called, in derision, Paradise Square. After being thoroughly looked over, it was decided that the "Points" was essentially good mission ground.

The whole Missionary Society took an active interest in the matter and an Advisory Committee was appointed to cooperate. A room was selected on the corner of Little Water and Cross Streets, twenty by forty feet in extent and capable of accommodating two hundred persons and here the Five Points Mission was started. The first Sabbath, the mission-room was filled with a very motley gathering indeed—one which a spectator afterward described as "a more vivid representation of hell" than she had ever imagined. Ragged men and women, children in an apology for garments and guiltless of soap and water, bleared faces along side of the childish ones. It was altogether a strange service that was held on that Sunday, but the mission grew steadily and the Sunday School quickly filled up.

The Rev. Mr. Luckey was assigned to the new mission field and he and his excellent wife began their labors there in the following year. With the little mission room as a centre, they worked and visited in Cow Bay, Murderers' Row, the Den of Thieves and other notorious haunts in and around the Five Points. At that time the worst of all these plague spots was a forbidding structure known as the "Old Brewery," a veritable Bastille of Satan. Built in 1792 and transformed from a brewery to a low-class tenement in 1837, it had gradually become known in that part of the city as the abode of a swarm of criminals of both sexes. There the name of the Saviour of men was never heard save blasphemously, and heaven and religion were unknown. This seething hive of swearing, rum-drinking, sodden humanity gave its character to the whole neighborhood. The police looked askance at it; good men were afraid to enter it and Soon the mission quarters in the single room became too small for the crowds that gathered there to hear the glad tidings, and the ladies began to cast about for better accommodations. The sum of $16,000 was raised and the Old Brewery was purchased in 1852, Messrs. Skidmore, Cornell, Worrall, Curtis, Kirby and Smith, all well known patrons of the Society, being among those who were foremost in supporting the new departure. Mr. Luckey's first experiences, on beginning to visit there, were almost startling. Carrying the Gospel into the enemy's camp, he was met at every turn by volleys of oaths and threats of personal violence from drunken revelers. It was at the same time extremely hazardous for ladies to visit in the neighborhood and attempt to gather in children for the school. But even the Old Brewery and its hardened inmates yielded to the influences at work and ere long the missionary and the ladies were warmly welcomed.

A year later, the old Brewery was demolished and in its stead was erected a handsome and commodious mission building which has been a blessing to the lowly. It cost $36,000 and is a substantial brick structure of five stories with accommodations over the Mission for a number of sober industrious tenants at low rents. It contains a school room, a chapel where service is held daily, and a parsonage. The people of the Five Points flocked to the new mission. Irish, Germans, Italians, Poles, Jews, French, English, Portuguese, negroes and Americans filled the little

But the results of this transformation are more than merely appear on the surface. The army of neglected children have been made clean, and taught to sing the songs of the Saviour, from sin and degradation, and helped to live noble and useful Christian lives. Among the swarm of feminine waifs who were brought to the Mission in infancy, there are many who have since graduated with honor from seminaries and who are now the wives of prosperous citizens and active helpers in the rescue of others. One poor baby waif who was brought in by a drunken mother is a famous soprano in a leading City church and the wife of a rich merchant. No one takes a livelier or more enthusiastic interest in the mission than this excellent lady.

A glance at the work accomplished every year by the Mission will afford some idea of the progress it has made and of its wondrous Christianizing and civilizing influence. During 1890, enough clothing had been distributed to equip a small-sized army. Nine hundred aprons, nearly 2,000 hats and caps, 3,500 dresses for women and girls, 2,100 pairs of shoes, and a great quantity of other miscellaneous garments have been donated by good-hearted people and given to the poor, half-clad dwellers of the Five Points and their children. Vast quantities of food, sent in by generous dealers in different commodities, have also been shared among needy households, many of which would have fared ill at times but for the kind people who remembered their wants and supplied them from their own abundance.

Our artist has caught the scene at the Mission rooms on a day when the children are trooping down stairs after receiving flour, shoes and other supplies. On such occasions the rooms are well worth a visit, if only to see the delight of the little ones on being the recipients of substantial gifts that will keep the hungry wolf from the family door for some days to come at least. They almost roll over each other in the exuberance of their joy.

A feature of the Five Points Mission is the Shoe Club, which was organized five years ago. Its object is the fitting out of shoeless children. Last year it expended over $400 for this purpose. Any person contributing one pair of shoes a year is entitled to membership.

Nearly a million dollars worth of property have already been consecrated to this gracious work in the Five Points—all voluntary offerings. The Mission wholly relies upon the generosity of Christian men and women. Its doors are open day and night to all comers. Its has been to New York what the experiment of the celebrated philanthropist and devout Christian, Dr. Chalmers, was to the West Port of Glasgow—only the work of evangelization here has been on a much broader scale. There are thousands scattered all over the country who rise up and call the Five Points Mission blessed, for it has brought to them true happiness, and light and life. Its Thanksgiving and Christmas dinners, at which hundreds of the waifs are feasted, are seasons of rejoicing for many more than the waifs themselves. Its Fresh Air Fund, Ragged School, House of Industry and other branches of missionary work, have exerted an influence that has made itself felt all over Manhattan Island.

Friends of missionary work everywhere will regret to learn that the Rev. O. R. Bouton, who has been for many years Superintendent of the Mission, is seriously ill. He has been identified with the progress of the work and personally has greatly contributed, by his unflagging zeal and Christian devotion, to its growth and wonderful success. Among the poor of the district he is greatly beloved and the regret at his prostration is general. The desire is universal that the Superintendent (whose portrait we give in this issue) may long be spared to continue the Master's work in the field where he has labored so faithfully in the past.

the Rev. Mr. Pease, a clergyman who had done much missionary work in and around the Five Points, after repeated attempts to secure a hearing inside its grimy walls, abandoned the effort as hopeless.

But these gentle women were not to be daunted by common obstacles. The Cerberus of the Old Brewery was a rum-seller, who also acted as agent for the building and who had stubbornly resisted all previous attempts at missionary work there. He opened the door to the women of the Ladies' Home Missionary Society and was himself one of the first converts to Christ, giving up his vile business and declaring his resolve never to touch or sell another drop of liquor as long as he lived!

ther read nor write. The groceries were open Sunday, as on week days, and were patronized by boys and girls as well as by adults.

God blessed the Mission and under its influence, the barriers of sin were broken down. Since 1852, its progress has been steady and uninterrupted. Thousands of persons have been rescued from the depths and led to better lives; peaceful homes have taken the place of brawling dens; happy children are seen where waifs, homeless and hungry, abounded. Forty years of evangelization have metamorphosed Five Points. Cow Bay and Murderers' Alley have vanished, the rookeries have almost disappeared, and industry and sobriety are the successors of idleness and drunkenness.

BORROWING TROUBLE.

Dr. Talmage's Text is: "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Matt. 6:37.

THE life of every man, woman, and child, is as closely under the divine care as though such person were the only man, woman, or child. There are no accidents. As there is a law of storms in the natural world, so there is a law of trouble, a law of disaster, a law of misfortune; but the majority of the troubles of life are imaginary, and the most of those anticipated never come. At any rate, there is no cause of complaint against God. See how much he hath done to make thee happy; His sunshine filling the earth with glory, making rainbow for the storm and halo for the mountain, greenness for the moss, saffron for the cloud, and crystal for the billow, and procession of bannered flame through the opening gates of the morning, chaffinches to sing, rivers to glitter, seas to chant, and springs to blossom, and overpowering all other sounds with its song, and overarching all other splendor with its triumph, covering up all other beauty with its garlands, and outflashing all other thrones with its dominion—deliverance for a lost world through the Great Redeemer.

I discourse of the sin of borrowing trouble.

First: Such a habit of mind and heart is wrong, because it puts one into a despondency that ill fits him for duty. I planted two rose-bushes in my garden; the one thrived beautifully, the other perished. I found the dead one on the shady side of the house. Our dispositions, like our plants, need sunshine. Expectancy of repulse is the cause of many secular and religious failures. Fear of bankruptcy has upturned many a fine business, and sent the man dodging among the note-shavers. Fear of slander and abuse has often invited all the long-beaked vultures of scorn and back-biting. Many of the misfortunes of life, like hyenas, flee if you courageously meet them.

How poorly prepared for religious duty is a man who sits down under the gloom of expected misfortune! If he pray, he says, "I do not think I shall be answered." If he give, he says, "I expect they will steal the money." Helen Chalmers told me that her father, Thomas Chalmers, in the darkest hour of the history of the Free Church of Scotland, and when the woes of the land seemed to weigh upon his heart, said to the children, "Come, let us go out and play ball or fly kite," and the only difficulty in the play was that the children could not keep up with their father. The McChaynes and the Summerfields of the Church who did the most good, cultivated sunlight. Away with the horrors! they distil poison; they dig graves; and if they could climb so high, they would drown the rejoicings of heaven with sobs and wailing.

You will have nothing but misfortune in the future if you sedulously watch for it. How shall a man catch the right kind of fish if he arranges his line, and hook, and bait to catch lizards and water-serpents? Hunt for bats and hawks, and bats and hawks you will find. Hunt for robin-red-breasts, and you will find robin-red-breasts. One night an eagle and an owl got into fierce battle; the eagle unused to the night was no match for an owl, which is most at home in the darkness, and the king of the air fell helpless; but the morning rose, and with it rose the eagle; and the owls, and the night-hawks, and the bats came a second time to the combat; now the eagle, in the sunlight, with a stroke of his talons and a great cry, cleared the air, and his enemies, with torn feathers and splashed with blood, tumbled into the thickets. Ye are the children of light. In the night of despondency you will have no chance against your enemies that flock up from beneath, but, trusting in God and standing in the sunshine of the promises, you shall "renew your youth like the eagle."

Again: The habit of borrowing trouble is wrong, because it has a tendency to make us overlook present blessing. To slake man's thirst, the rock is cleft, and cool waters leap into his brimming cup. To feed his hunger, the fields bow down with bending wheat, and the cattle come down with full udders from the clover pastures to give him milk, and the orchards yellow and ripen, casting their juicy fruits into his lap. Alas! that amid such exuberance of blessing, man should growl as though he were a soldier on half rations, or a sailor on short allowance; that a man should stand neck-deep in harvests looking forward to famine; that one should feel the strong pulses of health marching with regular tread

THE TWO ROSEBUSHES.

though all the avenues of life, and yet tremble at the expected assault of sickness; that a man should sit in his pleasant home, fearful that ruthless want will some day rattle the broken window-sash with tempest, and sweep the coals from the hearth, and pour hunger into the bread-tray; that a man fed by him who owns all the harvests should expect to starve; that one whom God loves and surrounds with benediction, and attends with angelic escort, and hovers over with more than motherly fondness, should be looking for a heritage of tears! Has God been hard with thee, that thou shouldst be foreboding? Has he stinted thy board? Has he covered thee with rags? Has he spread traps for thy feet, and galled thy cup, and rasped thy soul, and wrecked thee with storm, and thundered upon thee with a life full of calamity? If your father or brother come into your bank where gold and silver are lying about, you do not watch them, for you know they are honest; but if an entire stranger come by the safe, you keep your eye on him, for you do not know his designs. So some men treat God; not as a father, but a stranger, and act suspiciously toward him, as though they were afraid he would steal something.

It is high time you began to thank God for present blessing. Thank him for your children, happy, buoyant, and bounding. Praise him for your home, with its fountain of song and laughter. Adore him for morning light and evening shadow. Praise him for fresh, cool water, bubbling from the rock, leaping in the cascade, soaring in the mist, falling in the shower, dashing against the rock and clapping its hands in the tempest. Love him for the grass that cushions the earth, and the clouds that curtain the sky, and the foliage that waves in the forest. Thank him for a Bible to read, and a cross to gaze upon, and a Saviour to deliver.

Many Christians think it a bad sign to be jubilant, and their work of self-examination is a hewing down of their brighter experiences. Like a boy with a new jack-knife, hacking everything he comes across, so their self-examination is a religious cutting to pieces of the greenest things they can lay their hands on. They imagine they are doing God's service when they are going about borrowing trouble, and borrowing it at thirty per cent., which is always a sure precursor of bankruptcy.

Again: The habit of borrowing trouble is wrong, because the present is sufficiently taxed with trial. God sees that we all need a certain amount of trouble, and so he apportioned it for all the days and years of our life. Alas for the policy of gathering it all up for one day or year! Cruel thing to put upon the back of one camel all the cargo intended for the entire caravan. I never look at my memorandum-book to see what engagements and duties are far ahead. Let every week bear its own burdens.

The shadows of to-day are thick enough, why implore the presence of other shadows? The cup is already distasteful, why halloo to disasters far distant to come, and wring out more gall into the bitterness? Are we such champions that, having won the belt in former encounters, we can go forth to challenge all the future?

Here are business men just able to manage affairs as they now are. They can pay their rent, and meet their notes, and manage affairs, as they now are, but what if there should come a panic? Go to-morrow and write on your day-book, on your ledger, on your money-safe, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Do not worry about notes that are far from due. Do not pile up on your counting-desk the financial anxieties of the next twenty years. The God who has taken care of your worldly occupation, guarding your store from the torch of the incendiary and the key of the burglar, will be as faithful in 1891 as in 1881. God's hand is mightier than the machinations of stock-gamblers, or the plots of political demagogues, or the red right arm of revolution, and the darkness will fly and the storm fall dead at his feet.

So there are persons in feeble health, and they are worried about the future. They make out very well now, but they are bothering themselves about future pleurisies, and rheumatisms, and neuralgias and fevers. Their eyesight is feeble, and they are worried lest they entirely lose it. Their hearing is indistinct and they are alarmed lest they become entirely deaf. They felt chilly to-day, and are expecting an attack of typhoid.

They have been troubled for weeks with some perplexing malady, and dread becoming life-long invalids. Take care of your health now, and trust God for the future. Be not guilty of the blasphemy of asking him to take care of you while you sleep with your windows tight down, or eat chicken-salad at eleven o'clock at night, or sit down on a cake of ice to cool off. Be prudent and then be confident. Some of the sickest people have been the most useful. It was so with Payson, who died deaths daily, and Robert Hall, who used to stop in the midst of his sermon, and lie down on the pulpit sofa to rest, and then go on again. Theodore Frelinghuysen had a great horror of dying till the time came, and then went peacefully. Take care of the present, and let the future look out for itself. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Again: The habit of borrowing misfortune is wrong, because it unfits us for it when it actually does come. We cannot always have smooth sailing. Life's path will sometimes tumble among declivities, and mount a steep, and be thorn-pierced. Judas will kiss our cheek, and then sell us for thirty pieces of silver. Human scorn will try to crucify us between two thieves. We will hear the iron gate of the sepulchre creak and grind as it shuts in our kindred. But we cannot get ready for these things by forebodings. They who fight imaginary woes will come, out of breath, into conflict with the armed disasters of the future. Their ammunition will have been wasted long before they come under the guns of real misfortune. Boys, in attempting to jump a wall, sometimes go so far back in order to get impetus, that when they come up they are exhausted; and these long races in order to get spring enough to vault trouble, bring us up at last to the dreadful reality with our strength gone.

Finally: The habit of borrowing trouble is wrong, because it is unbelief. God has promised to take care of us. The Bible blooms with assurances. Your hunger will be fed; you sickness will be alleviated; your sorrows will be healed. God will sandal your feet, and smooth your path, and along by frowning crag and opening grave sound the voices of victory and good cheer. The summer clouds that seem thunder-charged really carry in their bosom harvests of wheat, and shocks of corn, and vineyards purpling for the wine-press. The wrathful wave will kiss the feet of the great storm-walker. Our great Joshua will command, and above your soul the sun of prosperity will stand still. Bleak and wave-struck Patmos shall have apocalyptic vision, and you shall hear the cry of the elders, and the sweep of wings, and trumpets of salvation, and the voice of Hallelujah unto God for ever.

Your way may wind along dangerous bridle-paths, and amid wolf's howl and the scream of the vulture, but the way still winds upward till angels guard it, and trees of life overarch it, and thrones line it, and crystalline fountains leap on it, and the pathway ends at gates that are pearl, and streets that are gold, and temples that are always open, and hills that quake with perpetual song, and a city mingling for ever Sabbath, and jubilee, and triumph and coronation.

Let pleasure chant her siren song,
'Tis not the song for me:
To weeping it will turn e'er long,
For this is heaven's decree.

But there's a song the ransomed sing,
To Jesus their exalted king,
With joyful heart and tongue,
Oh, that's the song for me!

Courage, my brother! The father does not give to his son at school enough money to last him several years, but, as the bills for tuition and board, and clothing and books come in, pays them. So God will not give you grace all at once for the future, but will meet all your exigencies as they come. Through earnest prayer, trust him. Put everything in God's hand, and leave it there. Large interest money to pay will soon eat up a farm, a store, an estate, and the interest on borrowed troubles will swamp anybody. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

THE KISS OF BETRAYAL.

THE JEWISH PROBLEM.

New difficulties have, it appears from recent cable despatches, been placed in the way of the Russian Jews. Compelled to leave Russia by harsh restrictions and seeking an asylum in England, America, or some other land, they have been stopped at the Polish frontier by German officials. There, they have been subjected to a rigid examination. Those who have a railroad ticket in their possession, and sufficient money to pay their passage to America are allowed to proceed, care being taken that they do go on and do not remain in Germany. All others are sent back to Russia.

Their condition is most pitiable. Even in nations where they are allowed to settle, they are regarded with suspicion and aversion. There is no nation in Europe that has not at some time persecuted this much-suffering people, but better things might have been hoped in this enlightened age. This perpetual hostility breaking out now in one place, now in another, is a remarkable fulfilment of the prophecy: "Among the nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest; but the Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart and failing of eyes and sorrow of mind. And thy life shall hang in doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear day and night and shalt have none assurance of thy life." (Deut. 28:65, 66.)

INNER SIGHT.

THINK soul love is never blind,
But rather gives an added light,
An inner vision, quick to find
The beauties hid from common sight.

No soul can ever truly see
Another's highest, noblest part,
Save through the sweet philosophy
And living wisdom of the heart.

Your unanointed eyes shall fall
On Him who fills my soul with light;
You do not see my friend at all,
You see what hides him from your sight.

I see the feet that fain would climb,
You but the steps that turn astray;
I see the soul unharmed, sublime,
You but the garment and the clay.

CHINA AND THE GOSPEL.

An Imperial Decree for the Protection of derful Change.

VERY year witnesses new triumphs for the Gospel in foreign lands. The latest and one of the most notable in a generation is that which has just been accomplished in China. For many months past, the missionaries and the native native converts had been relentlessly persecuted. Finally, after a futile effort to stem the tide of anti-foreign agitation, it was decided to appeal to the Chinese government. Before such an appeal could be made, however, the storm broke and riots occurred in many of the sea-coast cities, towns and villages. Missionaries were driven away, and several were cruelly murdered. Many native converts also suffered.

This sanguinary climax claimed the attention of the civilized world and an emphatic protest was entered by the European powers and the United States. France, England and Germany warned the Imperial Chinese government that unless measures were taken to secure foreign residents from persecution and personal violence hereafter, the foreign powers themselves would act in the matter. The Imperial Regent, Li Hung Chang, urged the punishment of the offenders in the fatal troubles at Wuhu and Wusuch, and a number of the culprits were apprehended and summarily decapitated. These facts were published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD several weeks ago.

But a still more important step remained to be taken and this was done voluntarily by China, whose ruler, on June 12 last, issued an Imperial decree guaranteeing protection to the missionaries and virtually commending the doctrines of Christianity to the population of the Empire. This remarkable document is one that marks a new and liberal era in the Celestial Empire, that augurs well for the future of its people and for the Christian cause. We give below some of the more important portions of the decree:

The Tsungli Yamen (Counsel of Ministers) has memorialized us in regard to the missionary cases that have occurred in the various provinces, asking that we issue stringent instructions to the Governors-General and Governors to lose no time in devising means for a settlement thereof.

The propagation of Christianity by foreigners is provided by treaty, and imperial decrees have been issued to the provincial authorities to protect the missionaries from time to time. For years peace and quiet have prevailed between Chinese and foreigners. How is it that recently there have been several missionary establishments burned out and destroyed, and all happening at about the same time? This is decidedly strange and incredible.

Let Governors-General and Governors of the Liang Kiang, Hu Kwang, Kiang Su, Anhui, and Hupei issue without delay orders to the civil and military officers under their respective jurisdictions to cause the arrest of the leaders of the riots, try them, and inflict capital punishment upon them as a warning and example to others in the future. The doctrine of Christianity has for its purpose the teaching of men to be good. Chinese converts are subjects of China and are amenable to the local authorities. Peace and quiet should reign among the Chinese and missionaries. The local authorities must protect the lives and property of foreign merchants and missionaries and prevent bad characters from doing them injury.

Let this decree be universally promulgated for the information of the people.

This pronouncement has naturally been received with great satisfaction by the friends of Christianity, and nowhere more so than in the United States. Three American naval vessels, the Charleston, Marion, and Alert, are under orders to sail for Chinese waters. A portrait of Li Hung Chang, the actual ruler of China, (the Emperor being a minor) is given above.

AN ECCENTRIC BEQUEST.

THE French correspondent of a New York journal reports the recent death of a lady at Lyons who has left a remarkable will. Among other curious legacies was one to her medical attendant. To this doctor she bequeathed an old-fashioned bureau which stood in her bed-room. The physician was to have the bureau and all that it might contain at the time of her death, as a token of the testator's appreciation of his skill and care during the ten years of his attendance upon her. On opening the bureau the doctor found, untouched, all the medicine and pills he had prescribed for his patient. It was a strange freak to pay the doctor for advice she did not mean to follow and to buy medicine she never intended to take. Many persons show similar folly in spiritual matters. They contribute to the support of churches and are even regular in their attendance; yet disregard Gospel teaching and neglect the remedy God has provided for sin-sick souls. (Ezekiel 33:31.)

A TEST FOR DIAMONDS.

THE statement that a genuine diamond may be distinguished from a counterfeit by trying if it will shine in the dark, which the real gem ought to do, has often been contradicted. In proof, diamonds unquestionably genuine have been exhibited which were as dark as other stones when excluded from the light. A celebrated New York expert, however, publishes an explanation of the statement, and its contradiction. He says that the genuine diamond will always emit light in the dark if it has previously been exposed to the sunlight or to a strong electric light. As no counterfeit nor any other precious stone possesses this power of retaining light and emitting it afterward while genuine diamonds of every grade and color do possess it, the test is reliable. True piety will bear a similar test. While the hypocrite is disconcerted in the darkness of adversity and abandons his profession, the true Christian exhibits the light of his faith and reflects the glory of God. (Job. 2:10.)

AMERICAN NOBLES.

Few people are probably aware, says the New York Epoch, how many native born Americans are wearers of titles and orders of nobility, in spite of the Constitution. Many American ladies have been raised to the peerage by marriage, but beside these, many men have been decorated by the direct grant of foreign monarchs. Edison has been made a Count, and Pullman, of parlor-car fame, a Marquis, by King Humbert, but neither of them cares to assume the title, and it is only alluded to in a jocular way by their friends. The Pope has conferred the order of Chevalier on several Americans, the most notable being the millionaire Joseph Brannigan, of Providence, R. I. The father of Edgar Saltus was knighted by Queen Victoria and has the right to call himself Sir Francis Saltus, but has never exercised that right. Marmaduke Richardson of New York was made a Count by King Humbert, but he also makes no use of the title. These men show their good taste as citizens of the Republic in not wearing their titles, but it is matter for regret when men who have been really ennobled by becoming through Christ sons of the King of kings do not confess their sonship before men and live up to the privileges it confers. (1 John 3:1-3.)

AN IMPRISONED RAT.

THE keeper of a drug store at Putnam, Conn., is in possession of a living curiosity. He has been in the habit of storing bottles in the yard at the back of his store. Recently, having occasion to replenish his current stock, he had a number of them washed ready for use. To his astonishment, he found that one of the large bottles, the neck of which was about large enough to admit a man's thumb, contained a live rat whose body was three times the size of the orifice. When the bottle was taken up the rat made frantic efforts to escape, but was, of course, unable to get out. The druggist who has studied the ways of rats believes that the rat entered the bottle when very young and finding some kind of nourishment there, remained until it was too fat to get out. Then as rats are known to help each other in trouble, it is probable that the animal's mother visited it daily and in some way contrived to force food into the bottle. The imprisoned rat was well nourished and evidently had not suffered from lack of food. It is now, however, much alarmed and has injured itself in the efforts it has made to escape, since the druggist removed it to his store. Some men have made similarly futile efforts to escape from a position into which they were tempted in their youth by a desire for gain. When late in life they would turn to the Saviour they find that, "it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God." (Mark 10:25.)

CHOCTAW BRIDES.

A DISPATCH from Arkansas to the Times-Star of Cincinnati, reports a number of attempts to evade the law in that State. Some time ago an order was given to expel white settlers from the lands of the Choctaw nation. Many were driven out, and a search was being made for others, when an order was sent from Washington suspending the work of expulsion. Recently another order was sent to resume operations and complete the ejection of intruders. During the interval, however, many of the squatters have married Indian girls. It appears that they discovered that such marriages made them members of the tribe and gave them the right to remain on the lands they had unjustly seized. In some localities as many as thirty marriages had been celebrated in a day, and the husbands are now resisting ejection on the ground that their wives have a legal right to the lands. It is a crafty device and one that will probably lead to much misery. The men who have married simply to gain possession of land are little likely to regard their marriage as sacred and binding. There is reason to fear that many seek union with Christ from similarly sordid motives. Much of the inconsistency of nominal Christians which brings reproach on the Church arises from the fact that the wrongdoers entered the Church, hoping to secure a place in heaven, rather than to be saved from their sins. (Matt. 16:24, 25.)

A SURGEON'S HEROISM.

In the Manhattan Hospital of New York a patient has been lying ill for two months. He is a trainman on the Hudson River Railroad. He was hurt in a railroad accident in June last and it was at first supposed that one of his legs would have to be amputated. The man pleaded hard that the surgeons would not do it if they could save his life without. They now believe it will be possible. The present difficulty is a large wound on the thigh from which a piece of flesh was torn away. That wound will not heal and there is no hope of its doing so in any other way than by grafting skin upon it. When this conclusion was reached, Dr. Bates, the senior surgeon of the hospital, offered his own skin for the purpose, as the man appeared to have no friends. The heroic doctor submitted to the painful operation last week. A large piece of skin was taken from his body and applied to the patient's wounded limb. It adhered at once and is now growing healthily. More skin will be needed and the doctor stands ready to give it whenever it is required. It would appear that the patient needed a friend as much as he did a doctor, and a friend, too, who loved him well enough to suffer for his sake. He has found both in the devoted surgeon whose skill and kindness have been united in the treatment. It is to such a union in the person of the Great Physician that the Christian owes his salvation. The power to save, and self-sacrificing love for the sufferer were alike necessary and both are found in Jesus. (Phil. 2:6-8.)

CHRIST AT THE FEAST.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 30. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 7: 31-44. Golden Text, John 7: 37.

THE Feast of Tabernacles was at hand. His brethren, acting just like numbers of our families act in the present day, gave him reasons why he should go into Judaea; he would be better known, his disciples would rally round him, etc. O how foolish in the eyes of the world are those who are guided by God! They cannot explain or justify themselves. The answer of Jesus was characteristic of his whole life.

"My Time is not yet Come, but your time is always ready," as though to say: "I live to please another; you, only to please yourselves; I have to wait his will; you wait for no one." "The world cannot hate you but me it hateth, because I testify of it that the works thereof are evil. Go ye up unto this feast; I go not up yet unto this feast; for my time is not yet full come." The world hates that which condemns it, the whole bearing of Jesus was condemnatory of the world. Possessing a power which was felt by every one, he was above the patronage of those who would have flattered him, for he received not honor from men. He was independent of its criticisms, free from its influences, in every word and action going counter to its spirit. He sought nothing from man but his willingness to be blest. Utterly disinterested, there was nothing within by which the world could get a hold. Wherever he went he acted as a wet blanket to the self-assertion, conceit, self-indulgence, and unreality of the world; and without saying a word, they felt him to be their superior.

About the middle of the feast, which lasted seven days, Jesus appeared in the temple and taught. During the days of the feast which had already elapsed, his name had been in everyone's mouth, everyone had something to say about the great Teacher and Healer. Now, as he taught in the temple many expressed surprise, saying, "How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?" Jesus had not, like Paul, been brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, or any other great scholar of the day, he had lived like a peasant all his life. He himself answered their inquiries, always speaking as one under authority, and testifying of his Father: "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me." And then he gave a very practical test of the truth of his teaching,

"He that will do His Will shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." It was impossible then, it is impossible now, that any one who honestly desires to do the will of God should be unable to recognize Jesus as his Saviour, or his teaching as divine. God is greater than man. "God is in heaven, and thou upon earth" (Eccl. 5: 2); "the fear of the Lord," the recognition of the relation which we hold to God, "is the beginning of wisdom." Let us bow before him, and yield to him as our God and he will reveal himself. "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me; and he that loveth me shall be loved of my father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him." Who that has any reverence for the majesty of his God could conceive of his making known a truth which deeply concerns his name and his glory, to one who would hold it only in theory, and by his indifference, sin against it?

In his teaching, Jesus did not mince matters; his aim was to bring man to reality. Alluding to the healing of the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda on his last visit to Jerusalem, Jesus said, "Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law? Why go ye about to kill me?" This was strong: "None of you keepeth the law." It was their pride that they kept the law to the very letter. But alas! it was the "letter," and not the Spirit; and the very question, "Why go ye about to kill me?" was a direct accusation of a breach of the Sixth Commandment: "Thou shalt not kill." The very fact that this was true (ver. 25), made them all the more angry. Jesus appealed to them on the very point of their observance of the law, if they, to keep the law, circumcised a man on the Sabbath day, how could they prove that Jesus broke the law in making a man every whit whole on the Sabbath day? The contention concerning Jesus grew hotter, and many were the discussions on his account which took place; some were sure that he was the Messiah, and wanted to convince the rulers of the fact. They marvelled that there should be thoughts of executing such a Teacher; and yet they were puzzled, because his antecedents did not tally with their conceptions of the Messiah. But all this was speculation; if only they had come as inquirers to do the will of God they would have known of the doctrine. In the midst of this controversy concerning him, Jesus, in his teaching, gave utterance to a remarkable assertion, which brought things to a crisis: "Ye both know me, and ye know whence I am; and I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not. But I know him: for I am from him, and he hath sent me."

A warrant for his apprehension was issued; but God's time was not yet,

"No Man Laid Hands on Him." Why? The restraint which was upon them was not of human origin, "His hour was not yet come," and no man could take the Son of Man until the Father permitted. Envy and jealousy were working in the hearts of the Pharisees, and when it was reported to them that the people were saying, "When Christ cometh, will he do more miracles than these which this man hath done?" they joined with the chief Priests in sending officers to take him. Jesus knew it all, but he went on teaching. He knew how safe he was in his Father's hands, and he needed not to escape, nor to make plans for his own safety. It was just then, while the officers were on their way to apprehend him that he said: "Yet a little while I am with you; ye shall seek me and shall not find me; and where I am, thither ye cannot come." Where was he going! Into death, and through death to resurrection, and none could follow him until he had passed through death!

The last day of the feast dawned, and still Jesus was at liberty, and still he taught in the temple. It was fourteen days after the great day of atonement; the types and shadows had all been observed, the sins of the people had been confessed over the head of the scapegoat on that day, but Jesus saw those sins still upon the people. He saw them acting only a farce in this observance, because they were not willing to do the will of God. The people were dwelling in booths in remembrance of God's deliverance when he brought them out of Egypt, but Jesus saw them as deeply rooted in earth and earthly-mindedness as though no such observance were held.

All their Worship was External, and his heart grieved, for he saw the life wanting, and in the depth of his soul stirred the question of the Lord to Ezekiel, "Can these bones live?" (Ezek. 37: 3.) O, it was life, the life of God, they needed, "Jesus cried saying: If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." It was the old word of Isaiah 55: 1. But he added, "He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water. But this he spake of the Spirit, which they that believed on him were to receive: for the Spirit was not yet given, because Jesus was not yet glorified." (R. V.) Those Pharisees, with all their religion, never brought man nigh to God, or God nigh to man, they could not minister life, but were ready to deal out death, even to the Son of God! But here again, everything must wait until Jesus had suffered and risen again. While Jesus was in his flesh which had not yet passed through death, he could not impart the Holy Ghost, it is the crucified, risen and ascended Jesus who gives the Holy Ghost. "The Spirit was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified."

Unable to understand his words, the people yet felt their power. Some said: "This is of a truth the Prophet, (Deut. 18: 15-18); others said: "This is the Christ." O how near some were to salvation and the Saviour; but they began to strive about words, instead of coming to him direct. Why not, like Andrew, Philip, Peter and Nathaniel, (John 1: 35-51) come straight to him? These people, in his very presence, began to argue, "Shall Christ come out of Galilee? Hath not the Scripture said that Christ cometh of the seed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was?" O if they had only asked him, he could have told them he was David's seed, that he was born in Bethlehem, that all the proofs of his Messiahship they asked for were present. But instead of this, they persevered in arguing one with another, "So there was a division among the people because of him." Jesus never left the people as he found them; something happens wherever Jesus comes; men are either converted or offended, they cannot remain neutral. "Some of them would have taken him; but no man laid hands on him." It was no easy thing to take Jesus: it was not possible except the Father permitted. The unsuccessful officers returned, and in answer to the question of the chief priests and Pharisees, "Why have ye not brought him?" they answered,

"Never Man Spake like this Man."

It was impossible to bind a man whose words conquered them, they were powerless in the presence of their Master. The bitter irony of the Pharisees, "Are ye also deceived?" did not recall courage to the officers; and their further appeal, "Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on him?" had no more weight; the officers were unequal to their task. Their last appeal was similar in its effect, "This people who knoweth not the law are cursed."

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

YET a little while I am with you. Eternal destiny frequently depends upon present decision. The Scriptures earnestly urge us to be wise and seek salvation while it may be found. Opportunity does not always abide. "My Spirit will not always strive with man," is but another way of expressing the same idea. Every day we defer definite decision for Christ increases the awful risk and almost before we are aware of it our light becomes dim, then goes out in eternal darkness, and hope has fled and fled forever.

A boy at Sunday School was urged to give his young heart to God. He replied that he intended so to do but not just yet. At college the wee, small voice again urged him to immediate action, but again he deferred—he would wait until he had finished his studies. He entered business and yet the Spirit strove with him, but so engrossed was he that he put the day of salvation off until he should be married and settled in life. In course of time a family of children grew up round about him, and often sang at home the sweet hymns taught them in the Sunday School, thus unconsciously admonishing him of his duty to his God. But now he had a family to provide for, and soon hoped to have enough to retire upon when he would devote himself to the care of his soul. Years passed on. The call was never repeated. When he did retire, he retired from the scenes of this world unprepared, unreconciled, unforgiven, unsaved forever.

Shall flow rivers of living water. A little girl who had found the Saviour was full of joy and gladness. Christ had put a new song in her mouth and she went singing it all about the house. Somehow or other she could not help it. Her mother took her out to call at the house of another lady and when the conversation finally turned on religion our little convert sang from a full heart. Her mother looked at her reprovingly, but she sang the sweet song of Zion which she had commenced, through to the end. When she had finished she ran to her mother, kneeled down and burying her face in her mother's lap, burst into tears. "Oh mother," cried she, "I cannot help singing. You may whip me—you may do anything to me—but it keeps singing in my heart all the time and it must come out. Blessed child! How different from multitudes who are shrinking from Christ's Cross, and hiding the joy of their salvation within their hearts. Oh! that they but knew the joy of God as felt by the little child and they, too, soon would feel that it must come out,—and when it does come out it will continue to spring up from within the soul as from a never-failing fountain, and day in and day out the burden of their story would be:

Oh help me sing for Jesus,
Help me tell the story
Of Him who would redeem us;
The Lord of life and glory.

So there was a division among the people because of him. And if the children of our heavenly King but did their duty there would be to-day a division much more marked and much more decided than that in days of old. But we deny our Master and try to hide our religion from the eyes of our worldly friends. The fact is that we are ashamed of Christ. We dare not confess him for fear of ridicule—and we keep ourselves miserable by vain efforts to effect a satisfying compromise. What a sad mistake we are making. The world wants Christ and we, who could serve our Saviour and our friends by confessing him, keep silent. Who is on the Lord's side, who will serve the King? Come out boldly, own Jesus as your Saviour, and the friends that you now think will laugh at and ridicule you will be among the first to honor and respect you for the manly cause you pursue. After Henry Wilson was elected to the United States Senate he gave his friends a dinner at a noted Boston hotel. The table was set with not a wine glass upon it. "Where are the wine glasses?" asked several, loud enough to remind their host that some of his guests did not like sitting down to a wineless dinner.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Wilson, rising and speaking with a great deal of feeling, "you know my friendship for you and my obligations to you. Great as they are, they are not great enough to make me forget the rock whence I was hewn, and the pit whence I was dug." Some of you know how the curse of intemperance overshadowed my youth. That I might escape, I fled from my early surroundings and changed my name. For what I am, I am indebted, under God, to my temperance vow and my adherence to it. Call for what you want to eat and if this hotel can provide it, it shall be forthcoming. But wines and liquors cannot come to this table with my consent, because I will not spread in the paths of another the snare from which I have escaped." Three rousing cheers showed the brave Senator that men admired the man who has the courage of his convictions.

STARTLED BY A TEXT.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Aug. 30.
John 7: 37: "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink."

WHAT a preacher might say from the pulpit, George Willard might generally be trusted not to apply to himself. He had the habit—by no means an uncommon one—of noticing points in a sermon which suited other people, when he noticed any points at all. But on this bright Sunday morning his attention was arrested at the very outset of the clergyman's discourse by words which seemed to suit him exactly. "If any man thirst," began the preacher. Why, if there was one thing more than another of which George was sure at that moment it was that one; he was thirsty. Not that he ought to have been in that condition for the fact was that just before coming to church George had secretly slipped around the corner, unknown, as he hoped, to his wife, and finding a side-door open, went in and had a drink. But he was thirsty again. In fact that was his normal condition. Everybody about the book-binder's-shop where he worked and all his neighbors, knew that if they wanted to stand treat to some one, there was no need to look further if George Willard was near; George was sure to be thirsty.

The next words, too, struck him as peculiar, coming from the pulpit. George was not a Bible scholar, though in days long gone by he had read chapters, a verse at a time in turn with his brothers and sisters, as they sat around their mother's chair. But he did not recognize the preacher's words as a Bible text. If he had ever read them in the Book, he had forgotten them, as he had forgotten much else that the Book contained. "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink;" that was the clergyman's text. George's first irreverent thought was that something like that would be a good motto for a saloon. Words of that purport he had often heard fall from the lips of a boastful man who owned the saloon where George spent a good deal of his money. But to hear them uttered by a clergyman and in church, that was strange indeed.

The clergyman was talking about the Being whose words they were. He spoke of his power to make good the invitation. He reminded his hearers of the miracle of turning water into wine at the marriage at Cana of Galilee. George knew at once he was speaking of Jesus, for he had often quoted that miracle in his arguments with a Prohibitionist in the same shop with him, who was anxious to make a temperance man out of George.

George listened intently. His wife, his wife's father, and good church people who knew him had upbraided him with his habits and with good reason. They did not know what such thirst as his was. But here it was recognized. The preacher went on to speak of the feverish thirst for wealth and power and fame. Appetites of the soul which were as unappeasable as the thirst of the body. In his limited way George knew something of these, too. In his earlier years, before this thirst of the body mastered and absorbed all other cravings he, too, had meant to rise, had been dissatisfied with his dependent position, his slow progress and his dull prospects, and had struggled, though unsuccessfully, for a place on the next step of the ladder. For every kind of thirst the preacher had one unfailing supply. Christ alone could satisfy; in Christ alone was there the means of assuaging thirst of mind and body.

It was very mysterious, far above George's comprehension, but he listened to the end, and his pulses quickened when at the close, the preacher described the victim, not only satisfied himself, but the medium of satisfaction to others. From him would flow rivers of water for those around him. This was what the poor man wanted. He was often reproached for his indifference to the welfare of his wife and family. But he was not indifferent; he was only weak. He wanted to help them but could not. The preacher evidently believed there was a way out, and George thought that perhaps he might understand it, too, if he knew more.

That was a very sincere inquirer whom the preacher received in his study after the service. George did not spare himself in stating his case. "I am so weak," he said. "I know I ought to hold up but I have given way so long that I am like a child."

"Yes," was the reply, "that is what Jesus perceives. To those who trust him and are ready to make the effort, believing that he is going to help them as he promised, he gives strength. We do not know how it comes, but it does come. You go on trusting and you reach a higher level. You cease to care so much for these lower appetites; you live a higher life. Christ becomes to you all you need."

"I do not see it," George admitted, "but I am ready to try. I know I am not right and I'm going wrong farther and faster every day. I'm sure I cannot reform myself. I've tried too often not to know that. If I can get saved this way I'm ready to try."

"You will succeed," was the cheerful rejoinder. "You have reached a point that many do not reach for a long time. When you know you cannot help yourself and are ready to trust it all to Christ you are safe. He can save you and he will."

"God bless you, sir, for the assurance. He shall have his way with me. I have some hope now."

AN OLD CHURCH IN DANGER.

ONE of the historic landmarks of New Orleans is the fine old church on Camp Street. It is the first building the traveller sees when approaching the city from either up or down the river, as the tower is nearly 150 feet high; but the old church is now in danger of falling. A few years ago an ice manufacturing company began operations in the same square as the church and just behind it. The water is not properly drained off the property, and the result is that it has attacked the brick and mortar of the foundations of the church. An injunction has been obtained by the trustees requiring the Company to stop the flow of water but the Company has not obeyed. The President says there is no way to stop the water without suspending the working of the factory, and so it has bonded the injunction and in consequence the water continues its attacks on the foundation and lower walls of the church and threatens the building with destruction. It may be hoped that the pastor and the officials will not relax their efforts to compel the company to properly drain its factory, and so the old church may be saved. There are many other churches in danger through the spiritual foundations and outer walls being attacked, but the most common and deplorable feature of those cases is that the pastors are the leaders in the sad work and are most active in undermining the foundations by preaching false doctrine. (Gal. 1: 6-9.)

THE WORLD'S METROPOLIS.

STUDENTS of the Word who believe that Jerusalem will yet be the centre of the world's traffic and "the joy of the whole earth," are often confronted with the objection that it is geographically impossible. It is near no harbor and is on no river. A recent traveller in a letter to a contemporary says: "That is so now, but it is known to many, that the Dead Sea is some 1,300 feet below the level of the Mediterranean; (a small atlas that lies on my table gives the depression at 1,292 feet. The same atlas gives the depression of the Sea of Galilee as 682 feet.)" The idea of making a canal from the Mediterranean to the Valley of the Jordan, which was some years ago much discussed (should it one day become a fact) would be the means of bringing "Jerusalem within measurable distance of a seaport."

"Concerning this depression Professor Edward Hull, LL.D., thus writes, on his return from taking command of the expedition sent out by the 'Palestine Exploration Fund' in 1884: The Ghor, or hollow, in which the Dead Sea lies is terminated on the south by cliffs of marl and gravel about 600 feet high, which form the floor of the Arabah southwards as far as the Ain Abu Werideh, a distance of forty miles from their northern margin. The level of these marls at Ain Abu Werideh is a little over that of the Mediterranean, and, as there can be no doubt that they were formed over the floor of an inland lake, which must have stood at this level, it is concluded that the great Jordan Valley Lake once stood at a level of 1,300 feet above its present surface, and occupied the whole valley from the Ain Abu Werideh and the Lake of Huleh (Merom), a distance of 200 miles from north to south."

"Now, does not the 'sure word of prophecy' indicate the means whereby this grand Jordan Valley lake will be restored, bringing life to the, at present, Dead Sea, and fertility to the desert Arabah? Two sources of life and fertility are distinctly foretold by Ezekiel and Zechariah—a river flowing east and west from the watershed of the restored Temple area, and a 'very great valley' opened up from Azel (Ascalon), on the Mediterranean shore, and the Salt Sea. 'And it shall be in that day that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem half of them toward the former sea and half of them toward the hinder sea.' (Zech. 14: 8.)

"May I add that when these predicted changes have taken place, a canal through the obstruction referred to by Dr. Hull at Ain Abu Werideh in Arabia would afford a water-way from the Mediterranean through Palestine and Arabia to the Red Sea? Then Jerusalem would indeed be situated favorably to be the centre of the world's traffic and commerce."

A WAYSIDE CONVERSATION.

THE following incident is related by a Christian worker who has made it a habit to avail himself of every opportunity which comes in his way to testify of Jesus: I was setting out for a lonely journey one dark night, when I heard the sound of voices coming close behind me, and thinking I might find a companion I slackened speed. Presently I heard the shaking of hands and a farewell, and then someone ran on to overtake me. But my heart was soon grieved, for he at once began using bad language. I lifted up my heart to God in prayer for wisdom to speak and use this opportunity to witness for him, and reprove the blasphemer. No sooner asked for than it came, for he began talking about his dog as a "plucky" one, "good as they were made," etc. Now was my time to speak. "How strange it is," I said, "that dogs, horses, birds and all the creatures God has made should fulfil the purpose he had in making them except man and he the highest of all and the most intelligent, goes his own way in opposition to his Maker." The man reflected for a minute and then said decisively "That's so; I know, for one, I am all wrong." And then he told me about his godly father now dead and his pious mother far away, who, he had no doubt, was praying for him at that moment. "Have you found your own way a pleasant and profitable one?" I asked him. "No," he said, "I have been always in trouble. My brother was a good boy and stayed home, and he is keeping my mother, and I am doing nothing for her, dearly as I love her. I wish to God I was a different man." As we walked on I told him how his life could be changed, and he listened intently. Coming to a thick wood, where I knew we should not be disturbed, I proposed that we kneel down and pray together for strength. I believe that prayer will be answered. When he left me he said with tears in his eyes, "I have often tried to reform and failed, but now I have hope. I did not know before that Jesus was willing to help me. I thought I had to get right first. I've more heart now."

LIFE IN HANKOW.*

HANKOW, the city to which Dr. Mackenzie had been appointed, is a field of labor large and grand enough for the ambition of any man whose heart is fired with an intense desire to proclaim the glad news of salvation to large numbers of his fellow-men. This great mart, with the adjoining cities of Wuchang and Hanyang is known in the language of the "Flowery Land" as the heart of the Empire. It is situated in the middle of the central province of Hupch, at the point where the two great rivers, the Yang-tse and the Han unite. Hankow is the great commercial city of Central China, and the export tea trade is above the enormous figure of fifteen million dollars a year. The channel of the two rivers is at this point usually covered by a perfect forest of masts, the number of vessels of all sizes being estimated at from eight to ten thousand. The Yang-tse is here more than a mile in breadth, and deep enough at the summer season to allow of the passage of the largest vessels of war and steamers of all trading companies.

The commencement of mission work at Hankow dates from the year 1861, when the port was opened for foreign trade and the Rev. Griffith John, with his colleague the Rev. R. Wilson settled with their families in two Chinese houses, and commenced the daily work of tract-distribution and preaching, both on the streets and within the walls of their homes. Toward the end of 1866 it was decided to commence medical work in connection with the mission. A hospital and dispensary were erected and the lame, the blind, and those who were stricken with various diseases which the medical skill of Chinese doctors could not heal, came in crowds to the foreign physician. Such was the field of labor to which Dr. Mackenzie had been appointed; and a grand opening it seemed for one desirous of consecrating his medical skill to the Lord's service.

Attacked by Rioters.

In a letter to his brother, some months afterwards Dr. Mackenzie wrote: "At two o'clock on the afternoon of Monday last, we started for Hiau-kan, the native place of our helper Wei, who had often urged us to visit it. The party consisted of Mr. John, myself, Siau, our hospital preacher, Wei and his brother, with another Christian named Chia. About nine o'clock on Tuesday morning, we reached the village which was the end of our water journey. I had crept out of our little cot to get some fresh air and while standing the people caught sight of the foreigner. They began assembling along the water's edge, forming by the time our boat came to a standstill, a crowd of several hundred men and boys. . . . We walked on from this village with our coolie carrying our bedding. We were within two or three miles of Wei's home when we found the behavior of the people begin to change. From being simply curious they began to be rude, rushing alongside of us in the ploughed fields, and shouting in great excitement. The farther we advanced the worse it grew; from shouting it came to treading on one's heels, and pushing. We turned and faced the people several times and Mr. John expostulated with the seniors in a way that usually has the desired effect; but on this occasion they rather encouraged the boys, and were all evidently bent on mischief. Presently pelting began; there were fortunately no stones at hand, but the earth being dry, the ploughed fields were covered with hard clods and these soon began to fly about our heads. At this stage I took off my spectacles, and pulled my soft felt hat well over my ears, which protected me a good deal. Mr. John was struck on the mouth with a hard lump of clay, which made the blood flow freely, and almost caused him to faint; and soon afterward another piece cut his scalp at the back of his head. I guarded my face with my arms, my hat well protected my head, and I received most of the blows on my body. We still went on, following Wei, who walked like a prince, calm and fearless, with his head up, and apparently not a bit troubled.

"A little way in front of us was a creek which we had to cross by means of a small plank bridge; as we approached it, we saw that the opposite bank was lined with people. We stopped for a moment to consider whether we should go on, but the leaders of the attack were evidently determined that we should proceed, wishing to get rid of us over the creek, which formed the boundary of their district. Seeing our hesitation, they began to drag us down to the water's edge; and at this moment we might have been killed for we were the centre of a howling, infuriated mob of about a thousand men and boys bent on mischief and dragging us about in every direction. We were several times separated. I was pushed down once, but Mr. John and the native Christians kept the crowd off me. The people's conduct was explained by their shouts of 'Go back to Hankow and preach your Jesus doctrines there; you shall not come here.' We felt no desire to use force in opposing them, and we had good sticks with us; but had we used them it would have been the signal for our instant destruction, for the mob was just ready to take advantage of any such action on our part.

"When they had succeeded in dragging us down to the water's edge, Mr. John set his foot on the bridge, but as he did so the crowd on the opposite bank sent a shower of missiles upon us showing that they were determined that we should not cross. So our native friends uniting, we made a rush backward, and reaching the top of the bank, made our way across country, and the people did not follow us very far. The Christians behaved nobly all through, one man standing in front of Mr. John, trying to ward off the blows."

HAPPINESS.

A COMPANY of gentlemen together were asked whether any of them was happy. A merchant of very large resources said: "I thought if I gained a certain amount of money I should be thoroughly contented. I have gained that amount—I have gained three times that amount. I have my lands, and my storehouses, and everything that the world can give me; but somehow I am not happy." And there was a poet there, in the group, who said: "I have won the favor and applause of the world. I have written a great many things that met with the admiration and approval of men; yet, amid all my literary success, I am very far from being happy." There was a Christian physician in the group, who said: "I thought that, in the success of my practice, I might get all I needed. I have had very large success, but I found out, amidst all this success, that I was a sinner, and, in the wretchedness of my soul, I went to Jesus Christ and got his pardon, and I feel happy."

THE TRUE "HIGHER LIFE."

WE are discussing the questions of holiness and consecration. Some of us use one class of terms and similes, and others a different phraseology. The most common is called the "Higher life." There are two kinds of "Higher life" people—the one we like and the other we dislike. Those who boast much of the possession of it, who run about with a Bible conspicuously in their hand, forcing their ecstatic experiences upon people on all occasions, ever on the search for meetings and Bible-readings, impatient with ordinary Christians, are to us more and more distasteful. We do not find them engaged in Sabbath Schools, or regular at prayer-meetings, or to be depended on for help in church movements. It is their religion to feel good and to tell others how good they feel. We would not give the shoes of one of the old-fashioned Christians for fifty of these religious gadabouts. For the most part, their head is as soft as their heart. Their coming is to us a grief and their departure a rapture.

The "Higher life" which we admire is that which, putting full trust in God, goes out to work for him; does not talk much about itself, but a great deal about Christ and the attractiveness of his religion. We know scores of them, hard at work. You may always depend on them. They are always to be found at the devotional meetings. They contribute liberally of their money, instead of taking their service out in talk and prayer.

The enthusiasm and perpetuity of their Christian doing tells their elevated experience more than though their lips announced it. That is the kind of "Higher life" that we admire—yea, that is the highest. We have but little interest in Christian people who go about telling how much they have of the love of God, yet doing nothing or little to evidence that fact. We have heard of half-grown school-boys who boast of how many slices of bread they have eaten—some of them ten, some of them twenty-four. We have more admiration for a man who will eat two or three slices and put the strength derived therefrom into practical effectiveness. There are many persons in this day advocating what they call the "Higher life." We advocate the highest.

THE NEGLECTED SWORD.

THERE is a sword that never wears out. Its edge is never blunted. On its blade no rust ever yet has gathered. It cuts to heal. It smites to save. It kills to make alive. It is the sword of the Spirit. Now is the time when it calls for strong hands and brave hearts to wield it. It has the property of giving skill to the untaught and valor to the once fearful and unbelieving. It can be held by a child and do execution. It may be thrust into the right place, when love directs, and made to flash with the light of its own brightness, even when there be the darkness of an almost despairing eye to trace its pathway to its object. This sword, however, can do nothing while left in its scabbard. It is for use and not for ornament. Soldiers of Christ, Knights of the Cross, what is the world waiting for? Is it not for aggressive action? The battle-cry is sounding. Bugles are blowing. Trumpets call. The Great Captain gives the word "Forward." The Church has been cold, timid, compromising. Religion has degenerated into a sentiment. It has lost in part the power of conviction. Ministers and newspapers claiming to be orthodox and religious have surrendered to a false liberality. They have yielded up the very ark of salvation to the Philistines. They have mumbled a pleasing rhetoric as a substitute for the old Faith of Calvary. They have betrayed the Master. Is it not high time, when the land is fainting under its heavy burdens, and the people are lost in the tangled wilderness of worldly disappointment, and corruption reeks in high places and in dark places, to bring back the power of the Bible to bear on personal character, on family training, on political morals, and on the Church of the Living God? History has its lessons. When nations have apostatized from faith and lost their way, the Bible has restored and delivered. That has the sovereign virtue. That and that alone can work reformation where all true reformation must begin—in the hearts of the people. Let the sword of the Spirit descend on our land, and our worst foes will retreat.

FAMILY RELIGION.

THE first thing to do with a lamb is to put it in the arms of the Great Shepherd. Of course we must observe natural laws. Give a child excessive meat diet and it will grow up sensual; catechism three times a day, and sixty grains in each dose won't prevent it. Talk much in your child's presence about the fashions, and it will be fond of dress, notwithstanding all your lectures on humility. Fill your house with gossip, and your children will tattle. Culture them as much as you will, but give them plenty of money to spend, and they will go to destruction.

But while we are to use common sense in every direction respecting a child, the first thing is to strive for its conversion, and there is nothing more potent than family prayers. No child ever gets over having heard his parents pray for him. We had many sound thrashings when a boy, but the most memorable scene of all was father and mother at morning and evening prayers. We cannot forget it, for did we not often squirm around on the floor, and look at them while they were praying? Your son may go to the ends of the earth, and run through the whole catalogue of transgression but he will remember the family altar, and it will be a check, and a call, and perhaps his redemption.

Family prayers are often of no use. Perhaps they are too hurried. We have so much before us of the day's work, that we hustle the children together. We get half through the chapter before the family are seated. We read as if we were reading for a wager. We drop on our knees, and are in the second or third sentence before they all get down. It is an express train, with amen for the first depot. We rush for the hat and overcoat, and are on the way to the store, leaving the impression that family prayers are a necessary nuisance, and we had better not have had any gathering of the family at all. Better have given them a kiss all around; it would have taken less time and would have been more acceptable to God and them.

Family prayers often fail in adaptedness. Do not read for the morning lesson a genealogical chapter, or about Samson's setting the foxes' tails on fire. For all the good your children get from such reading you might as well have read Chinese almanac. Rather give the story of Jesus and the children climbing into his arms, or the lad with the loaves and fishes, or the sea of Galilee dropping to sleep under Christ's lullaby. Stop and ask questions. Make the exercise so interesting that little Johnny will stop playing with his shoe-strings, and Jenny will quit rubbing the cat's fur the wrong way. Let the prayer be pointed and made up of small words, and no wise information to the Lord about things he knows without your telling him. Let the children feel they are prayed for. Have a hymn if any of you can sing. Let the season be spirited, appropriate and gladly solemn.

Family prayer also fails when the whole day is not in harmony with it. A family prayer, to be worth anything, ought to be twenty-four hours long. It ought to give the pitch to all the day's work and behavior. The day when we get thoroughly mad, upsets the morning devotion. The life must be in the same key with the devotion.

BETTER THINGS AHEAD.

DR. MUHLENBERG wrote the beautiful hymn: "I would not live away." Some say that in his old age, he regretted having written that hymn. We do not know why he should regret it. We do not believe there is a man who has not sometimes the same expression breathing through his soul in one shape or in another. We would not want to live always here. The world does very well for eighty or ninety or a hundred years, residence; but who could bear to think of an eternal residence in this world as it is? of 3,000 summers, of 3,000 winters? We know there are some Christians—and many of the best Christians—who suppose this world is to be heaven, only it is to be remodelled and entirely changed through the fires of the last day, and go through such a reconstructing process as God, with his almighty hand, may effect; but we cannot realize it. We have not very much faith in it. The summers would need so much cooling off, and the winters so much warming up, and so much sharpness would have to be taken out of the northeast winds, and so many things that are wrong or hostile in the atmosphere would have to be changed, that we have no idea that this world will ever be fixed up for spiritual and eternal residence. But there is a land of light and joy and blessedness for all those who seek after God and are at peace with him. The ancients used to think that on the western border of the earth there were Elysian fields and islands of the blessed, and heathen poets wrote many beautiful things about them. But it is not a mere guess with the Christian; it is certain faith with him as he sings:

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood,
Stand dressed in living green;
So to the Jews old Canaan stood,
While Jordan rolled between.

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. John L. Scudder, pastor of the People's Tabernacle in Jersey City, N. J., expects to have four sections of his People's Palace ready for occupation this Fall.

President Kruger of the Transvaal Republic recently refused to give his patronage to a public ball on the ground that dancing was Baal worship. He is a sturdy Presbyterian.

The Methodists of Washington have provided for the entertainment of three hundred of the five hundred delegates who are expected to attend the approaching Ecumenical Council.

Rev. B. Fay Mills hopes to commence his evangelistic work this Fall with a series of services at Terre Haute, Ind., on September 1, in which all the evangelical Churches in the city have agreed to unite.

The Presbyterians of Louisiana and Mississippi who have been protesting against the lottery have been taunted with going into politics, but, as they justly contend, their action is founded not on politics but morality.

The International Medical Missionary Society, of which the eminent Dr. Dowkontt is Medical Director, has now a woman's branch regularly incorporated. It will have the oversight of the female students preparing for foreign mission work and will organize branch societies for the collection of funds.

The new President of the Wesleyan Conference in England is the Rev. Thomas Bowman Stevenson, D.D. He is an ardent philanthropist and has been engaged for more than twenty years in laborious work in London, rescuing the young, providing nurses for the poor and carrying the Gospel to the slums. He is also one of the ablest and most eloquent preachers in the denomination.

The Bethany Institute, New York, has just issued its nineteenth annual report. Its object is the training of women for Christian work at home and abroad. During its history nearly four hundred workers have been prepared there for Christian service. Some of them are now laboring in Japan and other lands and others in New York and other large cities. A copy of the report may be obtained from Rev. A. G. Ruliffson, 107 East 17 Street, New York.

Dr. R. W. Dale, of Birmingham, England, who has many friends among our readers, has been prostrated by serious illness. He overtasked his strength in the management of the affairs of the International Congregational Council, recently held in London. His physicians insist on a period of complete rest and on his curtailing his pastoral and literary work after his recovery. Dr. Dale is best known among us by his famous course of lectures at Yale in 1877.

Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., delivered the opening address at the Summer School of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy on August 8. He contended that the rapid progress which Rationalism and open infidelity made in former days was due to the fact that no well organized school, such as that of the Institute, was in existence to meet the attacks of scientific men on the truths of Christianity. The sessions of the Institute are being held at Avon-by-the-Sea, N. J.

Pastor C. H. Spurgeon is reported to be making slow, but steady progress toward recovery. His physicians dread another relapse, but speak more hopefully now than they have done at any time since his seizure. Mr. Spurgeon is profoundly touched by the expressions of sympathy which have been reported to him. Hearing how many people of all creeds and on both sides of the Atlantic were sympathizing with him and praying for his recovery, he said, with deep solemnity, "God bless them all."

The International Christian Worker's Association will hold its Sixth Annual Convention at Washington, D. C., Nov. 5-11. This early intimation is given to enable the many readers of this journal who will want to attend, to make arrangements. Former conventions of the Association have been exceedingly helpful to Christian workers, affording opportunities for consultation and comparison of methods of work. The meetings will be held in the First Congregational Church. Further information may be obtained by addressing the Secretary Rev. John C. Collins, First National Bank Building, New Haven, Conn.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

A Mormon Secession—Earthquake in California—The Hot Wave—Russia's Famine—The Negro Question—The World's Fair Progressing—General News Notes.

SINCE the movement of the Mormons toward Mexico, the attention of the leaders of that sect has been directed to negotiations with Joseph Smith, Jr., the present head of the Church, for the removal of the Mormon headquarters to Ogden, Utah. Since the abandonment of plural marriages, the Mormons see no great difference between the two branches. The Josephites, as the new branch which favors single marriage, is called, finds favor with most Mormons for the reason that by pronouncing for single marriage, all trouble with the Government is avoided. It is said there are now thirty thousand monogamous or single-marriage Mormons in the United States, half the number being in Iowa. The Josephites propose to erect a great tabernacle at Ogden, and expect to stem the stampede to Mexico by bringing over many of the polygamous Mormons to their standard. They also expect to save the church property, valued at $500,000, which was confiscated by the Government.

The Cabinet on Vacation.

THE National Capital is for the time being without a single Cabinet officer. Attorney-General Miller was the last to leave. He has gone to Bennington, Vt., as the guest of Secretary Proctor. Secretary Blaine is still at Bar Harbor; but in the early fall he will join President Harrison as the guest of Stephen B. Elkins in West Virginia. The Presidential party will spend the time in deer-hunting on Cheat Mountain. All the other members of the Cabinet are passing their vacations at different watering-places.

Progress of the World's Fair.

RAPID progress is being made in the construction of the buildings for the World's Exposition. To-day we give an illustration of the Administration building, which is the gem of all the architectural jewels of the Exposition. Constructed of material to last but two years, it will cost $650,000. Although it covers a space but 250 feet square, yet it is one of the noblest achievements of modern architecture. It will occupy the most commanding position on the Exposition grounds. The building consists of four pavilions, 84 feet square, one at each of the four angles of the square of the plan, and connected by a great central dome, 120 feet in diameter and 260 feet high. In the center of each facade is a recess, 93 feet wide, within which is a grand entrance to the building. The first story is of the Doric order, of heavy proportions. The second story, with its lofty colonnade, is of the Ionic order. Externally, the design is divided into three principal stages. The first stage consists of the four pavilions, corresponding in height with the buildings grouped about, which are 65 feet high. The second stage is of the same height, and is a continuation of the central rotunda, which is 175 feet square. The third stage is the base of the great dome, 40 feet high and octagonal in form, and the dome itself rising in graceful lines, richly ornamented with heavily molded ribs and sculptured panels, and having a large glass skylight. The interior effects will be even more gorgeous than the exterior, resplendent with carvings, sculptures and immense paintings. The new Secretary of the Board of Lady Managers of the World's Fair, Mrs. Susan G. Cooke, (whose portrait we publish on this page) is the daughter of one of the leading surgeons of Vermont. She is a lady of much intellectual ability and the widow of a New York merchant. For the last seven years she has lived in Tennessee and has been one of the Managers of the Brooklyn Orphan Asylum, besides being engaged in other charitable work. Mrs. Cooke is a patient and sweet-tempered woman, qualities that will unquestionably prove useful in her new office.

Bringing Rain Artificially.

A "RAINFALL expedition" from the Department of Agriculture made two experiments at Midland, Tex., last week with the apparatus invented by Secretary Rusk for bringing rain. Several bombs were exploded by means of electrical dynamos, and about ten hours after the explosion, clouds gathered and a heavy rain fell, extending several miles. It is not claimed that the explosions actually produced the storm, but that they were instrumental in precipitating the moisture and greatly increased the storm's intensity, and the quantity of the rainfall. It was the first good rain in that section for several months.

A Great Hot Wave.

THE Eastern and Middle States were visited by a torrid wave, accompanied by great humidity on the tenth and eleventh insts., causing widespread suffering, and largely increased mortality. In New York, Boston, Providence, Baltimore, Philadelphia and other eastern cities, the mercury averaged ninety-five degrees with eighty-three per cent of humidity. The records of the Signal Service Bureau show that the wave was the hottest that has come at this season in ten years. In some parts of New England, work was suspended in the fields and villages, the mercury indicating over 100 in the shade. In the larger cities there were many deaths from sun-stroke, and the hospitals were crowded with cases of prostration.

Earthquake in California.

A SEVERE earthquake occurred in the rocky region at the head of the gulf of California last week. This territory is owned by the Cocopah tribe of Indians. The first symptoms of seismic disturbance were the appearance of nearly a hundred mud volcanoes in an active state of irruption. The atmosphere became dense and stifling and many infants were suffocated. Then came a thunder-storm at the close of which a tidal wave rushed upon the coast, inundating farms and sweeping away cattle, horses and grain. Five rapid earthquake shocks followed and the air was darkened with dust. Every shock was accompanied by a terrifying rumble. The frightened Indians fled to the interior of the country, many perishing from fright on the way. Those who arrived in Arizona say the tidal wave was fully a hundred feet high. In Sonora on the Colorado river, a great change has appeared on the face of the country since the earthquake. A small stream has become a mighty river, the rocks have sunk out of sight and high eminences are levelled. The Indians predict another earthquake soon, and say all the natural signs indicate it.

Baron Hirsch's Colonization Project.

BARON HIRSCH's chief lieutenant, Mr. Arnold White, now in London, has been interviewed concerning the colonization scheme of the millionaire philanthropist, whose chief ambition now is to help the persecuted Hebrews. Mr. White says that the Baron is strongly opposed to any emigration to Palestine, and believes that the Jews will find it another Poland. The climate is unsuitable for Russian Jews. Besides, as Russia is almost certain in course of time to acquire Constantinople, the Jews in Palestine would be subjected to equal hardships, being brought again under Russian rule. The practical idea would be to emigrate to the Argentine Republic, Brazil, Australia, or Canada and there form colonies. It would take twenty-five years to accomplish the work outlined and not more than 30,000 emigrants will be interested at the start, this number to be increased the second year to fifty less than half a crop, wheat being 100,000,000 bushels short, and rye 300,000,000. Instead of being a great export country, Russia, this year, must import 250,000,000 bushels of grain, to avert wholesale destitution and plague. One point that militates against Russia's ability to do this is the fact that the government credit is in a wretched condition. Not since 1840 has such a threatening state of affairs been known in the Czar's dominions, and the situation is greatly aggravated by internal agitation and discontent.

The New Diplomatic Mission.

Richard Cotts Shannon, of New York, has been appointed U. S. Minister to Costa Rica, Nicaragua and Salvador. This is the last new South American Mission created by Congress. Mr. Shannon is a native of Maine, and during General Grant's administration was Secretary of Legation in Brazil. He is considered an authority on South American affairs. He served through the civil war with distinction and afterwards went to South America, where he now has extensive business relations. Mr. Shannon recently gave to Colby University, Me., a fine building for an observatory and scientific laboratory.

NEWS NOTES.

The British East African Company is about to place a regular line of steamers on Lake Victoria Nyanza.

J. C. Wynn, the manager of the Georgia Farmers' Alliance Exchange, is a defaulter to the extent of $20,000. An investigation is now in progress.

George Jones, editor of the New York Times, died at Poland Springs, Me., on Wednesday, Aug. 12, of a complication of diseases. He was eighty years of age.

Fred. Douglass has retired from the Haytian Mission, as was foreshadowed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD several weeks ago. His indecision during the recent massacres by Hyppolite gave rise to much comment.

The Post-Master-General is considering the expediency of extending the free Postal delivery system to country districts all over the Union, and may submit a proposition to that effect to Congress when it meets.

The National Capital Savings Building and Loan Association of North America, after having received $200,000 from confiding patrons and turned most of it into the pockets of its officers, has been exposed by the Post Office authorities as a fraud, and its president and vice-president arrested. It had victims all over the Union.

At the meeting of the Executive Committee of the National Association of Democratic Clubs in New York, last week, it was made clear that the Democrats South and West are resolved to make the fight next year on the tariff question and to subordinate the silver issue. The Western Germans particularly are strong in opposing any departure in favor of free silver.

A wonderful underground cave, said to rival in extent and beauty the famous Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, has been discovered on a farm belonging to Geo. Unangst, West Mansfield, Logan County, O. One of the stone chambers is 40 x 50 feet in height, and a hall in the cave is 600 feet long and lined on each side by recesses that look like rooms, and with a lake at either end.

The remains of Pizarro, the Conqueror of Peru, have been removed from a vault under the altar at Lima, Peru, to the chapel of the Viceroy in the same building. They are in an excellent state of preservation although it is 350 years since Pizarro died. The hands and toes have been carried off by relic-seekers. The body bears the marks of the wounds Pizarro received in battle. He was about seven years old when he died.

A tornado in Iowa did considerable damage to crops and other property at Ottumwa, Leola, Hanocton, Davis City, and other places. A camp-meeting in progress at Davis City was broken up by the furious gale; the grove became dark as night, many trees fell, and the air was full of broken branches; the Tabernacle was crushed under the weight of two giant oaks and all the seats and stands were demolished. Fortunately no one was killed. Tornadoes are reported from several points in Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Pennsylvania with great damage to property.

A Frightful Excursion Disaster.

ON Wednesday, August 12th, the steamer Crystal Stream, and the excursion barge Republic, went from Brooklyn, N. Y., to Cold Spring on the Hudson River, with a large party of workmen and their wives and children. Coming home, a squall loosened the roof of the barge and it fell on the dancing deck upon the hundreds below without a moment's warning. Thirteen persons were killed outright and over forty wounded. It is claimed that the timbers of the barge were rotten. Some of the dead victims were found clasped in each other's arms. There were fully a hundred imprisoned under the fallen roof when help came to rescue them. The dead and injured were conveyed to Oyster Bay village. Most of the victims were Germans.

Famine in Russia.

ALTHOUGH it seems to have been the policy of the Russian government to conceal the fact, there is now no doubt that a very serious famine exists in that country. In many districts, peasants are dying of hunger, while the survivors attempt to sustain life on grass, boiled in water. Cases have come to light, where the poor laborers have tried to sell their children for food. The grain reserve in the country has been used up, and the present harvest is

HELP TO THE CONVERT.

"And when he thus had spoken, he cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with graveclothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him, and let him go."—John 11:43, 44.

IN many things our Lord Jesus stands alone as a worker. No other can unite his voice with the fiat which says, "Lazarus, come forth." Yet in certain points of gracious operation the Master associates his servants with him, so that when Lazarus has come forth he says to them, "Loose him, and let him go." In the raising of the dead he is alone, and therein majestic and divine; in the loosing of the bound he is associated with them, and remains still majestic; but his more prominent feature is condescension.

Beloved, our Lord Jesus still delights to associate us with him as far as our feebleness and folly will permit. In his present work of bringing sinners to himself, he counts it a part of his reward that we should be laborers together with him. In his working people he beholds the travail of his soul as well as in the sinners whom they bring to him; thus, he has a double reward, and is as much glorified in the love, and pity, and zeal of his servants as in the harvest which they reap. Jesus is glad to save sinners at all, but most of all glad to save them by the means of those already saved. Thus he blesses the prodigal sons and servants of the household at the same moment. It is more honorable to save a soul from death than to rule an empire. Such honor all the saints may have.

I. First, then, this chapter records A Memorable Miracle.

Perhaps that writer is correct who speaks of the raising of Lazarus as the most remarkable of all our Lord's mighty works. There is no measuring miracles, for they are all displays of the infinite; but in some respects the raising of Lazarus stands at the head of the wonderful series of miracles with which our Lord astonished and instructed the people. Yet I am not in error when I assert that it is a type of what the Lord Jesus is constantly doing at this hour in the realm of mind and spirit. Did he raise the naturally dead? So doth he still raise the spiritually dead. Did he bring back a body from corruption? So doth he still deliver men from loathsome sins. The life-giving miracle of grace is as truly astounding as the quickening miracle of power.

I notice the memorableness of this miracle in the subject of it, because the man had been dead four days. Probably the sisters had perceived the traces of decay upon the body of their beloved brother before they buried him, for it is more than supposable that they delayed the funeral as long as possible under an undefined hope that perhaps their Lord would appear upon the scene. In that warm climate are very rapid, and before many hours the loving sisters were compelled to admit, as Abraham had done before them, that they must bury their dead out of their sight. It was their full conviction that the terrible devourings of corruption had commenced. What then can be done? Surely it were an easier task to make a new man altogether out of the earth than to take this poor corrupted corpse which has turned to worms' meat and make it live again. This was the stupendous miracle of divine power which our glorious Lord performed upon his friend Lazarus.

The Ravages of Decay

Now, there are some men who are symbolized by this case: they are not only devoid of all spiritual life, but corruption has set in; their character has become abominable, their language is putrid, their spirit is loathsome. The pure mind desires to have them put out of sight; they cannot be endured in any decent society. They are so far gone from original righteousness as to be an offence to all, and it does not seem possible that ever they should be

Restored to Purity,

honesty, or hope. When the Lord in infinite compassion comes to deal with them and makes them to live, then the most sceptical are obliged to confess, "This is the finger of God!" What can it be else? Such a profane wretch become a believer! Such a blasphemer a man of prayer! Such a proud, conceited talker, receive the kingdom as a little child! Surely God himself must have wrought this marvel!

The next notable point about this miracle is the manifest human weakness of its worker. He who had to deal with this dead man was himself a man. I do not know of any passage of Scripture wherein the manhood of Christ is more frequently manifested than in this narrative. When our Lord had seen Mary's tears, we read that he groaned in spirit and was troubled. Thus he showed the sorrows and the sympathies of a man. We cannot forget those memorable words, "Jesus wept." Who but a man should weep? Weeping is a human speciality. Jesus never seems to be more completely bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh than when he weeps. Next, our Lord made an inquiry—"Where have ye laid him?" He veils his omniscience: as a man he seeks information—where is the body of his dear departed friend? Even as Mary in after days said about himself, "Tell me where thou hast laid him," so does the Lord Jesus ask for information as a man who knows not. "Jesus therefore again groaning in himself cometh to the grave." When he has reached the spot he sees a cave whose mouth is closed by a huge stone, and now he

Seeks Human Assistance.

He cries to the crowd, "Take ye away the stone." Why, surely he who could raise the dead could have rolled away the stone with the self-same word! Yet, as if needing help from those about him, the man Christ Jesus reminds us again of Mary at his own sepulchre, saying, "Who shall roll us away the stone?" That done, our Lord lifts up his eyes to heaven, and addresses the Father in mingled prayer and thanksgiving.

How like a man is all this! He takes the suppliant's place. He speaks with God as a man speaketh with his friend, but still as a man. Did not this condescending revelation of the manhood make the miracle all the more remarkable? The time came when the flame of the Godhead flashed forth from the unconsumed bush of the manhood. The voice of him who wept was heard in the chambers of death-shade, and forth came the soul of Lazarus to live again in the body. "The weakness of God" proved itself to be stronger than death and mightier than the grave. It is a parable of our own case as workers. Sometimes we see the human side of the gospel, and wonder whether it can do many mighty works. When we tell the story, we fear that it will appear to the people as a thrice-told tale. We wonder how it can be that truth so simple, so homely, so common should have any special power about it. Yet it is so. Out of the foolishness of preaching, the wisdom of God shines forth.

Raised by a Word.

Let us consider for a few moments the instrumental cause of this resurrection. Nothing was used by our Lord but his own word of power. Jesus cried with a loud voice, "Lazarus, come forth!" He simply repeated the dead man's name, and added two commanding words. This was a simple business enough. Dear friends, a miracle seems all the greater when the means used are apparently feeble and little adapted to the working of so great a result. It is so in the salvation of men. It is marvellous that such poor preaching should convert such great sinners. Many are turned unto the Lord by the simplest, plainest, most unadorned preaching of the Gospel. They hear little, but that little is from the lip of Jesus. Many converts find Christ by a single short sentence. The divine life is borne into their hearts upon the wings of a brief text. The preacher owned no eloquence, he made no attempt at it; but the Holy Spirit spoke through him with a power which eloquence could not rival. Thus said the Lord "Ye dry bones live"; and they did live. I delight to preach my Master's Gospel in the plainest terms. I would speak still more simply if I could. The power to quicken the dead lieth not in the wisdom of words but in the Spirit of the living God.

The Result.

The result of the Lord's working must not be passed over, for it is a main element of wonder in this miracle. Lazarus did come forth and that immediately. He quitted the close air of the sepulchre and returned to know once more the things which are done under the sun; and that at once. To me it is one of the great glories of the Gospel that it does not require weeks and months to quicken men and make new creatures of them; salvation can come to them at once. The man who stepped into this Tabernacle this evening steeped in rebellion against his God, and apparently impervious to divine truth, may nevertheless go down those steps with his sins forgiven, and with a new spirit imparted to him, in the strength of which he shall begin to live unto God as he never lived before. Trust ye in God, my brethren. In all your work of love, trust in the unseen power which lay at the back of the manhood of Christ, and still lies at the back of the simple Gospel which we preach. The everlasting word may seem to be weak and feeble; it may groan and weep, and seem as if it could do no more; but it can raise the dead, and raise them at once. Be ye sure of this.

II. Secondly, I beg you to observe

A Singular Spectacle.

A notable miracle was unquestionably wrought; but it required a finishing touch. The man was wholly raised, but not wholly freed. See, here is a living man in the garments of death! That napkin and other grave clothes were altogether congruous with death, but they were much out of place when Lazarus began again to live. It is a wretched sight to see a living man wearing his shroud. Yet we have seen in this Tabernacle hundreds of times people quickened by Divine grace with their grave-clothes still upon them. Such was their condition that unless you observed carefully you would think them still dead; and yet within them the lamp of heavenly life was burning. Some said, "He is dead, look at his garments;" but the more spiritual cried, "He is not dead, but these bands must be loosed." It is a singular spectacle: a living man hampered with the cerements of death!

Moreover, he was a moving man bound hand and foot. I have seen souls bound and yet moving; moving intensely in one direction, and yet not capable of stirring an inch in another. Have you not seen a man so truly alive that he wept, he mourned, he groaned over sin; but yet he could not believe in Christ, but seemed bound hand and foot as to faith? I have seen him give up his sin determinedly, and crush a bad habit under his foot, and yet he could not lay hold on a promise or receive a hope. Lazarus was free enough in one way, for he came out of the tomb, but the blinding napkin was about his head; and even so it is with many a quickened sinner, for when you try to show him cheering truth he cannot see it.

Strong but Helpless.

Moreover, here was a man strong, and yet helpless. He was strong enough to come forth from his grave, and yet he could not take the napkin from his own head, for his hands were bound, and he could not go to his house, for his feet were swathed. Unless some kind hand unbound him he would remain a living mummy. He had strength sufficient to quit the grave, but he could be quit of his grave-clothes. So have we seen men strong, for the Spirit of God has been in them, and has moved them mightily; they have been passionately in earnest even to agony in one direction, yet the newborn life has been so feeble in other ways that they seemed to be mere babes in swaddling clothes. They have not been able to enjoy the liberty of Christ, nor enter into communion with Christ, nor work for Christ. They have been bound hand and foot: work and progress have alike been beyond them. This seems a strange sequel to a miracle. The bands of death loosed, but not the bands of linen; motion given, but not movement of hand or foot; strength bestowed, but not the power to undress himself. Such anomalies are common in the world of grace.

III. This brings us to consider

A Timely Assistance

which you and I are called upon to render. O for wisdom to learn our duty, and grace to do it at once. Let us consider what are these bands which often bind newly regenerated sinners? Some of them are blindfolded by the napkin about their head;—they are very ignorant, sadly devoid of spiritual perception, and withal the eye of faith is darkened. Yet the eye is there, and Christ has opened it; and it is the business of the servant of God to remove the napkin which bandages it, by teaching the truth, explaining it, and clearing up difficulties. This is a simple thing to do, but exceedingly necessary. Now that they have life we shall teach them to purpose. Besides that, they are bound hand and foot, so that they are compelled to inaction; we can show them how to work for Jesus. Another hindrance is the band of fear. "Oh," says the poor soul, "I am such a sinner that God must punish me for my sin." Tell him the grand doctrine of substitution. Unwrap this cerement by the assurance that Jesus took our sin, and that "by his stripes we are healed." It is wonderful what liberty comes by that precious truth when it is understood.

Bonds of Prejudice.

Souls are very often bound with the graves-clothes of prejudice. They used to think so and so before conversion, and they are very apt to carry their dead thoughts into their new life. Go and tell them that things are not what they seem: that old things have passed away, and behold all things have become new. The days of their ignorance God winked at, but now they must change their minds about everything, and no more judge according to the sight of the eyes and the hearing of the ears. Some of them are bound with the grave-clothes of evil habit. It is a noble work to aid a drunkard to unwind the accursed bands which

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Friend, New York City. I would like to ask your opinion in regard to card-playing and the habit some young men have of carrying packs of cards in their pockets?

A similar question to the above has already been answered in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 29.

E. M. S. M., Norwich, Ont. What preparatory education does a person need before entering the University of —, supposing he wanted to study law?

The requirements differ and we would advise you to address the University itself on the matter.

A. A. A. East Killington, Conn. Can a Christian at any time exercise faith for the healing of bodily diseases for himself or others?

There have been many instances of the kind since apostolic times, but so far as we have been able to learn, the diseases were functional, and not organic.

J. S. M., Alton, Kan. Is a Secret Society necessary to promote mutual welfare?

A somewhat similar question has already been answered in No. 29 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Many of the most noted secret societies have darkened the pages of history. For all ordinary purposes of mutual benefit, an oath-bound secrecy would seem to be wholly unnecessary.

F. R., Sr. Sandusky, O. Is General Booth's Industrial Colony in England in actual operation?

Partially. Two farms on the banks of the Thames River, of about one thousand acres each, have been purchased, and buildings erected to shelter five thousand persons. Dairy, truck-farming and cattle-raising are among the employments. Similar industrial colonies are to be established by General Booth in South Africa and Australia.

C. F. K., Philadelphia, Pa. When a master commands a servant to tell a falsehood, who will have to answer for it at the Day of Judgment? It says in the Bible, "Servants, obey your masters."

Both will have to answer for the falsehood at the bar of God. The master is guilty, in using his influence to coerce the servant into lying; the servant is culpable in yielding and in preferring to commit a sin to please his master, even though in so doing he offend his Maker. The Bible injunction to obedience of servants refers only to matters that are lawful. Sin is never lawful in the sight of God.

P. L., Trenton, N. J. What country has the greatest number of electric railroads at the present time?

Data is not at hand to make the full comparison. The United States has less than some of the countries of Europe. There are now 325 electric railways known to be in operation in different parts of the world, using 4,000 cars and running 7,000 motors over 2,600 miles of track. They carry 750,000,000 passengers annually. In this country alone, $50,000,000 of capital are invested in such lines.

G. W. G., Pittsburg, Pa. Is it wrong for a church to have a kitchen in the basement, and to hold oyster suppers and festivals, and to use the room for a dining-room?

There are circumstances in which it would be distinctly wrong to do so, and vice versa. If nothing be done that would detract from the sacred character of the building, then such uses might be considered permissible. There is a social side to church brotherhood that may be upheld without offence. The good sense of pastor, elders and managers should be exercised to prevent the use of the church rooms for anything that savors of levity or disrespect, or that has not for its object the furtherance of God's purposes and the spread of the Gospel.

Inquirer, Chautauqua, N. Y. (1) Is loving God above all else the same or equal to loving him with the whole heart? (2) Can we love God without having his love in our hearts? (3) Could any one have a spark of God's love in his heart, and yet desire to see any soul fall, even if it be that of an enemy? (4) If any church or society should join hands for the trying of a soul, would it in that act be representing the religion of Jesus Christ?

(1) The heart is mortal and susceptible to mundane passions and influences, while the soul is immortal. With our hearts we can love one another; with our souls we comprehend the love of our heavenly Father and his Son. It is therefore possible to love the Lord with all our "heart and with all our soul and with all our strength," but the soul-love is a flame holier than all else. With the soul alone can we love and desire God above all else. (2) No. (3) A heart that is filled with God's love would never desire the fall of any soul, but would rather try to assist its rise. (4) No church or society would assume to try the soul; this is God's prerogative. Persistence in sin may result in exclusion from the pale of the congregation, but man cannot exclude from God's mercy nor limit his forgiveness. Such an assumption would be as impious as the selling of so-called indulgences from heaven by the Church of Rome. Man alone can exclude himself, and not another.

E. D. G., New York City. In your answer to "Subscriber" last week, you place the numerical strength of the Baptists at 1,458,441. At the close of 1890, they had a regular numerical strength of 3,164,227.

Our correspondent rightly calls attention to a mistake of the types in a former issue. The latest figures which we find in a recent article in The Independent, give the Baptists 4,078,589; Methodists, 4,723,881. We do not know of any more recent source of information on the subject.

G. R. L., Althorpe, Ont. How shall I strengthen a defective memory?

Assuming that there is no organic defect, we would advise a trial of the system you mention in your letter. The simplest system is to study the "association of events." Thus: you wish to remember what you did at a certain hour yesterday. By thinking back—recalling one event after another and fixing in your mind the time of its occurrence—you will after a time become adept at recalling any specific event or act you desire to remember. With some persons, however, memory is a gift that comes almost without cultivation, but the dullest memory can be cultivated successfully in the way indicated.

Rev. H. P., Grand P. O., Man., Can. Should a speaker drink water or beverage of any description while speaking? If this be necessary, what should he take? Is there any beverage that helps to strengthen the voice?

A teacher of elocution or a physician would be likely to give the most practical advice on this matter. Water is usually placed before a speaker on a public platform. With many it becomes absolutely necessary to moisten the lips while speaking. Some prefer lemonade which clears the throat of phlegm. Others keep on hand a supply of troches, which answer the same purpose. There is no beverage that will strengthen the voice, although those mentioned will clear it and thus make enunciation better. It is a mistake for anyone to imagine that alcoholic beverages help a speaker. They make the voice husky, cloud the brain and befog the whole man. Their use is therefore inexcusable on physical and intellectual as well as on moral grounds.

M. McD., Chicago, Ill. I have retired from business and am now 63 years of age. I am not rich, having just about $10,000, and I feel it my duty to consecrate a tenth of it to the Lord. I wish to do it in some way that will be of practical service to his cause, and by which the Gospel may be scattered. How shall I proceed about it?

You might establish a mission in some neglected part of your own city, and thereby bring the Gospel to many who are in ignorance and darkness. The heathen are not all abroad. We will be glad to cooperate with you in any plan with such a purpose in view, and will undertake to contribute a sufficient number of copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (which is now very widely distributed in work of this character) to assist you in the work at the outset. Such missions afford the most practical and direct method of reaching the masses outside of the churches.

A. K., Trenton, O. What proof have we outside of the Bible that man has a soul and that there is a hereafter?

Man's conviction of immortality, even outside of the Bible, is world-old and world-wide. He is the only being who desires a hereafter or who has conceptions of another life. Wherever man is found, he has the inborn conviction of the existence of a Supreme Being and another world. He feels within him an influence that is not mortal or material. No other being on earth can rise above the mere allurements of sense; no other aspires to a future. Man feels that his state here is a preparatory one; that it is a step to a higher education. The soul, in all its aspects, is its own prophet of immortality and has been so in all ages. From the days of the earliest philosophers, from Socrates and Cicero down to Baxter and Liddon, this fact has been stamped upon the history of the world, and despite materialists and sceptics, it is stronger and more universal than ever. Read Butler's Analogy.

A FOCAL SEASON.

Remarkable Events Associated with the Celebration of the Jewish Passover.

OW slight is the difference of time in the dates assigned for the termination of the prophetic periods by various expositors of prophecy, has already been pointed out in these columns. Professor Totten of Yale, from an elaborate astronomical calculation believes (as was explained in this journal on July 8), that the termination will be on Passover Day, 1899. The Rev. M. Baxter, of London, by a train of reasoning outlined in this journal at various times, believes it will be on Passover Day, 1901. They, with others, are thus agreed as to the season, though differing as to the year. In a recent address, Dr. Grattan Guinness, also a well known writer on prophecy, who has always refrained from expressing any opinion as to the year, though believing it to be near at hand, also appears to concur with them in thinking that it will be at the Passover season. He said:

It was Gabriel that announced the great prophecy of the Seventy Weeks to Daniel—that same Gabriel who was sent to announce to Zacharias the approaching birth of John the Baptist, and then again to Mary to announce the birth of Christ himself. It was this evangelical angel, Gabriel, who brought with swift wings

This Wondrous Prophecy.

I have sometimes pondered over this. I have seen Daniel in prayer with his windows open towards Jerusalem, his head bowed, the tears streaming from his closed eyes, his hands clasped, unconscious in the presence of the angel. He has been praying for hours. The sight of Jerusalem is before him—the city in its ruins, the ruined temple, the cessation of sacrifice, the dishonor to the name of God—Oh! a wreck had been made of the Jewish people, and of religion, and of the glory of God. His soul is in an agony. He prays, now that the seventy years of Jewish captivity, have almost expired that God would restore Judah, rebuild Jerusalem, rebuild the temple. While this prayer begins to ascend, the answer begins to descend. Do you not remember, it says, "At the beginning of thy prayer the commandment came forth, and I am come to show thee," so that we are justified in saying that when his prayer began to ascend, the answer began to descend, and as his prayer continued to ascend, the answer continued to descend. Before the prayer was ended, the universe had been traversed by the swift evangelical angel, who, five hundred years later, was to come upon a second and similar mission to Zacharias, and to say, "I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God," and, later, to announce to Mary the accomplishment of those things which he had been privileged to foretell.

Daniel's thoughts had been occupied with the restoration of Jerusalem; the angel's thoughts are occupied with the redemption of the world. Daniel wanted the temple rebuilt and his people taken back. God's design was vaster, more glorious, infinitely more important. The angel comes to tell him of a decree

To Restore Jerusalem.

and then of an act by which it should be destroyed a second time, its temple laid in ruins, and the Jews scattered throughout the world; but he came to tell him of something which was to be accomplished before this, the advent of the Messiah, and the time of that advent he places before the destruction of Jerusalem. Oh! how important. Lead us, then, thou blessed angel—where wilt thou lead us? To that spot and to no other; to these years and to no other; to that period just before the destruction of Jerusalem which took place eighteen hundred years ago. He leads us then, to that period before these eighteen hundred years began, before the year 70, in which the temple and the city were destroyed, and the people dispersed. And to what particular group of years wilt thou lead us, O blessed angel? "From the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem unto Messiah, the Prince, shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks. And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off" (Daniel 9: 26.)

Whither are we being led, then, but to the very time and to the week of years, to the Cross of Christ? But canst thou, O blessed angel, lead us to the month? There is no need. Moses is here to do that. "This month shall be to you says the law through Moses to Israel on the fourteenth day of the Passover month; "present the sacrifice, sprinkle the blood of the Passover victim." And thus we are led to the month and to the day, and then to the very hour—the ninth hour of the day, for it was in the after part of the day that the Passover sacrifice was to be offered between the two evenings, and those two evenings were measured thus: from noon till three the first, from three till sunset the second, and sunset at the time of the vernal equinox, which was the time of the Passover, is thus in the evening, the time of the Redeemer's death.

The Beginning of Months,"

Thus, led by the prophets and by the law, we are guided to the period in human history before the destruction of Jerusalem to the group of years, to the central year, to the month, to the day, to the hour of crucifixion and of the death of Jesus Christ, and as we look we see him there, we seem to hear that sentence, "Thus it is written"—written in Moses, written in Daniel, in the law, in the prophets—"and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and then to rise from the dead the third day."

"Passovers" in the Life of Jesus.

Have you ever noted this, that the life of Jesus Christ was regulated by Passovers, and that those Passovers led to the closing Passover, a supreme Passover, and that that supreme and final Passover coincided with the sacrifice of the cross? His whole life was regulated by Passovers. It is difficult to form a clear conception, which you can remember, of the journeys of Christ as far as they are recorded in Scripture. If you remember this principle, it will help you—the law, which commanded the going up three times in the year of the males to Jerusalem, regulated the life of Christ, who became subject to the law. Thus the first occasion on which he appeared to minister in the temple was at a Passover. His ministry commenced too, in Jerusalem with the Passover described in John 2, and 3. There ought to be no division between chapters 2 and 3. In the original manuscripts there are not only no chapters but no verses, and even the words themselves are not divided, but are run into each other; therefore you are at perfect liberty to paragraph the Bible for yourselves. Did you ever notice this? It dawned upon me not long ago as a sort of revelation. I was astounded at it—that the great discourses of Christ in the Gospel of John are all Passover discourses. That great discourse with Nicodemus was a Passover discourse; at the Passover at Jerusalem he said, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted," "for God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son;" and then that great discourse in which he speaks of himself as the Bread which came down from heaven, and says, "My flesh is meat indeed; my blood is drink indeed," was a Passover discourse. It was on his way to the Passover at Jerusalem. And those great loving discourses of his to the Jews and to his disciples in the closing chapters of John are Passover discourses; above all, those from John 13 to 16. Then the great prayer in chapter 17. How large a space, then, in the life of Christ is occupied by the Passover!

THE INVISIBLE WORLD.

The souls of the dead, when they depart hence, live as they lived before, writes Bishop Harris, of Michigan; only they have passed beyond the veil, and are "no more seen." Generation after generation of men comes into the region of the seen, to spend whatever force, and fire, and energy there is in each. Then, one by one, their spirits are recalled; the earthly vesture falls away, and in a moment they are gone. They have re-entered the invisible.

The invisible is all around us. It is our spirit's true home, and we can lift ourselves into its atmosphere upon the mountain tops of prayer and meditation. It may not be ours to be transfigured there, as our Master was. It may not be ours to converse there with the loved and forgotten dead, but we may and can hold converse with our Father; for the unseen world, the world of spirits, is not future or distant; it is not above the sky nor beyond the grave; it is now, it is here!

We are taught to look for a day when all the visible world shall perish; but that loss will prove to be the lifting of a veil which hides the unseen, the removal of a screen which, for the present, hides the only true and real world—the world of God and Christ, of holy angels and the souls of men.

PARTING OF THE WAYS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning August 30.
John 7: 40-44; 11: 45, 46; 7: 12; 6: 66.

HOW suggestive are the words of the Evangelist: "There was a division among the people because of him!" There were then, as now, many divisions among the people. Divided by race, by nationality, by disposition, by worldly circumstances, but no division, then nor now, so crucial as that division "because of him." In time and in eternity that is the great dividing line. To those who love Jesus he is so precious, is so vital a part of their lives, is so entirely the one supreme source of joy and hope, that they can have no real fellowship with those who know him not. In the last great day the same test divides. However close the natural union may have been in the world, whether of husband and wife, or parent and child, this test is supreme. As it was with the imprisoned apostles, "Being let go," they will go to "their own company." Where else can they go? They who live in him can have neither part nor lot with those who live without him. The parting of the ways in that day will be evident and unmistakable; but it will not be so much a judicial decree as a natural development of past conduct. The ways part in this life.

Sometimes the place of parting is passed unconsciously. Looking back at the end of life, the place of divergence may be perceived; but the traveller is often unaware of the crisis at the time. It is seldom a deliberate choice. The downward path looks pleasant and the traveller explores a little way, intending to return. But the way back is toilsome, pleasures beckon him onward and he goes on too far to return. The night comes upon him while he is still pursuing, or when he has sat down weary and disgusted, lacking courage and even inclination to return. But return is not impossible. Invitations, warnings, promises of help follow the wanderer all through. Blessed are they who make the effort and succeed. But even then how much time has been lost! How soiled and bedraggled, how forlorn is the returning one! How bitterly he laments "the years that the locusts have eaten!"

And the ease of the wandering? It was when Jesus explained what his service involved, what a complete union with him was necessary, what an utter dependence on him for spiritual sustenance there must be, that there was "a division because of him." It is so now. If a compromise were possible; if Christ would share his throne in the heart with the world, many would rejoice so "to make the best of both worlds." But not of such is the kingdom of heaven. The decision must be fixed and must be defended, with the heart's blood, if necessary. Drifting on the right road is impossible. Effort is demanded, conflict is certain, obstacles are numerous. Christ did not deceive those who came to him, with promises of ease. "Leave all and follow me," was his demand and those who are not prepared to do that now, cannot follow him. Christ and the world are at opposite poles. He who comes to the parting of the ways must turn his back on one or the other.

FLOWERS IN THE CITY.

Few persons realize how many services are within their reach, which, if done "in his name," would give them pleasure as well as give pleasure to others. The following incident related at a meeting of King's Daughters by Mrs. Lovett, and published in the Silver Cross, is an illustration of the fact:

"It would not be worth speaking about," she began, apologetically, "only it was pleasant to do, and perhaps others might try it, if they once thought about it."

"I had to go to Boston last week and the idea came to me the evening before, how I should miss my flowers if I was obliged to live in a city, and that there must be many there who love them as I do and can have no garden.

At last I determined to carry some with me to give to the poor 'In His Name.' So, in the morning, I cut a great number and made them up in bunches; so many of them in all, that it quite made my hands ache to carry them.

"Before we reached the city I had given away a spray of honeysuckle to a lady in front, who kept turning to look at my flowers. At last she asked me some questions about them, and I told her why I was carrying so many. She said she had often had the thought but had never heard of any one carrying it out, and wished me success.

"Boston was reached at last, and we had not walked a block from the station before a ragged little fellow ran up to me, and said, 'Please, lady, give me a rose!' 'Indeed, I will,' said I. 'It's for just such as you that I brought them.' He darted around the corner and another one came, and another, until we were surrounded by quite a crowd of eager-faced little ragamuffins, begging me for flowers. Where they all came from, or where they vanished afterward, I couldn't tell. One little urchin pleaded for a rose to take to his little sister who was sick. 'And I want one for my big sister,' chimed in another. 'She isn't sick, but she loves flowers.'

"A working man who passed in the street, saw what I was doing, and smiled. 'God bless you, lady,' said he, 'you could distribute a cart-load in that way.'

UNITED OR DENOMINATIONAL.

A CORRESPONDENT inquires about the action of the denominations as to the union of the Societies of Christian Endeavor. She will find a full statement of the action of the Presbyterian Church Assembly in the Church at Home and Abroad. Briefly stated, the discussion which took place in the Assembly revealed a strong sentiment in favor of the movement as already constituted and against any attempt to create a separate Presbyterian organization. There are now 4,019 Societies connected with Presbyterian Churches. On the other hand, the Baptists have organized such of their Christian Endeavor Societies as consent, under the name of the "Baptist Young People's Union." The Methodist Episcopal Church also prefers separate organization in the Epworth League, though it has over 2000 Societies of Christian Endeavor.

Y. M. C. A. WORK IN ILLINOIS.

ENERGY and enterprise are as much a necessity to-day in Association work as they are in business. Although this fact is generally realized by the officers, they do not in many cases perceive in what fields the two qualities can be exercised. All such will be thankful for the suggestions contained in the following summary of the work in Illinois which appears in the Association Notes of that State:

In our State to-day, the Associations having General Secretaries form one department of work under one of the Traveling Secretaries. Visitation has been greatly multiplied, and through its means the efficiency of these Associations has been very largely increased. The college work, forming another department, has been put into the hands of one of the Traveling Secretaries and, as a consequence, a marked advance has been seen, especially in the increase of organizations and in the increase of Bible study. The work in small towns and in unorganized places has been put in charge of a third Traveling Secretary, with the result that the efficiency of this line of work has also been increased, and a large harvest is being reaped in the fields before neglected. The work undertaken at the militia camp has been so appreciated that it has recently received the unqualified endorsement of every colonel connected with the Illinois National Guard. The work undertaken by the Knox College boys, an entirely new line of effort, has resulted during the last two years in the conversion of more than one hundred young men. Two bands of young men are now engaged in this work. The Corresponding Membership, first started in this state, has been extended to more than two hundred towns, and is to-day one of the hopeful agencies in touching the lives of the young men who are going as strangers into the colleges and large cities. The district work is being more thoroughly organized, in securing more volunteer workers and during the past few months has been so blessed that in nine of the District Conferences held, there have been direct spiritual results. The college deputation work, has been undertaken to some extent. The county work, to which we have been looking forward for some two or three years, at last seems to be taking shape, one man having put his life into this form of effort, opening up a county in which there is not yet a single Association.

THE THIRD Ocean Grove Anniversary of the King's Daughters was celebrated Aug. 6. The day began with an early morning prayer-meeting in Thornley Chapel conducted by Mrs. Bottome. Later, a conference of workers was held in the Young People's Temple when reports were read from the leaders of circles. This was followed by a meeting in the Auditorium at which Mrs. Isabella C. Davis presided, and Dr. Gannon of Pennington Seminary made an address.

A CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR STUDENT.

"ABOUT a year ago," says a correspondent of a contemporary "the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of a Church at Seattle, Washington, undertook to raise four hundred dollars for the support of a student in Scotia Seminary for one year. Mr. Ovid A. Byers, when sending the last hundred dollars, wrote as follows: Enclosed you will find New York draft for one hundred dollars, being the final payment of the support of the teacher in Scotia Seminary, by the Y. P. S. C. E. of the First Presbyterian Church of Seattle, Washington, Presbytery of Puget Sound. This fund has caused some sacrifice on the part of our members, but it has done us so much good that we are going to try it again next year. Our Society sends with this money many prayers for God's blessing on the work." It is significant that nothing was said about the good done to the student. The Society was blessed in giving which was a fulfilment of the Scripture promise that they who water shall be watered themselves. (Prov. 11: 25.)

THE WORLD'S CONVENTION.

ON Wednesday last the twelfth International Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of all lands assembled in Amsterdam. There were about three hundred delegates in attendance at the first meeting. Later arrivals increased the total number of delegates to about five hundred. There were one hundred delegates from the American associations, and nearly a hundred from Great Britain, with large delegations from Holland, Germany, Switzerland and France.

There were ten delegates from the Paris Association and two from the association in Rome. There were also delegates from Sweden, Italy, Russia, India and other countries. The Committee on Credentials issued credentials to all regularly accredited delegates as they arrived. Entertainment in private families was provided for such of the delegates as wished to be entertained. The Convention met at Maison Strouken, on the Leidsche Plein, a large hall in the centre of the city, which, with two smaller halls and several committee rooms, were retained for the use of the Convention. Among the topics discussed at the earlier meetings were the following: "Spiritual Life in Our Associations; the Dangers that Threaten It in our Actual Development; the Best Means for Maintaining and Increasing It, and for Constantly Recruiting Active and Truly Converted Members." "The Association and Its Attitude with Regard to the Social Question." Each paper after being read was translated and published in Dutch, French, German and English.

"THE KING'S DAUGHTER."

O garb of royal hue she wears,
Her robe of daily service bears
The soiling touch of common cares,
Yet she is fair,
With grace her heavenly kindred share.

She needs not costly signet gem,
Nor light of regal diadem,
Whose hand hath touched his garment's hem,
Whose heart reveals
The rich life-current which it feels.
Yet since her king 'mid scoff and scorn,
Wore for her sake a crown of thorn,
Some radiant day his hand will set
On her a thornless coronet,

While angels sing,
"Be crowned, O Daughter of The King!"
—FLORA A. HARRIS in Silver Cross.

A LITTLE WAY.

A LITTLE way, I know it is not far
To that dear home where my beloved are,
And yet my faith grows weaker as I stand,
A poor, lone pilgrim in a dreary land,
Where present pain the future bliss obscures:
And still my heart sits like a bird upon
The empty nest, and mourns its treasure gone,
Plumed for their flight
And vanished quite,
Ah, me! where is the comfort, though I say
They have but journeyed on a little way!

A little way! This sentence I repeat,
Hoping and longing to extract some sweet
To mingle with the bitter. From Thy hand
I take the cup; I cannot understand,
And in my weakness give myself to Thee,
Although it seems so very far,
To that dear home where my beloved are,
I know, I know
It is not so.

Oh! give me faith to feel it when I say
That they are gone—gone but a little way!

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells About the Donkey-Boys of Cairo, and Their Patient Little Animals.

WHEN the children returned from the seaside, one day last week, they were brimming over with experiences which they were eager to impart to Uncle John. That patient relative smiled as he listened to their prattle and heard about the donkey they had been riding upon the sands.

"Ever ride donkey-back, Uncle?" inquired
Ted, with a sly twinkle in his eye.

"The last time I sat astraddle one of them was in Cairo," said the traveler. "He was a quiet, sturdy little brute, but so wofully low-set that I found it necessary to hold up my legs to prevent my feet from touching the ground.
I know I've got rather long legs, Tom," he added, as his twelve-year-old nephew gazed attentively on these extremities.

"Was it smaller than our donkeys here?"
Tom interrogated.

"Some of the Egyptian donkeys are indeed very small," said Uncle. "But what they lack in size they make up in willingness.
They never refuse a burden, I have been assured."

"The donkey-boys in Egyptian towns are regarded pretty much the same as we look upon hackmen in American cities. A boy or man stands in the market-place alongside his donkey and hires it out at a sum per hour which would be about twenty-five cents in our currency. If you want to go to market, or to pay a visit, you strike a bargain with the keeper and then, jumping upon the animal's back, off you amble. There's nothing very imposing or romantic about it, but it's safe and comfortable."

"They are very knowing too, these donkey-boys. When they see a person approaching whom they judge to be an American, they cry out: 'N-i-c-e Yankee Doodle donkey!' or perhaps: 'N-i-c-e telefon donkey!', as their tancy may suggest. You see, they know our peculiarities. If an Englishman comes along, they change their cry to 'N-i-c-e Jon Bool donkey!' A person hearing such cries for the first time, is so struck with the ludi-crousness of the thing that he cannot help laughing, so serious are these donkey-men in their endeavor to impress you with the good qualities of their brutes. Then, when you are mounted, and the donkey starts, the owner runs along behind you at a dog-trot."

"Why does he follow you?" asked Milly, in vague astonishment.

"Because he wants his donkey back, little one," said Uncle. "When you are through, he mounts it himself and makes it carry him back to the place of hire again."

"But our donkeys here are very stupid," observed Tom.

"Well, so probably are they all the world over, my boy; yet I remarked that those Cairo beasts seemed to possess more than average intelligence. They know the city and seem to seek their destination instinctively. I used to patronize a donkey owned by a Moslem named Abdallah, and he had a dozen different names for the animal, dependent upon the customer, of course. His little girl Ghemiana, the daughter of a Turkish woman married to an Egyptian father, was a particularly bright-looking child and was always nicely dressed, for her mother made embroidery for ladies of rank and loved to have the girl look attractive. Ghemiana, dressed in Turkish style—short jacket and print trousers, with her hair cut short in front, parted on one side, and bound with a little silk fillet—would sometimes come out to see her father and would chat with his patrons. She was very fond of Bobo, the donkey, and would slyly feed him with sweets and nuts. Bobo was the principal breadwinner for the whole family."

"I like a horse better," said one of the children.

"Yet there are lands where the patient ass is held in great honor," Uncle John observed. "All over the East they are regarded as superior in some respects to the horse. The kings

ABDALLAH AND HIS DONKEY, BOBO.

(See "Uncle John's Talks.")

of Persia had cavalry mounted on asses, and they used them in fighting with the Scythian barbarians, the latter using horses. The Parthians, too, once a very powerful nation, had their mounted soldiers on dappled asses, and they bred a race of fine white asses that were so highly esteemed that they were reserved for the use of great officials alone. They also raised orange and crimson-colored asses. Some of the old nations even worshipped the ass and had their gods carved in that form. It is held by some scholars that the ancient Centaurs (a race of mounted warriors who lived about the time of the Israelitish Judges), were mounted on asses when they invaded and overran part of Central Asia. The onager or wild ass, which you may remember reading of in your Bible, is a beautiful high-spirited animal, strong and swift, yet easily tamed. It is found in Northern Asia and Central India.

"Among the Jews," he added, "the ass was greatly respected. You remember that Christ rode into Jerusalem 'sitting on an ass, even a colt the foal of an ass,' as Matthew in the thirty-first chapter and fifth verse, tells us.

With the Hebrews, this animal was the type of peace and humility—a universal servant.
The story of Balaam, whose ass rebuked him for his persistence in disobeying God, shows that even the humblest of living things may be chosen as the divine instrument for man's repentance."

"Remember," added Uncle John, in conclusion, "whenever you see a poor, burdened, despised and abused donkey, that it belongs to a race that was once honored above all others in the burden it bore and that, for once in the world's history at least, it was not dumb, but was the mouthpiece of its Creator."

Order in the Home.

"ORDER," says a thoughtful writer, "is the key to comfort in the home, and has more to do with the happiness of the family than many suppose. If things can never be found in their right places when wanted—if house linen, street garments, children's playthings and the old magazines, are jumbled promiscuously into one closet—if the napkins and table-cloths repose among the china, and the knives and forks have no settled abiding-place—depend upon it that fretfulness and ill-temper will be provoked continually. One of the first and easiest lessons for a child is orderliness, and if rightly taught, it soon becomes a confirmed habit, as well as a source of pleasure. But if we would make our children orderly, we must see that they have a place in which to put everything, or all our teaching will be thrown away. Then, having allotted a proper niche to all their childish belongings, require that they return each one to its place when not in

LIFE IN TOWN AND COUNTRY.

THERE are compensating advantages on both sides, which make life in the town and the country about evenly balanced. The best results could possibly be attained by living in each in turn and thus dividing the year between the two, as Mr. M. E. Sangster, in a recent article, suggests. But to many this is an impossibility. There are hundreds of thousands to whom life in the country has become a species of imprisonment, and there are others—and they are even more numerous than the latter class—to whom city existence is a life destitute of more than half its joys, since it deprives them of the rural delights about which they read and hear so much, yet know so little.

Both cases have their limitations. If one lives in the country, there is less worry about money, since there is very much less inducement to extravagance, and opportunities for spending are restricted. The economical habit grows more quickly in a country-bred individual than one who has grown up amid town surroundings. Yet, with all its limitations, it is to the country we look for the power that regulates the pulse of the nation; for that healthy, inspiring atmosphere which sends anew a sturdy moral current coursing through the veins of the people. Thus the country is a check on the morals of the town.

The country home may be a very simple and unpretentious place and yet to our minds, very beautiful. The skies about it are bluer, the air sweeter, and the flowers, somehow, seem to bud and blow more generously and to freight the air with richer perfumes, than anywhere else. It may be that fashion has no hold there, and that all the furnishings were new not less than half a century ago; that the curtains are only muslin and the carpets homemade; that our garden has neither costly orchards nor other floral rarities but only the dear, old-fashioned roses, the lush honeysuckle and woodbine, the aromatic thyme, and blue forget-me-nots. These, with the other simple attractions of the home, added to the gentle kindness of good Christian parents, are enough to keep the heart from straying. The children are not apt to run after wicked pleasures if they have such a home. One does not always find happiness in conjunction with a fine dwelling, noble surroundings and expensive habits.

Vacation Piety.

It is a rather curious article in its way, and in a majority of cases, quite a contrast from the piety that prevails at other seasons. There is need for both mental and physical relaxation in the summer, but why the well-earned holiday should involve a moral relaxation is not so easily explained. In the country, particularly at the seashore and mountain resorts, the Sabbath is largely neglected, and pastimes forbidden at home are freely indulged on the Holy Day. There is, unfortunately, a growing tendency in our large cities toward what is known as the "European Sabbath," meaning a Sabbath almost devoid of the worship of God and of those sacred duties that Christians have loved from immemorial days. Noisy mirth takes the place of calm and thoughtful quiet, and the frivolous gossip of the godless usurps the hours that should be devoted to meditation.
One good clergyman tells of a wise member of his congregation in whose summer cottage, when Sunday morning came, all the secular reading disappeared and instead there appeared, as if magically, a supply of good Sunday reading on the tables and lounges. The neglect of Sabbath duties in the summer is a growing one, and one that every parent should strive to guard against. Here is what a lowly poet sings of the Holy Day:

The poorest peasant 'neath the azure sky,
Who spends his Sabbath with a holy zeal,
Far greater happiness is sure to feel
Than the rich recreant who would God defy.

Are All the Children In?

The darkness falls, the wind is high,
Dense black clouds fill the western sky;
The storm will soon begin;
The thunders roar, the lightnings flash,
I hear the great round raindrops dash—
Are all the children in?

If He should call us home before
The children land on that blest shore
Afar from care and sin,
I know that I shall watch and wait
Till he, the Keeper of the gate, Lets all the children in.

use, and you will save yourself many weary steps, besides laying the foundation of methodical habits, which, once formed, will never be forgotten."

To such useful hints we would add another:
Order your prayers aright and the rest will be easier. Pray in the morning, before your day's talk is begun; at noon, while hands, head, and heart are full of work; in the evening, after toil and struggle are over; at night, as you lie awake and reflect upon the past. It was the sage, Pythagoras, who wrote the "Golden Verses," beginning:

Let not soft slumber close thine eyes
Before thou recollectest thrice,
Thy train of action through the day.
Where have my feet found out their way?
What have I sought that I should shun?
What duty have I left undone?
Or into what new follies run?
These self-reflections are the road
That leads to virtue and to God.

A life so regulated cannot fail to be well-ordered and pleasing to its Maker.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

[Published by special arrangement with The National Temperance Society.]

IT was a novel position both for the father and the son. The father during many years had possessed abundant money but had never had near him any one to love him. The son loving and loved had known the straits of poverty and seldom possessed a nickel of his own. When the two were brought together there were likely to be strange developments.

Well, whatever Mr. Murray saw he wanted to buy for Robert, a scarf-pin, sleeve-links—whatever he could do to make of this sturdy, simple, honest boy, a ridiculous young dandy. Mr. Murray was ready in his folly to do. Not that he would be willing to change this decent, generous, unselfish, humble spirit, into a vain, self-conceited, lazy trifler. He took means to that end without a thought of that end. It was a true blessing of heaven, that ten years of hard work, humility, self-sacrifice, and sound training had made Robert hard to spoil.

"Wine, sir? Wine for you and the young gentleman?" said the brisk waiter at dinner.

"No!" cried Mr. Murray. "Why don't you go about saying arsenic, prussic acid, strychnine, if you must vend poisons? Try them for a change."

"Oh, sir!" remonstrated the waiter, "our wines are the very best."

"Warranted to kill at sight—like the rest?" said the irascible Mr. Murray.

The waiter went off smiling. "Temperance crank," he confided to the other waiters.

After dinner Mr. Murray asked Robert to wait in their rooms for him. He went off, and came back with a roll in his hand. He sat down, and wiped his face, with a long sigh.

"Robert, you understand, you know, how it was that I lost you? I was—drunk. By that drinking I broke up my home, caused your poor mother's most unhappy death, lost you, blackened all my life. Robert, you can see how I love you—but I would far rather see you dead than given to wine or strong drink. Robert, have you ever signed a pledge?"

"No, sir. But I've heard plenty of temperance. Mother was great on that. They called me 'The Captain's Bargain' because father bargained he would never drink a drop more, if I stayed with him."

"I wish I had made such a bargain with myself, when God gave you to me first," said poor Mr. Murray, "then I should never have heard you, my only child, calling strangers 'father and mother.' Well, Robert, I want you to sign a pledge. I want to feel safe about you—to make you safe. I know you will keep to what you pledge and promise. I went out and bought a pledge—here it is. Read it over, my son. Read it and think about it, and then sign it, if you mean to keep it to the very last letter, in the fear of God."

"Of course I'll sign it," said Robert; "I lend me your pen, please, father. I know what it means. I should keep it without signing. My mother made a temperance man of me long ago. I never thought of anything else."

"Well, I'm glad she did," said Mr. Murray.

"I see, I must owe everything to these Allens."

"Why not?" said Robert, frankly. "I'd have been in a poorhouse only for them. There, it is signed, father."

"I see I have forgotten to buy you a pen, Robert; come out, and I will buy you a gold pen, and a writing-desk. You will not owe them to any one but me."

That writing-desk was a true treasure, for it was well stocked, and had, among other things, postal-cards and letter-stamps. That evening, while his father talked to some friends, Robert managed to send off a card to the Captain. In the morning, while his father was yet asleep, Robert rose, and wrote a long letter to his mother, Eliza, telling how good his new-found father was, and how lavish in gifts, and how fond of him. And then he wrote, that he knew he should never be happy anywhere but at the mill; he would be glad to give up all his new possessions, to go back to be "their boy" once more. All the things in the world would not make up for his mother, and dear Pink. They might be sure he thought of them every hour in the day. Eight pages of clear boyish writing did Robert mail to his mother. Over that letter the entire Allen household cried again and again. The schoolmaster read it, proud of his pupil's head and heart; the Britts read it, all the district read it, and agreed that Robert deserved all the best that the Superintendent could do for him, and that "the Allens had had a dreadful loss."

"But he'll never get back here. Mr. Murray will not let him out of his sight again," said Deacon Britt.

But Mr. Murray's pride and ambition for his son were equal even to letting him live apart from him for a time. A week after he had carried Robert off in triumph from the mill, he said to him: "My dear boy, it would be very pleasant for us to go on living here, at the hotel, buying things, and seeing sights all day long; but at that rate you would become an idler, and after idleness comes mischief. I must not spoil the industry and uprightness that have always been so beautiful in you, to me. You must go to school."

"I like to go to school," said Robert.

"But this will be a very different affair from the red school-house up on the Mountain. You must apply yourself to Latin and French and German. I have been to see the master of a school, about ten miles from the city. He says, as you have had so few advantages, and are so far behind other boys, you had better board at the school. You will be able to give closer attention to your studies. I will go and see you every Saturday afternoon, and once a month you shall come here Friday evening, and stay until Monday morning. I wanted you to have a room by yourself, so that I could furnish it up handsomely, but the master says he has the boys in dormitories, six or eight in each, and that it will be far better for you to be with the rest, as you have seen so little of other boys."

"But I have seen a great deal of other boys," said Robert; "I have always known plenty of boys."

"I mean the boys of your own station in life,—young gentlemen,—nice boys."

"I don't think there could be nicer boys than those I knew on the Mountain," said Robert. "They knew all kinds of games; they could ride, and swim, and dive, and fish, and shoot, and climb. They minded what was said to them, told the truth, learned their lessons, were all teetotalers, and were never ugly or saucy to the girls. You don't know, father, what nice boys were at our red school-house."

"Yes? Well, no doubt you will be just as pleased with your new schoolmates. I hope you will be happy at the school. Even if you do not like it there, you know school-life is necessary for you, and the more diligent you are, the sooner it will be over, and I will take you to see all the famous countries of the old world."

Robert made no answer. He did not say what he might have said truly, that he was full of a deadly home-sickness for the mill and the dear faces there. The reverence which Eliza had inculcated for parents and elders restrained him, and to it was added Lal's Mountain respect for the great man,—the Superintendent. As yet, Robert had not been able to lose the Superintendent in the father.

"They will be rather strict at the school," said Mr. Murray. "I meant to give you ten dollars a month for pocket-money, but the master only allows two dollars."

"That will make no difference to me," said Robert, "for I have never had any money to spend."

"Still, you should be accustomed to the use of money. I think I shall give it to you just the same, and you can take two dollars of it to school. What will you do with the rest? How will you spend it?"

"I shall not spend it," said Robert; "I shall put the whole ten dollars in a bag every month and keep it in my trunk. Ten dollars a month will be a hundred and twenty dollars in a year."

Mr. Murray shook his head.

"Early poverty makes of some men misers, of others spendthrifts. One extreme is about as bad as the other. Money hoarded, money wasted, alike curse the world. Money is valuable only for what good it will secure for us. What good will money do in a trunk?"

"In two years," said Robert, "I shall have two hundred and forty dollars. Then I shall send Pink for a year to school where she can learn music. You don't know how Pink loves music. She sings just like a bird. I heard mother ask the master once about schools where Pink could learn music, and the cheapest was two hundred dollars a year. The forty dollars would pay her car-fare and buy her some shoes and frocks. Mother said a music-school was far out of Pink's reach. But it will not be if I pay for it."

"And you would save up every penny for two years for that?" cried Mr. Murray, in a vexed tone.

"Of course," said Robert. "I never have had money to spend. And you are so kind to me, father, and give me so many things, that there is nothing left for me to buy."

This planning for the benefit of the Allen family did not stir up Mr. Murray to consider his own obligations to them. It rather stirred up his wrath that the Allens had so large a share of his son's heart. In his paternal feelings he was so unreasonable that all whom Robert loved seemed his father's rivals and enemies. He told himself that it was quite time Robert went to school, where hard study, a new phase of life, and the sports of boys who were used to the city and the boarding-school, and had nothing in common with mills, barges, country schools, and little red-headed maids in calico gowns, would wean Robert's thoughts from the Allen household. Pink and Eliza seemed to Mr. Murray the especial foes of his peace. He pointed out to Robert one of the ladies who lived at the hotel and came down to breakfast daily in a splendid silk morning-robe.

"Now, Robert, there is a lady; the kind of lady you will see in society when you are a man. What do you think of her?"

"She looks very well, but not—very useful," said the boy, "and I don't think her face is half as nice as my mother's—my mother Allen's, I mean—for I never saw any face half as nice as the one in my real mother's picture."

"I'm glad you have sense to appreciate that," said his father. "And what do you think of those two little girls in dark blue, at the other end of the hall?"

"They don't begin with Pink," said Robert, scornfully.

"Pink has red hair. I don't like red hair."

"Oh, father! Pink's hair is the most beautiful gold color! Sometimes you cannot tell it from the color of mother's wedding-ring! And Pink's eyes are just as blue as the sky, or as violets. And Pink is so kind to the twins, and so nice to her mother. I heard that biggest girl say, 'Indeed, I won't' to her mother yesterday; and that other one gave her little brother a slap for getting some candy on her dress. Pink and mother are worth the whole lot in this hotel! If you'd only go up there, and get acquainted with them, father, you'd see—"

Robert's eyes shone with eager pleading. But Mr. Murray was an obstinate and a jealous man. He shook his head again.

"No, no you've seen quite too much of them, Robert."

Robert and his father were sitting in their room reading, the next evening, when Robert, hearing a deep sigh, looked up, and saw that his father had sunk back in his chair, his face very white, and that he seemed quite unconscious. He sprang to him, wheeled his chair to the window, which he threw open, then bathed his face, and rubbed his hands, and loosened his necktie and collar. Presently Mr. Murray revived a little.

"Give me that bottle of medicine from my dressing-case, Robert. There, help me to the sofa. No, don't ring—I'm used to this."

He lay for a time quietly. Then he said, as Robert kept close by him, and looked distressed:

"You were frightened, my boy?"

"Oh, yes! I thought you were dead! I never saw any one faint before, except Mrs. Britt, once. Are you better now?"

"Yes. Ever since my troubles in losing you and your dear mother, I have had these attacks. You felt badly to see me so, did you?"

"Indeed I did," said Robert, resting his head on Mr. Murray's prematurely gray hair.

At the sight of Mr. Murray, lying as if dead, the boy's heart had recognized, as never before, the filial tie. He knew he loved this late-found father.

"Robert," said Mr. Murray, presently, "what would you have done if I had died?"

Robert was silent.

"Tell me, my son, suppose that I had died, what then?"

"Why—I suppose I should have gone back to the mill. Where else could I go, father?"

"And what would you do with all your money, my son?"

"What money, sir? I would not have any money, would I?"

"Of course, you would have all mine. Are you not my only son and heir? You would have many thousands, Robert. What would you do with your money? Speak up."

"I should do with it—just whatever my mother told me to," said Robert. "I should make father—Allen—take all that they need, and I should do as mother advised with the rest. Every one says mother is a business woman, and has such a good head. But, don't ask me things like that, please, father. You won't die, shall you? Are you sure you are better? I couldn't bear to have you die."

This assurance gave some consolation to poor Mr. Murray in the midst of his jealous suspicion of the Allen influence.

That night while Robert slept soundly, Mr. Murray, in the next room, spent many wakeful hours. Since finding his son, Mr. Murray had thought of nothing but the joy of the present hour. He seemed to have a new lease of life, and to see, in prospect, many happy years spent with his boy. Robert should become all that his father's most ambitious dreams forecast for him; he should escape the moral rocks and quicksands whereon his father's life had come to wreck; his father would renew his own youth, and live a new and better life in the son. But the fainting fit in the evening, and the short conversation after it, had filled Mr. Murray with new fears. If he should die, his son would return to the Allens, and soon forget the father who had been so short an episode in his life. All the Murray fortunes would be bestowed on the Allens, who, as poor Mr. Murray insisted on believing, had robbed him of his boy, usurped his place in the child's heart, refused to give him his own son!

Mr. Murray resolved at once to perform two neglected duties. He would go to a physician of eminence, and have a thorough examination of his physical state, and learn what were his probable prospects of life. Then he would go to a lawyer, and have a will drawn up, leaving his property to Robert, in the hands of a Trust Company, and appointing two guardians of his person; so that he should not go back to Lal's Mountain. Moreover, as Allen influence was strong in the lad's heart, Mr. Murray concluded to give him more time to outgrow it, and determined to set not twenty one, but twenty-four, as the time when Robert should come into possession of his property. He was determined not to allow Robert to throw himself and his money away on "those people at the mill."

Therefore, when breakfast was over, Mr. Murray said, "I have business, Robert, which will keep me away from you until our six o'clock dinner. I suppose you know your way about the city, and can entertain yourself. I will give you some money to spend."

He handed Robert a ten-dollar bill. They went out upon the hotel steps and Mr. Murray signalled a carriage for himself.

"Enjoy yourself, Robert. Go to Fairmount Park or somewhere. But, stop. A ten-dollar bill will be large to change; here is a two, also, in case you need car-fare or some small thing."

He stepped into the carriage and drove off, leaving Robert with the open pocket-book in his hand, and the two bills looking out of the Russia-leather pockets. Oh dear, how very glad he would be if he could put that money in Eliza's hand and beg her to use it for the family. But he knew the sturdy independence of Eliza and her family. She would not take a gift of money,—that money being Mr. Murray's gift to him. She had not refused Robert's earnings; she took them freely when he gave them, just as she freely shared her earnings with him. But this money would be different; she would not accept it. Then came the happy thought: she would not refuse; she could not return a present purchased as a token of his love with this money. He had the whole day before him. Why should he not go shopping?

THE CRASH IN THE HALL.

A Service where God's Love is not, will Never Satisfy.

ITY it is that masters and servants don't always agree! Good servants will be crossed by bad masters, and good masters will be plagued by bad servants, until both masters and servants are influenced by the same principle of love to Christ, and guided by the same rule of obedience to God's law.

Mr. Holt wanted a footman, and two persons applied for the situation. Ralph was recommended to him as a plain, honest, pious servant; and Reynolds as a sharp, shrewd fellow. Ralph was ignorant of many things that Reynolds knew. He did not know how to tell an untruth, to wear a mask of deceit, or to rob his master. But if there were many things known to Reynolds which were unknown to Ralph, there were some things familiar to the latter, to which the former was an utter stranger. He had an acquaintance with his Bible and his own heart; and, more than all, he knew him, whom to know is eternal life. Mr. Holt saw the applicants for five minutes only. "No Ralph for me," he said; "I will take Reynolds."

"Sign this," said he to Reynolds, putting a paper before him; "I like every one to know what he is doing. I agree to take you for a quarter, at the rate of thirty pounds a year." Reynolds signed the paper without so much as reading a line of it, believing that no master could make him do anything that he had not a mind to do. The paper was witnessed by the butler. The Squire had chosen Reynolds rather than Ralph, because he was the better-looking of the two, and quicker in his movements; but a man may pay too dear for his whistle.

Not long had Reynolds been in his place before he began to find out his master, and his master to find him out. The Squire had put down in the paper that Reynolds signed many things which the latter had never been accustomed to do, and this made him half mad with vexation. He was determined to have his revenge.

The end of the quarter was near at hand, and Reynolds, who well knew that his services would then be dispensed with, began to cast about in his mind how he should spite his master.

Mr. Holt had a few hobbies, and one of them was a set of china which had cost him a high price; it was his delight to launch out in praise of his "Pekin porcelain."

Mr. Holt's set of china, though it afforded him much pleasure, occasioned him no small degree of solicitude, for well he knew that if by any accident a single piece were broken, he should never be able to get its place supplied. On high days and holidays, and then only, it made its appearance.

Adorned profusely with metallic hues,
With golden purples and cobaltic blues.

As it was quite the intention of the Squire to send off Reynolds when he had completed his quarter, he invited a large party the day before, that he might have his services on that occasion, instead of those of the fresh footman, who might at first be a little awkward. Now, then, was the time for Reynolds to secure his revenge. A word or two of concert with Haycroft the housemaid, who hated her mistress quite as much as Reynolds did his master, was sufficient.

All things went off well at the party, and the Squire, as usual, launched out eloquently in praise of his "Pekin porcelain." At length Reynolds had to carry out the tray containing a great part of the china, and this he seemed to do with particular care. Of course it was quiet accidentally, (at least he so afterwards represented it to be), that he met Haycroft midway on the stairs carrying up a small table to an upper chamber; and of course it was nothing but an accident when Reynolds, as he raised the tray for a moment over the banister to let Haycroft pass, happening to lose his hold, down fell the tray into the hall with a terrible crash, taking with it a part of the glass chandelier which was suspended there.

The crash told its tale too loudly not to be heard and understood by all from the drawing-room to the kitchen. From the latter ran Squire Holt, with a face red with rage, while his lady, followed, accompanied by half a dozen of her guests. The rage of Squire Holt when he saw on the stone floor of the hall the wreck of his china knew no bounds. Forgetful of his company, he broke into the most violent language, declaring, with an oath, that his "Pekin porcelain" had been wilfully demolished, while the wicked and exulting leer in the eye of Reynolds, which he too well understood, almost drove him to madness. That day was to Reynolds a day of inward exultation. He had executed his plan, he had spited his master, he had had his revenge.

On the morrow, Reynolds demanded his wages, seven pounds ten shillings; but now it was the Squire's turn to take the lead. True, he had irrecoverably lost his china, but half his vexation was taken away in the malicious joy of having overreached his "villain of a servant." With a malignant smile he produced the paper which Reynolds had signed without reading, one article of which was, that the full amount of his breakages should be deducted from his quarterly wages. If before the Squire had turned red, Reynolds now turned white with rage and disappointment. To sum up all in a few words, by that crash in the hall, Squire Holt had lost his china, and roguish Reynolds his wages and character.

There is no real cure for these sinful doings on the part of masters and servants, but that of getting Bible principles instilled into the head and heart. Then, and not till then, will servants be obedient to their masters, "Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but as the servant of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart." (Eph. 6: 6.) And then masters "will do the same things unto them," forbearing threatening; knowing that they have a Master in heaven, and that here is no "respect of persons with him." (Eph. 6: 9.)

CHURCH BUILDING IN SAMOA.

WHEN the Rev. Charles Phillips reported the building of a church in Samoa, where he was laboring there was some surprise expressed that he had made no appeal for funds. He thus explained the mystery. "This is the way we manage," he said. "When a village has resolved to build a new church, all the people unite together in the work. The first thing is to make an oven for the lime. A great hole is dug near the site of the new building. Trees are cut down, dried, and placed in position in the hole. Then men, women, and children go to the beach and collect blocks of coral, as heavy as they can carry, and place them upon the logs in the lime pit. The coral is then burnt through and becomes lime, from which they make their mortar. Again, all will unite in collecting suitable stones for the walls of the church. When this is completed the men will seek out, often on the mountains, suitable trees for the pillars and beams of the new church. These are prepared, as a rule, on the spot, and then pulled with singing and rejoicing to the site of the new church. In the meantime the women go to the sugar-cane plantations and collect the leaves, which they prepare for the thatch of the church. With few exceptions these native-built churches have no seats, as the worshippers are accustomed to sit cross-legged on the matted floor. In this way the people are able to build their own churches without seeking for any external aid. Churches built in this way are dear to every one who helped in the building and there is no difficulty about keeping them in good condition. Every one is ready to lend a willing hand in beautifying and repairing them." This is more than can be said of the members of churches in all lands.

OVER THERE.

JUST beyond the shadowy valley,
Where the dreaded billows roll,
There awaits a glorious future,
For the weary earth-worn soul.

Just within the shining portal,
On the other, better shore,
We shall meet our own beloved ones.
Not one lost, but gone before.

Where the flowers, sweet and vernal
Crown the never-fading years,
There our hopes will bloom eternal
All undimmed with doubts and fears.

Glory! glory! God will guide us,
Safely through the icy tide,
Till we stand with the immortals,
Hand in hand and side by side.

RUINED BY A BET.

In a recent sermon to young men, Dr. Thain Davidson mentioned a sad case which had come to his knowledge a few days previously. A lad about 18, who was tempted to bet, made six hundred dollars at one stroke. He became perfectly wild with excitement. Accustomed to possess little more than half a dollar at one time, he was almost crazy with joy.

He filled his breast pockets with bills, he stuffed his waistcoat and trousers pockets with silver; and going up to his room literally rolled himself round and round upon his bed, revelling in the thought of the money that encircled him. Of course, the passion for gambling was created; he was no more fit for quiet work in an office; he gave up or lost his situation; went deeper and deeper into betting transactions; ultimately lost every penny he had, together with character and health; and his distressed brother who told Dr. Davidson the story wept as he added to it that he had just come from the room in which the young gambler lay dead. The only ground for a shadow of a hope for his salvation lay in the fact that a book of Gospel sermons by Dr. Davidson had been read to him during his last illness, and he had begged to have one particular sermon in which the way of salvation was plainly stated, read to him again and again.

Almost his last words to his brother were a request that he would go to Dr. Davidson and thank him for that sermon.

SECRET DISCIPLES.

The figures which appear in the missionary reports often seem but a meagre return for so much labor. Only a few converts after efforts arduous and protracted. But they do not represent all that has been accomplished.

The Rev. C. W. Thorn, of Poona, Western India, writes that his first year of missionary life has been a very happy one. "All during the rains," he says, "the Divinity School students conducted open-air preachings, and we had some splendid times. On one occasion we noticed two Brahmins in the crowd who seemed specially interested. One was an old man with white hair and a pleasant face. One of the men took him aside, and they had a long talk. He said that he had been convinced of the truth of the Gospel for many years, but had been afraid to give up his old religion. Now he felt another loud call in his heart to believe in Jesus, and he had almost decided to do so. He would come in a couple of days, he said, to the mission-house and have a further talk; but we have not seen him yet. This is often the way. The other was a tall young Brahmin, and, as his way lay in our direction, we came along together. Then he told me that a little while ago he had written a tract to prove that Christianity was the only true religion.

"Then you are a Christian, I presume?" I said. "Oh, no," he replied; "a Hindu. I should like to be different, but I am afraid of my friends, for they would persecute me if I turned my back on their religion."

A NATIONAL LOSS.

James Russell Lowell the Famous Poet, Humorist and Diplomatist Passes Away.

OUR country is poorer this week in the kind of wealth it can ill afford to lose. One of her famous sons, whose fame has spread wherever the English language is spoken, lies dead. The pen, which has written so much and so well, is laid down forever, and the delicate satire and shrewd humor which have taught the public truths it was averse to learning, will never more point the lesson of the hour. James Russell Lowell, the poet, the diplomatist, the cultured gentleman, is dead, and while we mourn for him, we chiefly, if selfishly, deplore our own loss.

Mr. Lowell was taken sick about five weeks ago, though for some months before that time he had not been in his usual health. His physician seems to have been aware that an internal tumor had been developed, the removal of which was beyond surgical skill. He did not inform his distinguished patient of the nature of the trouble, but he told him sufficient to inspire caution as to diet and exercise. When Mr. Lowell was taken seriously ill the physician was away from home, but he was consulted and he directed the system of treatment. It was impossible to save his life and all that could be done was to smooth the passage to the grave. Two weeks ago the sufferer became delirious. He thought he was establishing it as a power in literature by Holmes, Emerson and Longfellow. Subsequently he became joint editor of the North American Review, and also accepted a professorship at Harvard. In 1877, President Hayes appointed him minister to Spain and on the accession of Garfield he was transferred to London. There he was cordially welcomed and much liked by both the court and the people. Since his return he has lived quietly at the family mansion of Elmwood at Cambridge, Mass., where he was born. Most of his time has been spent in literary work and especially in preparing for the press a revised and complete edition of the forty volumes which he had written during his busy life.

Mr. Lowell was twice married. In 1844, he was married to Miss Maria White, a lady of remarkable culture and refinement, but of delicate constitution. She was the author of some beautiful poems and some strong abolitionist articles. It was mainly due to her influence that her husband espoused the cause. She died in 1853. Longfellow, who was one of her warm friends, refers to her death in his poem of The Two Angels. Four years afterward Mr. Lowell was married to Miss Frances Dunlap, of Portland, Me. She contributed greatly to her husband's social success as United States Minister at the English court. She died in 1885 when his term was near its close. Of several children the only survivor is Mrs. Edward Burnett who devotedly watched her father during his sickness.

A GRUFF VISITOR.

In the East End of London a little money was collected to establish a hospital for sick children. It was not much, and but little could be done with it. An old wharf warehouse was bought and fitted up as far as the money would go. But it was a very dilapidated place, utterly unsuitable for the purpose. Still, it was a great blessing to the neighborhood, which, until the warehouse was opened had no place at all where a sick child could be sent. The work went on, many children were cured there and many a life saved. There were also some remarkable cases of moral reformation during the time the sick children were removed from the contamination of the streets. If so much could be done under so many disadvantages, how much might be done in a better building and with better appliances! But the managers were powerless. There were no funds nor prospect of obtaining any.

One day a gruff, shabbily-dressed old man called and asked if he might look over the institution. He was conducted up the rickety stairs, at the side of which a rope was stretched to serve as a balustrade. He expressed his disgust and indignantly asked the Secretary if he considered that a fit place to be called a children's hospital. The official replied that it was not, but that it was the best they could do and better than nothing. "Well," said the stranger, I will give you something to get the stairs put right, anyway." He asked for a pen and taking a cheque-book from his pocket he filled in the blank and put it back in his pocket. Having gone through the rooms talking with the children and examining everything carefully, he asked for a pen again and said he would write another cheque. Then he returned to the room used as an office and looked over the hospital records of receipts and expenditures. "Does not seem to cost you much for management," he said. "That is right. Let the money go to the children. That is what I believe in. I think I'll write another cheque." He did so and handed all three to the Secretary. The official looked at the three strips of paper and found that each was for a sum equivalent to five thousand dollars. He could scarcely find words to thank the donor. "Never mind," said the latter, and buttoning up his shabby coat he walked away, leaving behind him fifteen thousand dollars wherewith a new building could be obtained.

THE SONG OF FAITH.

YET Love will dream, and Faith will trust,
Since He who knows our need is just,
That somehow, somewhere, meet we must,
Alas for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress trees!
Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play!
Who has not learned in hours of faith,
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That Life is ever lord of Death,
And Love can never lose its own!

—Whittier.

Do not put off taking a medicine. Numerous little ailments, if neglected, will soon break up the system. Take Hood's Sarsaparilla now, to expel disease and give you strength and appetite.

PRISCILLA spinning, long ago, sighs as she thinks how soon her linen Will lose its glossy luster, when the wash it once or twice has been in. She does not know that in the soap the evil lies that makes her suffer. Its great excess of alkali, which cuts the fiber, makes it rougher.

Our modern maidens need not sigh since IVORY SOAP has been invented, Containing no free alkali—by which the ruin is prevented. For linen washed with IVORY SOAP in snowy beauty'll ne'er diminish. But always, while it lasts, preserve its pristine gloss and lustrous finish.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

away from his home, imagined himself among the royal personages with whom his diplomatic experience had brought him in contact, and was evidently living over again some of the important events of his life. On Sunday, August 9, he recovered consciousness, but was excessively weak owing to the pain he had endured. On the following day the intense heat of the weather tried him severely, and the slightest movement caused him agony. To his attendants who tried to give him relief by changing his posture, he said, "Oh, why don't you let me die?" Those were his last rational words. He soon became unconscious again, finally sank into a comatose condition and passed away on Wednesday morning, Aug. 12.

He was seventy-two years of age. Born at Cambridge, Mass., on Feb. 22, 1819, the son of an eminent Unitarian minister, he passed his early years in an atmosphere of piety, learning and invigorating mental activity. The family has long been a distinguished one. It is descended from an ancient English family, a representative of which—Percival Lowell came to America in 1639, and settled at Newbury, Mass. The town of Lowell takes its name from one of his descendants, Francis Cabot Lowell, and the famous Lowell Institute of Boston owes its existence to another of them, John Lowell, Jr., who paid $250,000 for it and gave it to the city. The future poet entered Harvard in his sixteenth year and graduated in 1838. After a short interval, part of which he spent at Concord, where he began that friendship with Emerson which continued until the death of the latter, he returned to Harvard to study law and was called to the bar. But by that time Lowell had discovered that literature, not law, was to be his occupation. He had already written several poems and the next year 1841, his first volume appeared.

From this time forward the events of his life are well known to the public. He entered journalism, and among many other contributions published the Biglow Papers in the Boston Courier. He also started the Pioneer, which ingloriously failed after the issue of three numbers, though it numbered among its contributors men so eminent as Hawthorne, Whittier and Poe. In 1857 he became editor of the Atlantic Monthly, and was assisted in

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC R.R. runs through Car Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

AS PANTS THE HART.

(Metrical Version.)

PSALM 42.

JAMES McGRANAHAN.

1. Far from Thy sacred courts my tears Have been my food by night and day,
2. These things I'll call to mind, and cry, When I shall tread the sacred way
3. O why art thou cast down, my soul? And what should so disquiet thee?

While constant-ly, with bitter sneers, "Where is thy God?" the scoffers say,
To Zi-on, praising God on high, With throngs who keep the holy day.
Still hope in God, and Him ex-tol, Whose face brings saving health to me.

CHORUS.

AMONG THE SHEAVES.

REAPER," I asked among the golden sheaves,
Toiling at noon amid the falling leaves,
What recompense hast thou for all thy toil,
What tithe of all thy Master's wine and oil?
Or dost thou coin thy brow's hot drops to gold,
Or add to house and land, or flock and fold?"
The reaper paused from binding close the grain,
And said, while shone his smile through labor's stain,
"I do my Master's work as He has taught;
And work of love with gold was never bought,
He knoweth all of which my life hath need;
His servants reap as they have sown the seed.
With all my heart I bind my Master's grain,
And love makes sweet my labor and my pain."

A HELPING HAND.

A helping hand we all may give,
If but a pleasant word to say,
And something find each day we live
To help another on the way.

A helping hand may sow the seed
From which the fruits of goodness grow

And to the right may gently lead
The erring from the path of woe.

A helping hand to all mankind,
Among the rich, the poor, and low,
In every state of life can find
An act of kindness to bestow.

A helping hand where'er we go,
A ray of sunshine may impart.
And but a deed of kindness show
A noble and a generous heart.

DISCOVERY OF ANCIENT MANUSCRIPTS.

A WONDERFUL story comes from Egypt of the discovery of papyrus manuscripts which date back to three centuries before Christ. The value of the manuscripts will be realized best by Greek scholars, but the discovery excites hopes of further finds which will be of inestimable value to every soul in Christendom, for it furnishes a clue to a whole storehouse of literature among which may be found portions of the new Testament far older than any now known.

The discovery is due to the ingenuity of the well-known explorer, Mr. Flinders Petrie. The 'find' consists of portions of a lost play of Euripides, of passages from the Phædo of Plato, and some other literary fragments. The manner of the 'find' was remarkable. Mr. Petrie had noticed that certain mummy cases at Gurob, in the Fayoum, were not made of wood, but of layers of papyrus gummed together. Some of them bore faint traces of writing, and this writing turns out to be nothing less than these Greek texts. "And now" says an enthusiastic member of the exploring party "investigation is turning to Hellenistic Egypt—to that region which was for centuries the focus of the civilization that most concerns us of the modern world; and Mr. Petrie has proved that the mummy-cases, made up of scraps and shreds of old waste-paper, may contain almost the very autographs of the great masters of Greek literature. What is to come next? If a bit of Euripides has leapt to light, why not some of the many lost plays of Sophocles and Æschylus, or some songs of Sappho, or the lyrics of some of the Greek poets whom Horace copied or translated? And why not—greatest treasure of all—why not, in that centre of Hellenistic Judaism, a Gospel papyrus of the first century?"

GENERAL BOOTH'S TOUR.

General Booth embarked at Southampton on July 25 for a six months' tour in South Africa and Australia. He has received more than £120,000 for his Social scheme. At the same time, he has just issued a fresh appeal for £10,000. He will build a headquarters for the Army in London to cost £175,000.

LEARNING CHINESE.

THE Chinese language is as difficult to read and pronounce as it is to understand. Each word is represented by one character and the characters are not placed side by side but one under the other, in columns. How the missionaries are taught may be seen by the following letter from the lamented young man whose portrait appears on page 517.

"I had my first lesson in Chinese this afternoon," Dr. Mackenzie wrote. "My teacher, Yang by name, is a very happy, light-hearted fellow, a Christian. I like him exceedingly. He assists Dr. Reid in the Hospital, so we are brother medicals. He teaches me thus: We sit down together with the same book, he calls over a word, and I try to imitate him; my mouth is forced into all sorts of odd shapes, and I struggle on. The idea is first to get the proper sound, the meaning afterwards, and then, (probably the most difficult) to learn the characters. We go on for about three hours, until I am tired of repeating sounds after him."

A CRITICAL CASE.

"You have heard" Dr. Mackenzie wrote to his brother, shortly after his arrival in China, "something of the tremendous prejudice which the Chinese have for everything foreign. A marked instance of this has just occurred. One of the deacons of the native church, a very good, devoted Christian, was taken ill; he got worse, and then Mr. John told him of the new doctor who had just arrived. But the man would not send for me and told Mr. John they had doctors and remedies of their own. For twenty days he was very ill, getting worse and worse, during which time he had five Chinese doctors. One afternoon I received a note from Mr. John, written at this man's house, asking me to come down, as the people had consented to my seeing him. I went down at once and found the man dying; they had sent for me only when they thought all hope was gone. He was in a burning fever with a temperature of 103 degrees, with a very rapid pulse and dreadfully emaciated for he had only taken rice-water for twenty days. I saw that he could not live long, unless the fever was stopped, as he had no strength; and, believing that malaria was at the bottom of it, I determined to give him a large dose, twenty grains, of quinine right off. The only objection was that if it failed they would say I had hastened his death, so Mr. John told me. However, I did what was right, and gave him the dose, but I was not allowed to give him food. In the evening they sent to say he was much worse. I went down and found the small room crammed with his friends, waiting to see him die, while his own family were pulling him about, thinking to prevent his going off. The man was delirious from the quinine. I turned all the people out, except his wife and son, and managed after very great persuasion from Mr. John to get them to leave him alone. Before we left he had fallen off into a sound sleep. In the morning on our way to the house we met his son coming to tell us that he had slept all night. We found him dreadfully weak but without a trace of fever; still his weakness was very dangerous yet. His friends were willing now to give him anything I ordered, and so we poured in milk and eggs, beef tea and quinine. Now he is able to walk about his room and enjoy his rice."

A CHANGE OF TACTICS.

An evidence of alarm is manifested among the followers of the False Prophet. Missionaries of the Free Church of India report a remarkable movement among the Mohammedans of Madras. There has been founded what has been called a Preachers' League. Two men, White Khan and Monlavi Hassan Ali, have begun to preach the gospel of Islam, with a view to the conversion of Hindus, and, if possible, Christians, to the faith of Mohammed. "The young men," writes a missionary, "are on the whole very friendly towards us, and try to live, at any rate as far as we can see, lives akin to those of Christians. They are free from the prejudices of the old-fashioned Mohammedans, and preach a Mohammedanism which is nearer Christianity than was preached by their co-religionists heretofore. To say the least, the sword has been cast aside for the word, though not the Word of God. They claim to be at one with the Unitarians of America."

THE WORLD'S FAIR OF '92

How it may be made a Blessing to the Nations—A "Christian Herald" Pavilion—Magnificent Exposition Buildings.

HOW shall the World's Fair of 1892 be made a blessing to our own nation and to the world at large? This is a problem that demands the attention of every Christian in the United States. In a recent sermon on the coming Fair, the Rev. Dr. Talmage, editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, deprecated the tendency to permit the materialistic and monetary idea to overpower the moral and religious. "During that Exposition," he said "Christian civilization will confront barbarism. We shall have a greater opportunity to make an evangelizing impression upon foreign materialities than would otherwise be afforded in a quarter of a century. Let the churches of the city where the Exposition is held be open every day and prayers be offered, and sermons preached, and doxologies sung. In the time between this and the world's convocation, let us get a baptism of the Holy Ghost, so that the six months of that World's Fair shall be fifty Pentecosts in one, and instead of three thousand converted, as in the former Pentecost, hundreds and thousands will be converted. . . . Instead of the sixteen or eighteen tribes of people reported at that Pentecost, all the chief nations of Europe and Asia, North and South America, will be represented at our World's Fair in 1892, and a Pentecost here and then, would mean the salvation of the world.

"Instead of the slow process of having to send the Gospel to other lands by our own American missionaries, who have difficult toil in acquiring the foreign languages, and then must contend with foreign prejudices, what a grand thing to have able and influential for-

is now perfecting arrangements for the erection of A "Christian Herald" Pavilion, with a seating capacity of over twelve hundred, in which interesting international interdenominational services will be held every afternoon and evening, in the various languages represented at the Fair. These will be con-together with the full programme regarding the services. Rev. Dr. Talmage has kindly consented to conduct the opening service at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD PAVILION.

From time to time THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has published illustrations of some of the Fair buildings, and to-day we give a representation of the largest of all—Machinery Hall. Although not as rich in ornamentation as the Administration Building (which was portrayed in our last week's issue) it is more imposing. The main Machinery building measures 850 by 500 feet. It is spanned by three arched trusses, and the interior will present the appearance of three railroad train houses, side by side, surrounded on all the four sides by a 50-foot gallery. In each of these three long naves there is to be an elevated travelling crane, running from end to end of the building. These will be useful in moving machinery, and when the Exposition opens, platforms will be placed on them, and visitors will view from these the entire exhibition.

Steam power will be used throughout this main building, and this steam will be supplied from a main power house adjoining the south side of the building. The exterior toward the stock exhibit and the railroad, is to be of the plainest description. On the two sides adjoining the grand court, the exterior will, however, be eigners converted during their visit in America and then have them return to their native lands with the glorious tidings. Oh for an overwhelming work of grace for the year 1892!"

The World's Fair will have a special interest for the readers of this journal, as its publisher tinued while the Exposition lasts. The entire expense will be borne by the publisher of this paper. We expect to have the plans for this pavilion completed at an early date, and will then take pleasure in laying before our readers illustrations of the interior and exterior,

THE TABERNACLE PULPIT

GREAT EXPLOITS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday at Ocean Grove, N. J., before a vast audience.

"The people that do know their God shall be strong and do exploits." Dan. 11: 32.

ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, the old sinner, came down three times with his army to desolate the Israelites, advancing one time with a hundred and two trained elephants, swinging their trunks this way and that, and sixty-two thousand infantry, and six thousand cavalry troops, and they were driven back. Then, the second time, he advanced with seventy thousand armed men, and had been again defeated. But the third time he laid successful siege until the navy of Rome came in with the flash of their long banks of oars and demanded that the siege be lifted. And Antiochus Epiphanes said he wanted time to consult with his friends about it, and Popilius, one of the Roman ambassadors, took a staff and made a circle on the ground around Antiochus Epiphanes, and compelled him to decide before he came out of that circle; whereupon he lifted the siege. Some of the Hebrews had submitted to the invader, but some of them resisted valorously, as did Eleazer when he had swine's flesh forced into his mouth, spit it out, although he knew he must die for it, and did die for it; and others, as my text says, did exploits.

An exploit I would define to be a heroic act, a brave feat, a great achievement. "Well," you say, "I admire such things, but there is no chance for me; mine is a sort of hum-drum life. If I had an Antiochus Epiphanes to fight, I also could do exploits." You are right, so far as great wars are concerned. There will probably be no opportunity to distinguish yourself in battle.

Neither will you probably become a great inventor. Nineteen hundred and ninety-nine out of every two thousand inventions found in the Patent Office at Washington never yielded their authors enough money to pay for the expenses of securing the patent. So you will probably never be a Morse or an Edison or a Humphrey Davy or an Eli Whitney. There is not much probability that you will be the one out of the hundred who achieves extraordinary success in commercial or legal or medical or literary spheres. What then? Can you have no opportunity to do exploits? I am going to show that there are three opportunities open that are grand, thrilling, far-reaching, stupendous, and overwhelming. They are before you now. In one, if not all three of them, you may do exploits. The three greatest things on earth to do are to save a man, or save a woman, or save a child.

During the course of his life, almost every man gets into an exigency, is caught between two fires, is ground between two millstones, sits on the edge of some precipice, or in some other way comes near demolition. It may be a financial or a moral or a domestic or a social or a political exigency. You sometimes see it in court rooms. A young man has got into bad company and he has offended the law, and he is arraigned. All blushing and confused, he is in the presence of judge and jury and lawyers. He can be sent right on in the wrong direction. He is feeling disgraced, and he is almost desperate. Let the District-Attorney overhaul him as though he were an old offender, let the ablest attorneys at the bar refuse to say a word for him, because he cannot afford a considerable fee; let the judge give no opportunity for presenting the mitigating circumstances, hurry up the case, and hustle him up to Auburn or Sing Sing. If he live seventy years, for seventy years he will be a criminal, and each decade of his life will be blacker than its predecessor.

Why don't his father come and help him? His father is dead. Why don't his mother come and help him? She is dead. Where are all the ameliorating and salutary influences of society? They do not touch him. Why did not some one long ago in the case understand that there was an opportunity for the exploit which would be famous in heaven a quadrillion of years after the earth has become scattered ashes in the last whirlwind?

So there are commercial exigencies. A very late spring obliterates the demand for spring overcoats and spring hats and spring apparel of all sorts. Hundreds of thousands of people say: "It seems we are going to have no spring, and we shall go straight out of winter into warm weather, and we can get along without the usual spring attire." Or there is no autumn weather, the heat plunging into the cold, and the usual clothing which is a compromise between summer and winter is not required. It makes a difference in the sale of millions and millions of dollars of goods, and some over-sanguine young merchant is caught with a vast amount of unsalable goods that will never be salable again, except at prices ruinously reduced. The young merchant with a somewhat limited capital is in a predicament. Sheriff's sale! Red flag in the window: "How much is bid for these out-of-fashion spring overcoats and spring hats, or fall clothing out of date? What do I hear in the way of a bid?" "Four dollars." "Absurd! I cannot take that bid of four dollars apiece.

Why, these coats when first put upon the market were offered at fifteen dollars each, and now I am offered only four dollars. Is that all? Five dollars, do I hear? Going at that! Gone at five dollars," and he takes the whole lot. The young merchant goes home that night and says to his wife: "Well, Mary, we will have to move out of this house and sell our piano. That old merchant that has had an evil eye on me ever since I started has bought out all that clothing, and he will have it rejuvenated, and next year put it on the market as new, while we will do well if we keep out of the poor-house." The young man, broken-spirited, goes to hard drinking. The young wife with her baby goes to her father's house, and not only is his store wiped out, but his home, his morals, and his prospects for two worlds—this and the next. And devils make a banquet of fire and fill their cups of gall, and drink deep to the health of the old merchant who swallowed up the young merchant who got stuck on spring goods and went down. That is one way, and some of you have tried it.

But there is another way. That young merchant who found that he had miscalculated in laying in too many goods of one kind, and been flung of the unusual season, is standing behind the counter, feeling very blue, and biting his fingernails, or looking over his account-books, which read darker and worse every time he looks at them, and thinking how his young wife will have to be put in a plain house than she ever expected to live in, or go to a third-rate boarding-house where they have tough liver and sour bread five mornings out of the seven. An old merchant comes in and says: "Well, Joe, this has been a hard season for young merchants, and this prolonged cool weather has put many in the doldrums, and I have been thinking of you a good deal of late, for just after I started in business I once got into the same scrape. Now, if there is anything I can do to help you out I will gladly do it. Better just put those goods out of sight for the present, and next season we will plan something about them. I will help you to some goods that you can sell for me on commission, and I will go down to one of the wholesale houses and tell them that I know you and will back you up, and if you want a few dollars to bridge over the present, I can let you have them. Be as economical as you can, keep a stiff upper lip, and remember that you have two friends, God and myself. Good-morning!" The old merchant goes away and the young man goes behind his desk, and the tears roll down his cheeks. It is the first time he has cried. Disaster made him mad at everything, and mad at man and mad at God. But this kindness melts him, and the tears seem to relieve his brain, and his spirits rise from ten below zero to eighty in the shade, and he comes out of the crisis.

About three years after, this young merchant goes into the old merchant's store and says: "Well, my old friend, I was this morning thinking over what you did for me three years ago. You helped me out of an awful crisis in my commercial history. I learned wisdom, prosperity has come, and the pallor has gone out of my wife's cheeks, and the roses that were there when I courted her in her father's house have bloomed again, and my business is splendid, and I thought I ought to let you know that you saved a man!" In a short time after, the old merchant who had been a good while shaky in his limbs and who had poor spells, is called to leave the world, and one morning after he had read the twenty-third Psalm about "The Lord is my Shepherd," he closes his eyes on this world, and an angel who had been for many years appointed to watch the old man's dwelling, cries upward the news that the patriarch's spirit is about ascending. And the twelve angels who keep the twelve gates of heaven, unite in crying down to this approaching spirit of the old man; "Come in and welcome, for it has been told all over these celestial lands that you saved a man."

There sometimes come exigencies in the life of a woman. One morning a few years ago I saw in the newspaper that there was a young woman in New York, whose pocketbook containing thirty-seven dollars and thirty-three cents had been stolen, and she had been left without a penny at the beginning of winter, in a strange city, and no work. And although she was a stranger, I did not allow the 9 o'clock mail to leave the lamp-post on our corner, without carrying the thirty-seven dollars and thirty-three cents; and the case was proved genuine. Now I have read all Shakspeare's tragedies, and all Victor Hugo's tragedies, and all Alexander Smith's tragedies, but I never read a tragedy more thrilling than that case, and similar cases by the hundreds and thousands in all our large cities; young women without money and without home and without work in the great maelstroms of metropolitan life. When such a case comes under your observation, how do you treat it? "Get out of my way, we have no room in our establishment for any more hands. I don't believe in women anyway, they are a lazy, idle, worthless set. John, please show this person out of the door." Or do you compliment her personal appearance, and say things to her which if any man said to your sister or daughter you would kill him on the spot? That is one way, and it is tried every day in the large cities, and many of those who advertise for female hands in factories, and for governesses in families, have proved themselves unfit to be in any place outside of hell. But there is another way, and I saw it one day in the Methodist Book Concern in New York, where a young woman applied for work and the gentleman in tone and manner said in substance: "My daughter, we employ women here, but I do not know of any vacant place in our department. You had better inquire at such and such a place, and I hope you will be successful in getting something to do. Here is my name and tell them I sent you." The embarrassed and humiliated woman seemed to give way to Christian confidence. She started out with a hopeful look that I think must have won for her a place in which to earn her bread. I rather think that considerate and Christian gentleman saved a woman. New York and Brooklyn ground up last year about thirty thousand young women, and would like to grind up about as many this year. Out of all that long procession of women who march on with no hope for this world or the next, battered and bruised and scoffed at, and flung off the precipice, not one but might have been saved for home and God and heaven. But good men and good women are not in that kind of business. Alas for that poor thing! nothing but the thread of that sewing-girl's needle held her, and the thread broke.

I have heard men tell in public discourse what a man is; but what is a woman? Until some one shall give a better definition, I will tell you what woman is. Direct from God, a sacred and delicate gift, with affections so great that no measuring line short of that of the infinite God can tell their bound. Fashioned to refine and soothe and lift and irradiate home and society and the world. Speak out, ye cradles, and tell of the feet that rocked you and the anxious faces that hovered over you! Speak out, ye nurseries of all Christendom, and ye homes, whether desolate or still in full bloom with the faces of wife, mother, and daughter, and help me to define what woman is. But as geographers tell us that the depths of the sea correspond with the heights of the mountains, I have this summer. They took it to the salt air of the seashore and to the tonic air of the mountains, but no help came, and the brief paragraph of its life is ended. Suppose that life could be restored by purchase, how much would that bereaved mother give? I am glad that there are those who know something of the value of a child. Its possibilities are tremendous. What will those hands yet do? Where will those feet yet walk? Toward what destiny will that never-dying soul betake itself? Shall those lips be the throne of blasphemy or benediction? Come, chronologists, and calculate the decades on decades, the centuries on centuries, of its lifetime. Oh, to save a child! Am I not right in putting that among the great exploits?

But what are you going to do with those children who are worse off than if their father and mother had died the day they were born? There are tens of thousands of such. Their parentage was against them. Their name is against them. The structure of their skulls against them. Their nerves and muscles contaminated by the inebriety or dissoluteness of their parents; they are practically at their birth laid out on a plank in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean, in an equinoctial gale, and told to make for shore. What to do with them is the question often asked. There is another question quite as pertinent, and that is, what are they going to do with us? They will, ten or eleven years from now, have as many votes as the same number of well-born children, and they will hand this land over to anarchy and political damnation just as sure as we neglect them. Suppose we each one of us save a boy or save a girl. You can do it. Will you?

How shall we get ready for one or all of these three exploits? We shall make a dead failure if in our own strength we try to save a man or woman or child. But my text suggests where we are to get equipment. "The people that do know their God shall be strong and do exploits." We must know him through Jesus Christ in our own salvation and then we shall have his help in the salvation of others. And while you are saving strangers you may save some of your own kin. You think your brothers and sisters and children and grandchildren all safe, but they are not dead, and no one is safe till he is dead. On the English coast there was a wild storm, and a wreck in the offing, and the cry was: "Man the lifeboat!" But Harry, the usual leader of the sailor's crew, was not to be found, and they went without him, and brought back all the shipwrecked people but one. By this time, Harry, the leader of the crew, appeared and said: "Why did you leave that one?" The answer was: "He could not help himself at all, and we could not get him into the boat." "Man the lifeboat!" shouted Harry, "and we will go for that one." "No," said his aged mother, standing by, "you must not go. I lost your father in a storm like this, and your brother Will went off six years ago, and I have not heard a word from Will since he left, and I cannot let you also go, for I am old and dependent on you." His reply was: "Mother, I must go and save that one man, and if I am lost, God will take care of you in your old days."

The lifeboat put out, and after an awful struggle with the sea, they picked the poor fellow out of the rigging just in time to save his life, and started for the shore. And as they came within speaking distance, Harry cried out: "We saved him, and tell mother it was brother Will." Oh, yes, my friends, let us start out to save some one for time and for eternity, some man, some woman, some child. And who knows but it may, directly or indirectly, be the salvation of one of our own kindred, and that will be an exploit worthy of celebration when the world itself is shipwrecked, and the sun has gone out like a spark from a smitten anvil, and all the stars are dead!

"MOTHER, I MUST GO!"

to tell you that a good womanhood is not higher up than bad womanhood is deep down. The grander the palace, the more awful the conflagration that destroys it. The grander the steamer Oregon, the more terrible her going down just off the coast. Now I should not wonder if you trembled a little with a sense of responsibility when I say that there is hardly a person in this house but may have an opportunity to save a woman. It may in your case be done by good advice, or by financial help, or by trying to bring to bear some one of a thousand Christian influences. If, for instance, you find a woman in financial distress and breaking down in health and spirits trying to support her children, now that her husband is dead or an invalid, doing that very important and honorable work—but which is little appreciated—keeping a boarding-house, where all the guests, according as they pay small board, or propose, without paying any board at all, to decamp, are critical of everything and hard to please, busy yourselves in trying to get her more patrons, and tell her of divine sympathy. Yea, if you see a woman favored of fortune and with all kindly surroundings, finding in the hollow flatteries of the world her chief regalement, living for herself and for time as if there were no eternity, strive to bring her into the kingdom of God. There may be in this audience, gathered from all parts of the world, there may be a man whose behavior toward womanhood has been perfidious. Repent! Stand up, thou master-piece of sin and death, that I may charge you! As far as possible, make reparation. Do not boast that you have her in your power, and that she cannot help herself. When that fine collar and cravat, and that elegant suit of clothes comes off and your uncovered soul stands before God, you will be better off if you save that woman.

There is another exploit you can do, and that is to save a child. Some people have contempt for children. They are good for nothing but to wear out the carpets and break things and keep you awake nights crying. Well, your estimate of a child is quite different from that mother's estimate who lost her child

A DOG'S FUTILE SEARCH.

AN instance of the fidelity of a dog is described by the Baltimore American. It states that a deceased lawyer of York, Penn., owned a fine little Scotch terrier, which was almost his inseparable companion wherever he went. Since his owner died the little animal has sought for him at all of the accustomed places where his master used to visit. Among other places visited by the dog is the old Court House, which his master used to frequent. Here he will go from office to office, and not finding him, trot off to some other familiar place, after which he returns to his home, only to resume his search the next day. It is a pathetic illustration of the fidelity of the canine race. Neither the comforts of home nor plenty of food content the faithful creature while it cannot find its master. Its persistence is a reproof to many backsliding Christians who are contentedly living lives of separation from God. The separation is a consequence of their own wrong-doing, yet they do not return, nor seek him in the places where in former days they used to meet him. (Isa 1; 3.)

A TEXT SUGGESTED.

THE Pan-Republic Congress Executive Committee calls the attention of ministers and teachers throughout the world to the fact that this year, Discovery-day (October 11), falls on a Sunday. It asks that the fact should receive notice in their sermons which might be on "The discovery of America, its results to the world and its promise for the future," and suggests that an appropriate text would be the words cast in the bell which was rung in the steeple of Independence Hall on July 4, 1776: "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof." (Leviticus 25: 10.) The committee asks that copies of the sermons and addresses delivered on that day shall be sent to the Secretary of the Committee, William O. McDowell, 20 Spruce Street, Newark, N. J. These copies will be bound and preserved. As ministers often take two texts for a sermon and as it is desirable that all sermons should contain Gospel teaching, an appropriate companion text on this occasion would be the words of the Master: "If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." (John 8: 36.)

AN IMMIGRANT SWINDLED.

A REMARKABLY heartless trick has been played on a Polish immigrant woman, who, with her child, landed in New York on August 15. She had very little money but she had a ticket to Hartford, Conn., where her friends are living. While waiting at the Barge-office a man addressed her in her own language and inquired about her destination, her friends and her prospects. As he seemed to take an interest in her, the immigrant told him all about herself and showed him her railroad ticket. He shook his head when he saw it and told her it was worthless. The woman was much distressed, but was relieved when the man offered to take her into the city and get it exchanged for a good ticket. She accompanied him and as she did not understand English the man had no difficulty in foisting on her a worthless piece of paper in exchange for her ticket. Then he took her to the Grand Central Depot and left her there to wait for her train. On presenting her paper the gatekeeper refused to let her pass. Concluding that she was an immigrant, though he could not understand what she said, he wrote the words, "Barge Office," on a piece of paper and started her downtown. By dint of showing her paper to car-conductors, she at last reached the Barge-office, only to find it closed for the night. Then she sat down on a bench and wept bitterly. A little later, a kind-hearted policeman found her and hunted up an interpreter, who discovered how she had been swindled and took care of her until she could hear from her friends. She bitterly regrets now being so easily persuaded to give up the ticket by which she might have reached her destination. Some unlearned people in our day are being similarly imposed upon by men who tell them that their Bibles are worthless. Their trouble, if they yield, will be infinitely worse, when they discover their mistake. (Psalms 119: 95.)

A NEW COMMUNITY.

THE conception of life embodied in Bellamy's famous book, Looking Backward is to be tried in a modified form by twenty-five families in Pennsylvania. A plot of land, sixty acres in extent, has been purchased on Mount Penn, the hill overlooking Reading. The centre of the plot and spaces for carriage drives are reserved as common property. The remainder which is circular in form is divided into twenty-five parts, each of which is a segment of the circle. A dwelling house will be erected on each according to the taste and circumstances of the owner, but the plans must be submitted to the whole community and approved before erection. In the centre, on common ground, and built and maintained out of the common funds, will be the public buildings, consisting of laundries, kitchens, a common dining-hall, an amusement pavilion, a library and reading-room. The families will have their laundry-work and cooking done in common and will thus be relieved of two domestic burdens. The lots are sold on condition that they can be transferred only to families unobjectionable to other members of the community. The Bellamy plan is not to be carried out, at first, in its entirety, but it is expected that if the specified features of common life are found to be agreeable, others will be added. One would have been glad to notice that provision was to be made in the settlement for public worship. We may hope that it is not the intention of the families to dispense with religion in the community. The project is a step in the direction of realizing the common brotherhood, which was so beautiful a characteristic of the Apostolic age; but it will fail if the community does not lay the basis of brotherhood as the Apostles did in the recognition of a common Fatherhood. (Acts 4: 32.)

A MEDICAL IMPOSTOR.

AMONG the prisoners at the Essex Market Police Court, New York, on Aug. 18, was an imposing personage who represented himself as a physician with many diplomas. For some weeks past the German papers published in New York have contained an advertisement announcing that: "All diseases of the flesh that male or female are subject to can be quickly cured. Patients not able to pay will be treated free or charge. The best and most efficient physicians in attendance. Apply at the Institute of European Staff Physicians." Impressed by the philanthropic tone of the offer, hundreds of Germans called at the address to consult the "President of the Staff Physicians." They were questioned, and those who had no money were informed that their diseases were incurable. The others were supplied with a box of pills and a bottle of mixture, for which two dollars was charged and they were told to come again in a week. The man did a thriving business until two weeks ago, when a patient suffering from inflammatory rheumatism who had bought several lots of medicine, consulted a regular physician and showed him the pills and medicine she had been taking. The doctor found that the pills were made of bread, coated with sugar, and the "mixture" contained nothing but Epsom Salts. Then he gave information and the "President of Staff Physicians" was arrested and has been held for trial. He admitted that he gave the same medicines to all patients, as he knew they were harmless and as he knew nothing of medicine he dare not give anything else. There is reason to fear that many sick souls are being treated in the same way by men who profess to be teachers yet who know nothing of the true remedy. It is not a new business, this of preaching for a livelihood; the prophet Jeremiah complained that it flourished in his day with fatal results to the people. (Jer. 6: 13, 14.)

TRUE CHILDREN OF GOD.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 8 : 31-47. Golden Text, John 1 : 12.

WHO are the true children of God? Men have no hesitation in saying whether they are Romanists or Protestants, whether Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, etc., etc. It is far less common to hear a man say: "I am a child of God." Our beloved Lord never concealed his relationship to his Father; but his direct claim to a heavenly parentage roused the wrath of the religionists of his day. It was bringing in an authority beyond appeal for all he did and said; and this forced them into a decision either to accept him as the Messiah or to treat him as an impostor. The former their pride would not allow; the latter was their only alternative.

Jesus had just won one of his wondrous victories. First by silence, and then by a word whose power brought the guilty adulteress to his feet, broken; and emptied the temple of her self-condemned accusers.

Jesus had Conquered.

A soul was won, a life was cleansed, and enemies were subdued without an argument beyond that irrefutable one, "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone at her." Jesus had taken occasion to affirm, "I am the Light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." Alas! these Jews knew not their darkness, they perceived not their want of light. They were Abraham's seed, this satisfied them, it was a superiority to the Gentiles in which the flesh could glory, but all the while, although they knew it not, they were but lost sinners, who had never "passed from death unto life," from darkness to light. They retaliated, "Thou bearest witness of thyself; thy witness is not true." And Jesus, to whom the unseen presence of his Father was more real than the seen and self-presence of any human being, declared, "I am not alone, but I and the Father who hath sent me." Jesus knew well enough that they, living in the flesh, and judging after the flesh, could not see the unseen presence which to him was so real. But he did not therefore hold back his testimony. Always, on every occasion, he was the Father's witness, the proof, both by his own word of mouth, and by the power of his words and deeds, that the living, unseen God was with him. Such was the Son of God! such must, in his measure, every true child of God be also, a witness to the presence and the reality of God.

Our blessed Lord never, for a moment, forsook his position as being under authority, "He that sent me is true; and I speak to the world those things which I have heard of Him . . . I do nothing of myself; but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things. And he that sent me is with me: the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please him." Thus practically he taught what a true child, a true son should be.

"While he spake these words, many believed on him," and then arose the great, crucial controversy between the false and the true, the real and the unreal. Jesus commenced by an appeal to these new believers, "If ye continue in my word then are ye my disciples indeed, and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." "We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, ye shall be made free?" "Verily, verily, I say unto you, whosoever committeth sin is

The Servant of Sin."

Sin and holiness! these were elements which had not before entered into the religion of these Jews; they were proud of their father Abraham, and having been humbled in their government, by subjection to the yoke of Rome, their carnal pride sought refuge all the more eagerly in the externals of their religion. There they were at least the superiors of other men; none but Jews could lay claim to be pure descendants of Abraham. They had not yet learned the clear, uncompromising declaration of the Baptist in the desert, "Begin not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able, even of these stones, to raise up children unto Abraham." (Luke 3 : 8.) They were being taken out of their depth: it was not a customary thing in the synagogue to attack sin. None perhaps were living just as they should live, but did not the very prestige of their birthright, as children of Abraham, secure for them a kind of amnesty from justice, so that they had a position apart from the common order of sinners? Such was perhaps the feeling, of many of these men, and this kind of unreasonable and unrighteous sophistry blinds many in this day who think an external profession may excuse sin, instead of rendering it the more heinous. They had now ventured, in a measure, to believe on Jesus, but their faith in him could not stand unless were settled. There is no climbing up some other way; the only entrance to the sheepfold is by the Door, "by the blood of the Lamb," "the blood of Jesus Christ" . . . which "cleanseth us from all sin." "The servant abideth not in the house forever." Thank God, through Jesus, man may be set free from sin. "But the Son abideth ever." When the Son of man has taken the place of sin in our hearts and lives, it is indeed blessedly forever. "His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." (Dan. 7 : 14.) God's Son dwelling in us makes us true sons of God. "To as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them which believe on his name; which were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of men, but of God." "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba Father. Wherefore thou art no more a servant but a son, and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ." (Gal. 4 : 6, 7.) A true child of God is not simply a forgiven sinner, but a representative of the Father, as Jesus was.

The Question of Sin

"I know that ye are Abraham's seed, but ye seek to kill me because my word hath no place in you. I speak that which I have seen of my Father, and ye do that which ye have seen with your father." It is not the pedigree which declares the true parentage; it is the life. All the life of Jesus spoke God, all the life of these Jews spoke self. "Abraham is our father," they retaliated, and Jesus responded by an infallible test, "If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham." Abraham was "the father of all them that believe;" we which are of faith are the children of Abraham. His true life was not in the flesh and blood from which the Jews were descended, but in that undying faith which made him a beacon light to all generations of men. In this true everlasting life of Abraham, these Jews had no part; their earthly genealogy could not touch the inner life: they were outwardly children of Abraham, but strangers to his spirit; just as many may be outwardly Wesleyans, but strangers to the spirit of John Wesley; many may be outwardly Friends, but without the spirit which animated George Fox and William Penn. Many, how many? call themselves Christians, but where is the spirit of Christ? If ye were Christians, ye would do the works of Christ. A true Christian is a Christ-filled man.

"Now ye seek to kill me, a man that hath told you the truth, which I have heard of God: this did not Abraham. Ye do the deeds of your father." Goaded by conviction, which was pressing upon them, these religionists, to escape from their position claimed one which only compromised them yet more: "We have one Father, even God." "If God were your Father," persisted he who saw them through and through, "ye would love me, for I proceeded forth and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me." But these men had made a claim which could not be ignored or passed over; Jesus went on to tell the awful truth: "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in truth, because there is no truth in him." Truth has its source, and lying has its source. Life has its source, and murder has its source. As God is the source of life and of truth, so surely is the devil the source of murder and of lies. "He that doeth righteousness is righteous even as he is righteous. He that committeth sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning." (1. John 3 : 7, 8.) "The tree is known by its fruit," nature will manifest itself: where God is, he cannot be hid, and where Satan is, he cannot be hid. The spirit which actuates a man, not the profession he makes, is the guarantee whose child he is; whether the child of God or of the devil. It is not his external conduct, but his spirit which manifests whose he is.

"Because I tell you the truth, ye believe me not.

Which of you Convinceth me of Sin?

And if I—whom no man can convict of sin—say the truth, why do ye not believe me? He that is of God heareth God's words, ye therefore hear them not, because ye are not of God." The challenge remained unaccepted. These bitterest enemies could not attempt to substantiate a charge of sin against Jesus, even while he brought against them the distinct charges of lying and murder in their hearts against him! All they could do was to use hard words, and this they did: "Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?" Their words were spoken at random, in the heat of their anger. The words of Jesus were received in measure from his Father, and were spoken for future generations. "I have not a devil, but I honor my Father, and ye do dishonor me. And I seek not mine own glory"—the very thing which was the chief aim with them—"there is One that seeketh and judgeth. Verily I say unto you, if a man keep my saying, he shall never taste of death." It was a wonderful word, utterly incomprehensible to those who heard it; but it was the pledge beforehand that through death Jesus should overcome him that had the power of death, that is the devil.

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

IF ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed. Knowledge is not acquired by the act of joining a school, nor success achieved by entering on a business career, nor true discipleship attained by having your name inscribed on a church register. These are but the preliminary steps that afford us greater facilities for the achievement of success than we otherwise would enjoy. After this step has been taken the real work must begin. There are many who, mistakenly, suppose the Church to be a sort of a Pullman sleeper, which they may enter when they join, then fall asleep spiritually and finally at the end of an easy journey, get off just inside the pearly gates. But when they learn that continued abiding in his Word is really essential to Christian discipleship they display a lack of staying power and are soon disappointed and the train is apt to start without them. Or, if on board and at ease while feeding on the sincere milk of the Word, they are quickly upset and promptly jump off when they get to the station where the strong meat of the Gospel is taken on board. To enjoy religion and possess that peace and assurance which the Gospel is designed to afford, we must continuously abide in Christ. Not only to-day, to-morrow, this week, month or year, but continuously, for how can the branch prosper, flourish and bring forth fruit, unless it abide in the vine?

The Psalmist beautifully exclaims, "Thy Word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." And so should it constantly be employed by the disciple of Christ. As the mason at frequent intervals applies the plumb and the level to the structure he is rearing to assure himself that the wall is straight and true, lest it fall and bury the workmen, so must we who are lovers and followers of our Lord frequently consult his Word in order that we may clearly understand his will concerning us and seek grace, guidance and wisdom from on high that knowing it we may be enabled ever to do it acceptably in his sight.

We were never in bondage to any man. Human nature was just the same nineteen centuries ago as it is to-day. The Jews then boasted of their liberty and resented the insinuation of slavery and cried with a loud voice, "We were never in bondage," altogether unmindful of Egypt and Babylon and of the fact that even at that very moment they were under the Roman yoke. And so to-day we cry, "We be American citizens" and point with pride to our citizenship and claim to be a free people when every year one hundred thousand newly-opened drunkards' graves significantly attest our bondage to rum, while suicides, embezzlements, and wrecked lives, without number, emphasize our bondage to unholy ambition, and money, and the gambling-table, and love of display beyond our means. Here is a slavery more galling and more terrible in its eternal results than that endured in former years by the colored race of the South.

But we do not become drunkards, or embezzlers or great sinners of any kind in a single day. Satan first deludes those whom he would finally destroy and leads them on gradually and gently to certain and everlasting destruction. They boast their will-power and their ability to resist and actually imagine themselves free from all bondage, but ere they are aware of it the chain becomes too strong to be broken and too late they discover that he alone whom the Son makes free is free indeed.

A father warning his son, who every now and then would yield to evil appetite, of the terrible risk he was running, took a number of silken threads to illustrate the lesson. He first wound one around him and bade him break it. This was easily accomplished. Then he took several threads, but now the boy found it more difficult to release himself. Finally he took fifty and the boy confessed his inability to break them. "Thus, my son," said he, "the occasional desire from which you now may yet break loose, will eventually form a habit from which nothing but the grace of God can deliver you. Be warned in time. Your feet are treading a dangerous and destructive path, but soon it may be too late and then in vain will you cry for deliverance."

Ye do the will of your father. Christ said he that is not for me is against me. We are either children of God or children of Satan. We cannot be both. But whether we are the one or the other our deeds must determine. Not all who attend Sunday School are the children of God. We sincerely wish they were. They may know the language of the children of the King, yet they may not belong to him. A Chinaman may speak English fluently yet you could tell at a glance that he is a Chinaman and not an American. Not the lips but the lives tell the story, for ye do the deeds of your father.

SEEKING FOR PARTNERS.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Sep. 6.

"As many as received him, to them gave he power to become sons of God." John 1:12.

FEW wholesale houses in the provision trade were so well known as Moore & Sons. It was a great house with wide ramifications. It had customers in every city and from some of its departments goods were sent beyond sea. A house that stood high in the trade, with whom the retail grocer was proud to deal. "I have an account with Moore & Sons," was always the reference he would give, if he could. It was an evidence of respectability and of regular payments, for Moore & Sons could afford to choose their customers and never tolerated any who were remiss with their accounts or tried tricks to gain time. Any such who were inadvertently accepted as customers were promptly notified, on the first irregularity, that the account was closed.

The house employed a large number of men in the various departments, but all were well organized, every department having its responsible head. Two of these chiefs, old men with white hair, older by some ten or fifteen years than the two cousins who now constituted the firm of Moore & Sons were travelling homeward one evening after the day's business was over.

"What new plan do you think the firm have in contemplation?" one of them asked the other.

"I don't know," was the reply, "but evidently some change is contemplated. They don't spend nearly so much time in their private offices, but are always roaming through the building, watching all that goes on."

"Yes; and whatever it is, it is coming to a head. I suppose you have to furnish a report like this?" He produced a paper marked "confidential" on which there were blank spaces for the names of every one in the department with their respective records and an estimate of ability and character.

"Yes; I have one to fill. It is very mysterious. I have been in the house over thirty years and I remember when these bosses came in under the old firm, and I never had such a form to fill before."

There was a remarkable peculiarity about the employees of the house at this time. Scarcely any of them had any parents living. The Moores had always been liberal givers, and among the institutions to which their contributions went, none received so much as the large Orphan Asylum which was located some ten miles from the chief warehouse. The merchants visited it frequently, as their fathers did before them. Every year, when their education was finished, and the time had come for the boys in the highest class to make a start in the world, some were sure to make it in the employ of Moore & Sons. It was the goal of their ambition through their school life, to be of the number whom the firm would take. And they could have had no better lot, for the firm watched over their interests, protected them from the temptations of the city, maintained a boarding-house for them and placed a truly consecrated man in charge of it, who knew how to win their confidence and keep them from the evil. Many of these orphans were now grown to manhood; some were in business for themselves and some still in the firm's employ.

These orphaned young men were the key to the mystery which had so perplexed the elderly chiefs of departments, as above mentioned. It was explained by Mr. Samuel Moore at the annual supper, which it was the firm's custom to give to the employees. "I have something," he said, "of unusual interest to tell you this year. My partner and I have been much concerned about the future of the house, in view of the fact that neither he nor I has a son to succeed us and maintain the great name of Moore & Sons after we are dead. We should deplore the extinction of the house which has cost so much toil and thought to establish. But there is something we should deplore still more, and that is to have the business pass into the hands of men who would ignore the principles of honor and honesty for which it is famous. Better that Moore & Sons should pass from the roll of mercantile houses than that it should become identified with principles abhorred by ourselves and our fathers. We want to avoid both contingencies and we have a plan which we think will do it. We propose to take five young men from among you and associate them with ourselves, so that they may familiarize themselves with our principles and policy while we live, and be ready to take up the work when we die. We have been looking among you for some time past for young men of the right kind—young men of character and ability. The men who are now at the head of the departments would, of course, have been our choice, as they are all men of the highest character, but being all elderly men they are not adapted to our purpose, as in the course of nature they will not outlive us. We have therefore been obliged to pass them over, but they will find that we have not forgotten their long and faithful service. We have made a very critical and careful scrutiny of the other employees and, unknown to you, we have applied tests which convince us that the five we have chosen are men who govern their own lives by the same principles as those on which the business is carried on, and who will, when the honor of the house is in their hands, prove equal to the responsibility. We shall ask them to take the name of Moore and, if they consent, they will from this day be partners in the house. They will represent the 'Sons' in the firm of Moore & Sons."

"Now, a few words more," the speaker continued, "on a subject which must always form part of any public speech I make and that is personal religion. I want every one of you to decide for Christ, and I may use the plan I have just outlined for an illustration. The five young men we have chosen will naturally be envied by all of you. It is a great boon that has fallen to their lot, but an infinitely greater boon is within reach of every one of you. It is an inheritance that will endure for all eternity, and as these young men have gained their fortune by their having the principles of the house, so the greater boon of which I speak, is to be gained by your having the spirit which was in Christ. The promise is explicit and is freely offered. 'As many as receive him, to them is given power to become Sons of God.'"

THE WORLD'S FAIR OF '92.

order to conform to the general richness of the court, are enriched with colonnades and other architectural features.

The design follows classical models throughout, the detail being borrowed from the renaissance of Seville and other Spanish towns as being appropriate to a Columbian celebration. An arcade on the first story permits passage around the building under cover. The ceilings of the porticoes will be emphasized with strong color. A colonnade with a cafe at either end forms the connecting link between Machinery and Agricultural halls, and in the centre of this colonnade is an archway leading to the exhibits. From this portico there will be a view nearly a mile in length down the lagoon, and an obelisk and fountain placed in the lagoon between the two buildings, Agriculture and Machinery, will form a fitting southern point to this vista.

The Machinery Annex will be placed in the rear of the Administration building and in the loop formed by the railroad tracks. It will be entered by tunnels or subways, as well as by bridges. Within the inner circle will be a park in which visitors, fatigued by the hum of machinery, may rest.

A Circuit Electrical Railway

will run continuously around the entire main nave, and passengers in it can thus see the entire exhibit without leaving the cars; and machinery can be easily moved by this means. The power will be transmitted by shafting crossing the building at each bay, with a motor at each shaft. The electrical power will be used in the annex, and the steam power in the main Machinery building.

Attached to this great annex will be the power house, convenient to the tracks for coal supply, etc., containing an immense display of boilers, while in the adjoining portion of the annex building will be established the enormous plant of engines and dynamos. This will probably be the largest and most interesting display of electrical power ever made. Gas may be used instead of coal beneath the boilers.

Another noble structure (which is also illustrated in this issue) is

The Agricultural Building.

With the exception of the Administration building, the Agricultural building will be the most magnificent edifice on the exposition grounds. In size it is 800 by 500 feet, severely classic in style. It is almost surrounded by lagoons. The features of this building are its five pavilions, one at each corner and one in the center. The corner pavilions are 64 by 48 feet square. The grand entrance is on the north. It is 60 feet wide, leading into a vestibule 30 feet deep and 60 feet wide. At the entrance are Corinthian columns 5 feet in diameter and 40 feet high. Beyond these massive columns is the rotunda, 100 feet in diameter, surmounted by a glass dome 130 feet high. There are eight minor entrances 20 feet wide. The roof will be principally of glass.

The question of opening the Exposition buildings and grounds on the Sabbath is one that is just now being widely discussed throughout the length and breadth of the country. Already the Sabbath Observance League has put itself on record as opposed to any violation of the Holy Day, and it is almost certain that this sentiment will grow as the time for the completion of the buildings approaches. Whether such remonstrances will have the desired effect on our national government remains to be seen. The mercantile spirit, which would turn even the hours set apart for worship and meditation into a time of trade and barter, has a powerful hold upon us as a nation, but it will be a matter of serious regret to many thousands of Christian people in every state of the Union should this spirit prevail.

HOW FEW!

Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. (Matt. 7:14.)

How few there be that travel on the road That leads to glory and to Christ and God.

How few there be that enter at the gate Whose path is narrow and its portals strait.

How few there be who 'mid all earthly care Pour forth their soul to God in fervent prayer.

How few there be who in prosperity E'er think of God, or on eternitv.

How few! How few!
Dear Saviour, oh, how few.

CHURCH AND SOCIETY.*

THE social side of religion, of politics, of economics, is becoming more prominent. We find men laboring in different fields and with no consciousness of a common end,—men like John Henry Newman, Karl Marx and Otto von Bismarck,—for the introduction of a new era. The present truth, as our fathers called it, the truth demanded by the needs and cravings of the day, is the proclamation of the kingdom of God—the revelation of God to men in social relations and social duties—the presence of God in the perplexities, the problems, even in convulsions of society. I was much struck with what Professor Drummond and the other delegates from Edinburgh told us two years ago, when they came on their visit to our American universities to speak to us of the good which God had bestowed on their own University, that it might incite us to similar efforts. They said it was this truth of a divine kingdom, of religion as a thing of social relations, which had taken hold of the Edinburgh students. It was not a doctrine, nor a document, nor an emotion, but a new order of life, which met its deepest needs, and seemed to open a gate of new existence to them.

So I believe the Master is forcing us to go back to the primitive Gospel, the proclamation of a kingdom of heaven, of a preparation for it, of the new birth as the entrance into it. The ordo salutis which John Wesley learned from the Moravians and the Pietists of Germany, repentance and faith as an escape merely "from the wrath to come," is being found too narrow, too individual, too spiritually selfish.

The Time to Marry.

As a bright writer of our day says, God brought Eve to Adam. Wait till he brings Eve to you. And he brought her after Adam was made and finished, not while he was still in the making. The virtue of waiting until the man or woman is fit to choose and to prize the gift God brings him, is not characteristic of American society, although it never will be missing from really strong characters. The principal of a great school for girls once told me that directly in proportion to their development in firmness of character and their practical insight into life was the length of the interval between their graduation and her getting their wedding cards.

I am speaking, thus far, of and to persons of at least ordinary discretion. But what shall we say of the foolish marriages between persons who have little more than a ball-room acquaintance, and that measured only by months or even days? Is it wonderful that marriages thus begun end so often in the divorce court? It would not be unwise or unfair if the State were to require every marriage license to be taken out three months before it was needed, as a "declaration of intentions" which would prevent hasty and ill-considered unions of persons who know nothing of their fitness to make each other happy.

Oh the other hand we must not forget that even the best marriages are not unattended with a certain amount of disparity in tastes and temper, which time and wisdom are needed to overcome. As Theodore Parker says, "it takes years to marry completely two hearts, even of the most loving and well assorted." It is so because young people of opposite temperament are likely most to attract

*From The Divine Order of Human Society, by Prof. Robert Ellis Thompson, S.T.D. A series of lectures delivered in Princeton Theological Seminary. Both the Church and its enemies would find much sound reasoning which concerns them in this book. Taking account of the movements of modern thought the author shows the Church in what elements of its work it is lacking and how the teaching of the Bible can be used with effect in our present Nineteenth Century life. On the other hand it defends the Church against prejudiced assailants and shows how much of our modern progress is the product of religion. Pp. 274. Price $1; Published by John D. each other before marriage, and then to require the most of mutual toleration and gradual adaptation afterward. And, as Mr. Parker says, "The man will be nobler and larger for being associated with so much humanity unlike himself; and she will be a nobler woman for having beside her, manhood that seeks to correct her deficiencies, and supply her with what she lacks, if the diversity be not too great, and there be real piety and love in their heart to begin with." It is evidence how profound the union which true marriage produces, that with the lapse of years husband and wife often come to resemble each other, not only in disposition and temper of mind, but even in face and features.

The Clerical Husband.

To restore the family and the state to their rightful position in the Christian order, God chose as his instrument one who had renounced both family and citizenship, and had spent his best years in a monastery. We never shall appreciate the greatness of Luther's work until we give this side of it fuller recognition. The monk, who had become such of his own free will, who had given himself up to the austerities of that life in one of the severest orders, and who had aided Staupitz to fasten the yoke on other shoulders, was led to hate monasticism with the hatred of one who saw how it had come between men and their God. He detested it, he said, because it unfitted men to bear rule either in the household, the nation, or the church and all three are dear to him as God's gifts to men. The family he declares, is the true monastery for the perfection of mankind,—full of crosses in plenty for our purification, but also full of joys and blessings such as a monk cannot even imagine. So this monk at his mature age of forty-three, took to wife one who had escaped from the same monastic bondage, and became a house-father, and a model of such to his countrymen. Thus he may be said to have laid the foundation of the household life of the Protestant ministry, although he was not the first of them to marry.

We need no better argument against clerical celibacy than is furnished by the record of what the pastor's household has done for the moral and intellectual elevation of Christendom. It has given to the world more great ministers of the word, more men of eminence in public life, in scientific pursuits, in literary and artistic production, and in philanthropic enterprise, than have the households of any other class or profession.

The Father's Place.

The father who lives up to his privileges is prophet and priest as well as king of his household. As such he can do more for his boy's moral training than can a schoolmaster, who has fifty or more to look after, without the parental interest in any of them. And that teaching as Mr. Philip Gilbert Hamilton well says, must come to the boy with the authority of personal influence, if it is to come home to him at all. Professor Seeley strongly stigmatizes the neglect of this parental teaching as immoral and often disastrous to the young. "The father he says, 'has not time to do all that is necessary to be done for his children; part he will do himself, but part must be entrusted to others. He hands over to others the child's education, his mind, his soul. He reserves to himself the finance department. It is not easy to estimate the mischief produced by this division of labor. I know scarcely any cause from which the community suffers so much.' "I have met with young men who have been suffered to grow up in an incredible intellectual barbarism, the father working conscientiously for them all the time, but delegating to others the particular work of education." I have heard an eminent business man of our city say that if he had his life to live again, he would probably accumulate less wealth, but his relation to his sons would be more intimate, and their characters different."

CALLING NAMES.

PERSONALITIES may generally be included in the list of those things defined as "pleasant, but wrong;" yet in all ages and circumstances they have proved one of the most powerful levers to stir popular sympathy. Every successive political campaign, every fresh theological dispute, every new social quarrel, finds in them the most effective weapon. It is a natural instinct. Who teaches the boy to pithily label his school-fellow with a nickname which—being the essence of all his salient points—sticks to him through all his life? By what magic do school-girls light upon just the disagreeable syllable expressive of their comrade's weak point? How do the lightning-pointed words which spread like wildfire and draw the masses like a talisman spring into existence? They are the natural outgrowth of certain conditions, from which they are thrown off just as the tree throws off leaves and fruit.

The habit begun in childhood does not desert the full-grown man and woman. It is still natural. When the passions are roused, and the interests involved, calling names is a much easier thing than dispassionate, reasonable argument. This is especially true in political campaigns. Every one of them seem to take as a rule the old English proverb, "Throw plenty of dirt, and some of it is sure to stick." Theological disputes, unfortunately, are too often flavored out of the same bottle. No new offence either. The early Christian fathers said very hard things of each other when their "views" differed. Luther was called bad names, and proved an adept in returning them. And it is to be deplored that the spirit which caused these rude but intensely earnest men to invent Scriptural aliases for their opponents, and make very positive prophecies as to their future destiny, still in some measure tips the well-trained tongues of our modern divines. There is a diluted form of this offence which labels men by the thousands, and invents an opprobrious but cleverly distinctive name for whole classes which cannot be blamed. What should we do in social life without such expressions as "snob," "prig," and Matthew Arnold's coinage, "Philistine?" They express so pithily such a variety of complex ideas that would otherwise involve us in tedious and irritating particu-larizing, that we cannot help feeling grateful to their inventors. Their use, however, must be very carefully watched. Perhaps the best test between name-calling that is allowable, and that which is unchristian and ungentlemanly, is to be found in the presence or absence of personal malice.

There are men, however, who feel unable properly to fight either a fault, or an opponent till they have given it an opprobrious nickname; and one old theologian defends himself on the ground that even Christ called his enemies "vipers." But no one can claim to have Christ's power of reading the heart, and Christ's infallibility of judgment. Christ knew the sinfulness and malicious cruelty of the men he called "vipers." No man will pretend that his utterances carry the authority of Christ's words. Then it was man against God. In all our differences both sides are probably equally confident of their position; and since we cannot know our opponent's heart that charity, which "thinketh no evil," ought to lead us to hope that the error is a mistake rather than a crime. Christianity is designed to make us the most forbearing and polite creatures in the world. Good manners are a part of good morals, and the shadow of great virtues. Who was so careful not to offend even "the little ones" as Christ? The Jew Asaph restrained his angry language lest he should "offend against the generation of the upright." Paul urges us "because Christ pleased not himself" to bear the infirmities of the weak and erring, and adds, "Let us not, therefore, judge one another any more." It is indeed our duty to reprove wrong wherever we see it; but we must remember the excellence of the "word in season," and try to avoid that decisive and dictatorial manner which we dignify with the name of "faithfulness,"—the easiest thing in all religion to do, because it falls in so naturally with our own temper. Nothing is so easy as to imagine we say disagreeable things on "principle," when, if we rigidly examined the motive, it would be found to have a very different origin. At best they are apt to be cold, shivery half-truths, for which no one is much better, and some are decidedly worse. So we say to you all, keep back the sarcasm as it springs to your lips for utterance. A drop of strychnine will make bitter a reservoir of water; and one hasty word has often embittered a whole lifetime.

CONSISTENCY.

THERE are in the store, in the shop, in the office, in our worldly surroundings, so many things to perturb and annoy and perplex us, that it seems almost impossible to live an earnest, consistent, and persistent useful life. But notwithstanding all these disadvantages, we do not find the Church of God occupied by a majority of the inconsistent. We do not find any of them perfect. We find some of them who do not seem to be living up to the Christian standard; but in looking over the great Church of the Lord Jesus Christ, we think the vast majority of the men and women in it are living a consistent life, all the time trying to square their character and their example by the precepts of God's Word, growing in grace, reaching out to a greater elevation of Christian character. We know there are those in the house of the Lord who are not an honor to it. We have seen a woman with almost queenly apparel, when the missionary box came around take a twenty-five-cent piece, and hold it very severely, and feel if, before she gave that, she could find a five-cent piece, and failing to find a five-cent piece, at the very last moment, with a goneness of soul, drop the twenty-five-cent piece into the box, ever after regretting it. But that is not the character of the followers of the Lord Jesus Christ; in general, there is charity and generosity and largeness of spirit and kindness of heart which we are not ashamed of. The grandest eulogy of the Christian religion is a Christian. If you were a pomologist and you talked to some one about the richness and beauty of a certain pear that you had planted, you would not succeed half so well in your disquisition upon the beauty and lusciousness of the fruit as if you should take a pear from your pocket and say: "That's the kind of fruit I want you to 'plant.'" And all our eulogies of the Christian religion are tame things in comparison with the fruit of a Christian life, the fruit of the Holy Ghost—love, joy, peace, patience, charity.

CHURCH KITCHENS.

THE religion of Jesus Christ will produce a revolution in our churches. The non-committal, do-nothing policy of the Church of God will give way to a spirit of bravest conquest. Piety in this day seems to me to be salted down just so as to keep. It seems as if the church were chiefly anxious to take care of itself; and if we hear of want and squalor and heathenism outside, we say: "What a pity!" and we put our hands in our pockets and we feel around for a two-cent piece, and with a great flourish we put it upon the plate, and are amazed that the world is not converted in six weeks.

Suppose there was a great war and there were 300,000 soldiers, but all of those 300,000 soldiers, excepting ten men, were in their tents, or scouring their muskets, or cooking their rations. You would say, "Of course defeat must come in that case." It is worse than that in the church. Millions of the professed soldiers of Jesus Christ are cooking rations or asleep in their tents, while only one man here and there goes out to do battle for the Lord.

"But," says some one, "we are establishing a great many missions, and I think they will save the masses." No; they will not. Five hundred thousand of them will not do it. They are doing a magnificent work; but every mission chapel is a confession of the disease and weakness of the church. It is making a dividing line between the classes. It is saying to the rich and to the well-conditioned, "If you can pay your pew-rents, come to the main audience room." It is saying to the poor man, "Your coat is too bad and your shoes are not good enough. If you want to get to heaven, you will have to go by way of the mission chapel." The mission chapel has become a kitchen where the church does its sloppy work. Hundred and thousands of churches in this country—gorgeously built and supported—that even on bright and sunshiny days are half full of worshippers, and yet they are building mission chapels, because by some expressed or implied regulation the great masses of the people are kept out of the main audience room. Now, I say that any place of worship which is appropriate for one class is appropriate for all classes. Let the rich and the poor meet together, the Lord the Maker of them all. Mind you, I say that mission chapels are a necessity, the way churches are now conducted, but may God speed the time when they shall cease to be a necessity. God will rise up and break down the gates of the churches that have kept back the masses. And woe be to those who stand in the way! They will be trampled under foot by the vast populations making a stampede for heaven.

I saw in some paper an account of a church in Boston, in which it is said there were a great many plain people. The next week the trustees of that church came out in the paper and said it was not so at all; they were "elegant people and highly conditioned people that went there." Then I laughed right out. Those people, I said, are afraid of the sickly sentimentality of the churches. Now, you have good things in this life. Whatever may be your future destiny, you have had a pleasant time here. But those dying populations of which I speak, by reason of their want and suffering, whatever may be their future destiny are in perdition now; and if there be any comfort in Christ's Gospel, for God's sake, give it to them.

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. W. H. Milburn, the blind Chaplain of the House of Representatives, has been delivering some exceedingly able sermons each Sunday this month at St. Andrew's M. E. Church, New York.

The American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions reports that the receipts during the eleven months of the financial year were $630,590. During the corresponding period of last year they were $547,801.

A requisition to Mr. Moody asking him to hold evangelistic services in Scotland is in circulation in that country. It has already received five thousand signatures including those of 250 ministers of Edinburgh and Glasgow.

Dr. W. W. Eddy sailed last week for the East to resume his labors at Beirut, Syria. It is forty years since Dr. Eddy first commenced his labors in that land and during that period while he has been representing the American and Presbyterian Boards there, he has found time to publish several important works in Arabic, which have been very helpful to the missionaries in their labors.

During the services held by the Christian Alliance, Rev. A. B. Simpson, of New York, leader, at Old Orchard Beach, Me., on August 17, the interest in foreign missions became so intense that those in attendance pledged $27,000 in a half-hour after the morning sermon. Subsequent collections and pledges brought the total of the day nearly up to $30,000. Many of those present contributed valuable jewels.

Rev. W. T. Lambourne, the London Baptist minister and philanthropist, has been preaching to large congregations at the First Baptist Church of New Brunswick, N. J. His plain and earnest presentation of Gospel truth, has had a marked influence in the city as it did among the people at Bayonne. Like Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, in whose college Mr. Lambourne studied, he finds that wherever the gospel is preached in its simplicity and purity men hear it gladly and souls are saved.

The Ocean Grove Meetings this year have surpassed, in attendance and interest, all that have gone before them. Dr. L. W. Munhall's Bible Conference was especially profitable and largely attended. The Children's Meeting which this year has been conducted by Mr. Louis Klopsch, the publisher of this journal, will never be forgotten by the thousands of children who have been there. It has been bright and vivacious and thoroughly spiritual throughout, the children being evidently intensely delighted. The enthusiasm of Camp meeting week culminated with last Sunday's service when Dr. Talmage preached in the Auditorium to a vast multitude the sermon which appears on another page of this issue.

Mr. Charles E. Furman has again been holding outdoor services in Brooklyn, N. Y., as he did last summer. He and a few friends go to suitable places on the streets and sing and pray and give gospel addresses. On Sunday three of these services are held at different places and much good has been done. Men who have not been to a place of worship in many years have listened and by God's blessing have been brought to repentance. Mr. Furman receives no pay for his work. He earns his livelihood as a machinist and engages in this service from a love for souls. His preaching has proved so effective that he has been induced to conduct Evangelistic services for a week at Woodhaven, L. I., commencing August 24.

Rev. Orville J. Nave, U. S. A. Chaplain at Fort Niobara, Neb., presents an earnest appeal for public intercession with Congress for better regulations in the army. He says that at present there are few accommodations for religious services at the scattered posts, there are less than a third chaplains than there are garrisons and there are no libraries nor reading rooms. In many cases the men of a garrison live in one common room and as there are always among the enlisted men some of depraved character the work of corruption goes on unchecked, and the younger men are receiving an awful training in vice. Mr. Nave is anxious that Christian influence be exerted to secure such legislation from Congress as would check the evil by providing better accommodations for the men and some kind of church building in which instruction in morals and religion could be given.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

The Bennington Dedication—A Fatal Cyclone—China Again Warned—A Remarkable Woman—The New York Disaster.

MARTINIQUE, the beautiful island in the Caribbean Sea, has been visited by a cyclone which wrecked twenty vessels and caused the loss of over 200 lives. Meagre details have thus far been received of the disaster. Until fuller information comes, the families and relatives of the ships' crews must suffer from anxiety as to their fate. Fort De France, the chief port of Martinique, and the seat of the Government, was visited by a cyclone in 1817, in which sixty persons perished. By the recent storm over 20 lives were lost at Fort De France, 34 are known to have perished at St. Pierre, at Francois 22 were killed, and many injured at Riviere Pilote, La Trinite, and other places. Coffee, sugar, cacao and other plantations are said to have been entirely destroyed, while houses, barns, stables and granaries were also demolished. Martinique is famous as the birthplace of the beautiful but unfortunate Josephine, afterward Empress of France. It is said that the first coffee brought to Europe came from this island.

Leading Events Abroad.

The visit of the French fleet to England has been marked with an enthusiasm quite equal to that on the occasion of the arrival of Emperor William's fleet. Admiral Gervais's warships were received at Portsmouth with a tremendous display. The squadron included the Furieux, La Lance, Le Marceau, Marengo, and the Flagship. On reaching the Isle of Wight they anchored opposite Osborne before proceeding to Portsmouth. On Friday August 21, Queen Victoria reviewed the fleet, and there was a great naval, military and civic demonstration.—There is renewed talk of trouble between Russia and England over Egypt.—A new Parisian version of the trouble on Emperor William's yacht the Hohenzollern, is that the Kaiser attempted to throw one of his officers overboard and in the struggle fell and broke his knee-cap. He was placed in a straight-jacket and confined to his cabin three days.—It is rumored in London that Chancellor Caprivi and Emperor William have become estranged, and that the former will shortly resign.—Spanish manufacturers held a meeting at Barcelona and protested against the new treaty with the United States.

A Remarkable Woman.

ENGLISH scholars are just now making much of a very remarkable young woman, whose portrait we give in this column. Victorine Jeans is a native of Manchester, born of poor parents, and is the first of her sex to bear away from a host of competitors a great prize from the British Universities. The Cobden Prize for the special study of Political Economy is offered in rotation at Oxford, Cambridge, and Victoria Universities. The two first-named do not admit girl students to any competitions that carry money prizes, but Victoria University does not adhere to this rule of exclusion. Miss Jeans took her degree of B. A. at the Victoria in 1889 and has ever since been studying political economy. The Cobden Club gave as a subject for competition: "The Industrial and Commercial Effects, Actual and Prospective, of Factory Act Legislation." Miss Jeans, in discussing it, was aided by a personal knowledge of the conditions under which English factory girls live, more than by the information to be found in books. She has lived in Manchester all her life and taken an active part in organizing clubs among the factory girls; therefore, when the subject came up at the Victoria College, she was able to show a complete mastery of the question in all its ramifications. There were many competitors, but this girl's native talent and perfect knowledge of the subject easily made her a winner. She deserves to be classed along with Miss Irene W. Coit, the bright American girl, who a few weeks ago was granted a certificate of admission to Yale University, the first ever issued to a woman.

China Again Warned.

INTELLIGENCE from Shanghai is to the effect that the foreign ministers have again warned China of the necessity of protecting foreigners and missionaries. A joint naval demonstration, in which French, American, British and German squadrons will take part, will be ordered in the near future, unless speedy reparation be made for the recent outrages. Meanwhile the Imperial government is straining every point to afford ample protection, and to bring the rest of the offenders in the recent disturbances to justice. The revolutionary movement is spreading.

The Bennington Battle Shaft.

THE celebration last Wednesday at the dedication of the battle-monument at Bennington, Vt., was one of national interest. This monument (of which we give an illustration on this page), was erected in honor of the grand old Revolutionary soldiers, who, under General John Stark, triumphed over the British troops one hundred and thirteen years ago. One of the famous passages of history relates to an incident in the battle. At the onset, Stark leaped on a rail, and steadying himself by a post, addressed his men. Pointing to the enemy, he cried: "Yonder are the Hessians; to-night the American flag floats over yonder hill, or Mollie Stark sleeps a widow." At the close of the battle two hundred of the enemy were found dead on the field, and it is to their memory, as well as to the bravery of the heroes who slew them, that the Vermonters have erected this shaft. It is the highest battle-monument in the country, being 308 feet from base to top, and nearly one hundred feet higher than the monument of Bunker Hill. At the dedication, the old town of Bennington was gaily decorated with flags, and a triumphal arch was raised, beneath which a procession of military and civic bodies passed. Addresses were made by Hon. W. G. Veazey, Ex-Commander of the G. A. R., and several others. President Harrison attended the celebration.

The Negro Emigration Question.

ONE of the ablest colored men in America is ex-United States Senator Bruce, whose short career in Congress was marked by unusual intelligence, and the ability to grasp questions of national legislation. Senator Bruce has placed himself on record as having no faith whatever in the proposed wholesale emigration of our colored population to Liberia. He says this is the fifth effort since the war to induce them to emigrate to Liberia; but they are not even yet in sympathy with it. Bishop Turner, of the American Methodist Church, is the only prominent man who favors the scheme. Mr. Bruce says that the American negro is African in color only; in all elements of civilized manhood he is American. He has practically a monopoly of the agricultural labor of the South. There are 24,000 colored teachers, and 1,300,000 colored pupils in the public schools, 75 educational institutions, with 7,000 colored students training for teachers, while hundreds are studying for the bar, the pulpit and other professions. Any general emigration movement among the colored population would paralyze the industries of at least eight great States.

The President of the Big Fair.

EVERYTHING is bustle and preparation in Chicago in view of the approaching Exposition. W. T. Baker, the new President of the Board of Directors of the Fair is a New Englander by birth and a resident of Chicago, where he has made very large profits out of the grain trade. He possesses wonderful executive ability, and his career on the Chicago Board of Trade has shown him to be possessed of a width of view, tenacity of purpose which should render his services in behalf of the coming Fair of the highest value. It was Mr. Baker who, as President of the Board of Trade, wiped out the "bucket shops," or small grain gambling concerns, by ordering every telegraph wire to be removed from the floor of the Exchange. This swiftness of attitude, decision and action is the keynote of his whole career, and marks his course in every function he is called upon to perform. A portrait of the new president is given above.

W. T. BAKER.

Disasters of the Week.

THE week has been marked by disasters, more particularly by fire. In Jacksonville, Fla., sixty-five buildings were burned, involving a loss of $1,000,000; at Cambridge, Mass., the Damon Iron Works were destroyed, loss $500,000, the workmen losing $10,000 worth of tools. In Prussia, two trains ran into each other near Ostrowo and Loswitz, killing and injuring many passengers, and setting fire to the wreck. A frightful railway accident occurred at Zollikofen, near Berne, Switzerland, on the Jura-Simplon railway. An excursion train which was conveying a large number of villagers back from a fete at Berne, was demolished by the Paris express, which came upon it at full speed. It is believed that nearly twenty persons were killed outright. Twelve corpses were taken from the debris immediately after the accident. Several of the victims are said to be American tourists.

More Rain Experiments.

THE rain-making expedition, under Gen. Dyrenforth, which has been experimenting during the last week at Midland, Tex., has succeeded in producing remarkable results. On a clear, cloudless day, a oxy-hydrogen balloon was sent up and exploded at an altitude of about one and a-quarter miles. Kites with dynamite attached to their tails were exploded shortly thereafter at a great height, and then a quantity of powder scattered over the ground was set off electrically. Before the smoke had fairly lifted, it was driven to the ground by a torrent of rain. The barometer fell ten minutes after the balloon exploded, and rain fell over an area of 1,000 square miles. Further experiments in the evening brought copious rain which lasted nearly all night.

President Harrison on Money.

ON his way to Bennington, Vt., to attend the dedication of the Soldiers' Monument, President Harrison stopped over at Albany, N. Y. He had previously made brief speeches from the car platform at Newburgh, Troy and Kingston. At the Empire State capital, he was greeted by Gov. Hill and Mayor Manning and, in speaking to a considerable gathering, said among other things:

I do believe that the general Government is solemnly charged with the duty of seeing that the money issued by it is always and everywhere maintained at par. I believe I speak that which is the common thought of us all when I say that every dollar, whether paper or coin, issued or stamped by the general Government, should always and everywhere be as good as any other dollar. I am sure that we would all shun that condition of things into which many peoples of the past have drifted, and of which we have had in one of the great South American countries a recent example. I am one of those that believe that these men from your shops, these farmers remote from money centres have the largest interest of all people in the world in having a dollar that is worth 100 cents every day in the year, and only such. If by any chance we should fall into a condition where one dollar is not so good as another, I venture the assertion that that poorer dollar will do its first errand in paying some poor laborer for his work. Therefore, in the conduct of our public affairs, I feel pledged for one that all the influences of the Government should be on the side of giving the people only good money and just as much of that kind as we can get.

A Frightful Disaster in New York.

THE most appalling accident in many years occurred in New York on Saturday, August 22d, when four large five-story buildings on Park Place collapsed, burying a number of workmen and other occupants in the ruins. The different floors were occupied by a large number of printing and manufacturing firms and the ground floors and basements as ware-rooms and a restaurant. On some of the floors were heavy printing-presses, and it is probable that the weight of these and the vibration of the building from their running, caused the collapse. Some persons declare that an explosion was heard before the collapse. Whatever may have been the cause, the wreck was a most complete one. All four stores fell in together, leaving a huge gap in the side of the block and burying the workmen, who were preparing to enjoy the Saturday half-holiday. The entire mass fell in a moment, and death must have come to the victims almost instantly. Flames then shot up from the debris and soon the firemen were at work on the ruins. It was hours before an effort could be made to recover the bodies. All Saturday afternoon and night, and all day Sunday the streets were packed with thousands who watched the search for the dead. Over a score of poor charred and mangled bodies were uncovered in the first twenty-four hours, but many were yet in the ruins. Among them were men and women, boys and girls. In one corner five girls were working on bronze leaf powder when they were overwhelmed by the bricks and mortar. In a restaurant, which was fairly crowded, few escaped. Thirty-three lithographic workers, eight printers, ten or twelve girls, blank-book makers, and many others, in like employments, perished in a moment. No disaster has stirred New York so deeply in years. The scenes at the ruins, where the search goes on, and at the Morgue, where the charred and blackened corpses are taken, are heartrending.

NEWS NOTES.

Count Von Moltke, shortly before his last illness, wrote a brief memoir in a popular and succinct style, and this will now be published by his nephew.

James Buckingham, a balloonist, fell from a parachute car into Onondaga Lake, at a point near Syracuse, a few days ago, and was drowned.

Great floods have caused heavy damage in different parts of Colorado last week. Some of the railroads are washed out and traffic temporarily blocked.

President Balmaceda of Chili has issued $12,000,000 of scrip in fifty cent paper money, to carry on the war. He is now forcing men into the army.

Queen Kapiolani, of the Sandwich Islands, is suffering from paralysis. There is a strong annexation movement, which will probably take active form in the event of her death.

The Association of Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations, in session last week in Washington, D. C., adopted resolutions asking Congressional action for the protection of public forests.

Rev. Mr. Massiah, a colored preacher of Springfield, Ill., occupied the pulpit at St. Paul's Cathedral, London, on Sunday, August 16. This is the first occasion on which a colored man has ever spoken there. He had a large and interested audience.

The Association of Economic Entomologists, in session at Washington, last week, discussed the ravages of crops by the various species of bugs and insects. It was declared that no less than $30,000,000 worth of crops were destroyed annually by this cause.

An ordinary army tent has been set up as a lazaretto on North Brother Island, New York Harbor, and in it are confined two Chinese lepers, Ong Moy Toy and Tsang Ding, who were lately found to be afflicted with the incurable disease. They are carefully isolated, so as to prevent the spread of the contagion.

The Illinois Humane Society has decided to prosecute the parents of two-year-old Leonard Turner, a baby, whom its brutal father and mother taught to smoke tobacco. Ever since it was two months old, the father has been teaching it to smoke and the infant became at last so accustomed to the pipe that it actually cried for it. When found by the officers it was suffering from acute nicotine poisoning, and heart, brain and eye trouble.

IDLE HEARERS.

"The slothful man saith, There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets."—Proverbs 22: 13.

"The slothful man saith, There is a lion in the way; a lion is in the streets."—Prov. 26: 13.

THIS slothful man seems to cherish that one dread of his about the lions as if it were his favorite aversion, and he felt it to be too much trouble to invent another excuse. Perhaps he hugs it to his soul all the more because it is a home-born fear, conjured up by his own imagination.

I am not about to speak of slothful men in general, albeit when a man does not diligently attend to his business he is committing great wrong to himself and to others.

When a Man is Slothful as a servant he is unjust to his employers, and when he is in business on his own account idleness is usually a wrong to his wife and family. I know one who is the cause of poverty and want to those whom he ought to provide for; and all because honest labor and himself have long since fallen out. He would not move an inch if he could help it, nor even open his eyes if he could manage to live and sleep all his life away. When a man is thoroughly eaten up with the dry rot of laziness he generally finds some kind of excuse, though his crime is really inexcusable. "There is a lion in the way," and therefore the man judges it to be quite right that he should keep his bed, or that he should sit leisurely indoors and should not give himself too much trouble or run any risks; but all this is a mere make-up to screen his loathsome vice.

No Christian ought to be slothful in his ordinary work: the apostle describes the good man as "not slothful in business"—of whatever kind that business may be. If you have a right to undertake it, if you have a right to continue in it, you have no right to be a sluggard in it. There should be as wide a division as between the poles between the thought of a Christian and the idea of a sluggard. "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily."

An Idler is a Disgrace to himself, and if, unhappily, he professes religion he is a dishonor to it. Paul would starve him, for he says, "If any would not work, neither should he eat," and that is as near starvation as well can be. Lions or no lions, men must work, or find disease and death in sloth.

But we have many spiritual sluggards, and it is to them that I speak. They are not sceptics, they are not confirmed infidels, they are not opposers of the gospel; perhaps their sluggish nature saves them from anything like energetic opposition to goodness. They claim that they are not averse to the gospel; on the contrary, they are rather friendly to it, and one of these days they intend to be obedient to its great commands, and to yield themselves as servants to Christ; but not just yet, the good time has not fully arrived. They have a very comfortable bed of sloth upon which they lie, and they do not want to rise in a hurry and exert themselves too much. They want to take this matter very leisurely and turn to Christ when it is quite convenient,—when it will not require so much self-denial as at the present moment. "Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep," is their continual cry; and although God's watchmen disturb them terribly, and cry aloud that they may wake them, yet they sleep so heavily that they just turn over when they are most disturbed and drop into their slumbers again. I want to cry aloud under the windows of such sleepers to-night with the hope that peradventure some of them may be awakened. What meanest thou, O sleeper? Wilt thou sleep thy soul away?

I. "The slothful man saith, There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets." That is to say, it is time for him to get to the vineyard to work, but he does not get up, and he pretends that he is best in bed, for there is

A Lion Outside the Door.

He means, I think, that there is a great difficulty—a terrible difficulty, quite too much of a difficulty for him to overcome. Are there not many here who say much the same? "Oh," they say to the preacher, "you do not know our position, or the peculiar circumstances and special trials under which we labor." We would gladly be saved, but we cannot live as Christian men: our trade is a difficulty, our poverty is a difficulty, our want of education is a difficulty, and the whole put together make up an impossibility; there is a lion in the way." Yes, I know, that is what your relative said many years ago, and as long as there is any of your family left there always will be lions about.

What can this lion be? Perhaps if I were to examine a little closely it might come out that

You are a Great Coward, and the lion a wretched cur not worth noticing. Your lion is a mere mouse: where is your manliness to tremble at so insignificant a trial? Perhaps you have an acquaintance who would be parted from you if you became a Christian. Is this your lion? It is a very young one. Or else you are following a bad trade, and a bad business, and you know that you would have to give them up. Is this all? Your shop would have to be shut on Sunday,—is this the secret of the matter? You know that the tricks that you now practise, and that you find so profitable, you cannot practise if you become a Christian. Perhaps that is your lion. I tell you that you are trying to make yourself believe a lie, for your difficulties are no greater than many of us have surmounted by God's grace. Your difficulties are not half as great as were those of Paul, and of those who lived in his day, who had to carry their lives in their hands, and seemed every day given over to death for Jesus Christ's sake, and yet bravely followed their Lord's will, notwithstanding all.

Observe, again, that this sluggard said that he should be

Slain in the Streets,

It is rather a novel thing for people to be killed by lions in the streets. It has not occurred within my recollection, and I do not think that it is ever likely to occur; but still this man professed that he expected to be slain in the streets. In an age of liberty like this he is afraid to be a Christian because of persecution, for persecution would be the death of him. Oh, dear! In a time like this, when to be honest, to be upright, is, for certain, the best thing for this world as well as for the world to come, yet men still tell us that they would lose by being Christians; it would ruin their business, they could never make a living; they would be slain in the streets. It will not do for you to talk so. It is idle talk; you do not believe it yourself though you whine like a coward. "I shall be slain in the streets." If you were half a man you would never fear the streets, or think it at all probable that a wild beast would pounce upon you there. And then look at

The Base Conclusion

—"There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets," as if the lion would be sure to look for him if it did not meddle with anybody else, as if he was the only man in the street, and not one among hundreds equally in danger, if such danger there really were. The lion, for certain, would kill him, he was quite sure of it; "I shall be slain in the streets." This is how sluggards talk, as if all the troubles and trials that ever fell upon men that are decided for Christ would fall upon them; and whereas many of God's Daniels have lived in dens of lions and have been none the worse for it, they cannot look to Daniel's God, and they do not expect Daniel's rescue. They are sure that they shall be torn in pieces, though there be but one lion and that lion in the streets, where there would be protection near and shelter at hand. Now, look ye, you that talk about the difficulties of being Christians. Are there no other Christians besides you? Will you be the only believers? When you are converted to God will you be all alone? Will there be none to help you? Is there no Christian brotherhood left among us? Are there no advanced saints who will help you as a young man to struggle against your doubts, and against the temptations that are in the way? Why, you know that you will not be alone in the streets of the Jerusalem of God. The real lion after all is sluggishness itself, aversion to the things of God.

The Fear of Falling.

But says one "If I did come to Christ, I am persuaded that after a little while I should fall back." Be not so sure of that. If you give your heart to Christ, has he not promised to keep you? Is it not written, "I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish; neither shall any pluck them out of my hand"? Do you think that you are to keep yourself from falling? If so, read this doxology, and try to sing it—"Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence with exceeding joy—unto him be glory both now and ever."

"Oh," says another, "but I know that a great many Christians are hypocrites." This is your lion, is it? Well, if there are so many hypocrites it is time that there should be one honest man; and why should not you be that one? Besides, what have you to do to call God's people hypocrites? You know that they are not. The reason a hypocrite passes in society is because there are so many genuine Christians to make him go down, and it is so good a thing to be a Christian. Instead of judging others, it is time that you sat and judged yourself, and that lion would soon be dead.

The Lion Within.

I have this to say to you before I pass to my second head. If there is a lion without, is there no lion within? That is to say, if you come to Christ and perish, you will most surely perish if you do not come to him. If you live as you are, what must become of you? If you die as you are, what must be your lot?

II. We leave our friend, the sluggard, for a little while in the twenty-second chapter of Proverbs, and we turn on three or four pages, till we come to the twenty-sixth chapter, at the thirteenth verse, and there we find the gentleman again. The slothful man is still talking, and he says, "There is a lion in the way; a lion is in the streets." Is there any difference between this verse and the first one that I took for my text? Yes, I think there is this difference—there are two lions instead of one. He waited because of that one lion, and now he fancies that there are two lions. He has made of his delay. He said that later in life he would have a more convenient season, but where is it? It was inconvenient then because there was a lion. Is it more convenient now? Not at all, for now there are two lions. "There is a lion in the way; a lion is in the street." That is always the result of waiting: procrastination never profits; difficulties are doubled, dangers thicken. The countryman who had to cross the river foolishly determined to wait until the water had all gone past, for, at the rate it was going, he was quite sure that it must run dry; but when he had waited long, to his surprise he found that a flood had come down from the upland country, and the river was much deeper than it had been before: the river was not dried, but swollen. Those who think, when they are young, that it will be so much more easy to seek and to find the Saviour when they reach manhood are greatly deceived. Those who think that they will wait till their family has grown up, or till they retire from business, for then they will be able to attend to it so much more easily, may live to discover that hardness of heart has come upon them as the result of delay. Life is like an evening; the longer you wait the darker it becomes.

A Bad Bargain

A Worse Case.

You see in the second text that there were two lions, and, according to the Hebrew, they were quite as bad as the other lion, for one of them was a young lion. "There is a young lion in the way." And the second Hebrew word implies a great lion. "A strong lion is in the streets." So now there were two active enemies—two unconquerable difficulties—instead of one; and, as an old Puritan observes, the first time when the sluggard looked down the street, and saw a lion lurking on the left, he could have gone the other way; but now when he looked out there was a lion to the right as well as to the left, and he could not go either way without facing a foe. With a lion at the front door and a lion at the back, there seemed to be no way of escape for him, and this was the wretched result of waiting. And do not some of you who, years ago, hesitated over the difficulties of being a Christian find more difficulties now, instead of less? When you were one-and-twenty you were deeply impressed, and conscience was aroused; only you said, "No; not just now. It will be easier soon." Certain cords of sin held you. But now you are forty. Well, what about it?

Are those Cords Weaker?

You can hear a sermon now, and hear it without prickings of conscience. The tears used to flow in years gone by, and you have gone out of this place feeling as if you never dared come into it again, for the preacher had cut and torn you to pieces. He tries to preach just the same, and he hopes that he does, but his words have not the same effect upon you now as in other days. You are Gospel-hardened, and that is the worst kind of hardening. You have heard the Gospel so long that there is no novelty in it; and you know the excuses so well that you have got to be one of the devil's old soldiers, a veteran inured to war. You know how to get over the Gospel somehow; like an old fox, you know all the traps, and cannot be caught in them. You are sticking to the old trick about the lions; but now there are two lions, so you say. Thus you have a double-barrelled excuse. How can I be so unreasonable as to expect you to come out often to a week-night service? You have three or four shops. How can you come out of a Sunday evening, some of you? You have half-a-dozen children. How is it possible that you should give much time to prayer? You are here, and there, and everywhere in your worldly calling!

"Oh!" say you, "do not talk to us. Years ago it might have been possible for us to be Christians, but now, how can it be?" Therefore, I say to you young people, hasten to be blest. I beseech you do not delay. An old man took a little child up into his arms, and put his fingers into the abundant curls of his sunny hair, and he said, "Oh! dear child, while your mother sings to you, and tells you about Jesus, think of him, and trust him." "Grandpa," said the little boy, "don't you trust him?" "No, dear," he said, "I might have done so years ago, but my old heart has got so hard now, nothing ever touches me now." And the old man dropped a tear as he said it. "I wish," said he, "that I had a curly head like yours, and was beginning life like you." Oh! old man, are you here to-night? Let me tell you a secret. You may become a boy again. I am sure you may, for you may be born again; and he that is born again is but an infant, and starts on a new life with freshly given strength. But do not delay, you that are yet young.

III. That brings me to my last point: No Lion at All.

If there be here a man who would have Christ, there is no lion in the way to prevent his having Christ. "There are a thousand difficulties," says one. If thou desirest Christ truly, there is no effectual difficulty that can really block thee out from coming to him. You notice that Solomon does not say that there were any lions in the way: he only tells us that the sluggard said so. Well, you need not believe a lazy man. The sluggard said it twice; but it did not make it true. Everybody knew what a poor fool he was, and that it was only in his own imagination that there were any lions at all. Do not believe your sluggish self, then, and do not believe the sluggish speeches of others. There are no lions except in your own imagination.

I believe that some will never come to Christ until another and a real lion shall get at them, and then they will run to Jesus for shelter, lions or no lions. I mean if the lion of their sin should ever wake up and roar upon them terribly, then they will not say that there are lions in the way.

I Used to be Terribly Afraid to come to the Saviour until I came to be more afraid of my sin than of all things else in the world. And Mr. Bunyan, in one of his books, says that he pictured Christ in his own mind as standing with a drawn sword to keep him away, "but at last," says he, "I got so desperately worried by my convictions of sin that if the Lord Jesus had really stood with a pike in his hand, I would have thrown myself upon the point of it, for I felt that I must come at him or perish." Let such desperate resolve impel you to his feet. Throw yourself on the very point of the pike, for it is but in seeming that there is either pike or point. Hasten to Jesus, even though he seem to frown, for there is more love in a frowning Saviour than in all the world beside.

Oh, come along with you. Come, you that are afraid of lions. There are no lions. The way is clear and open, for Jesus says, "I am the way," and "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Why do you still say that you will come by-and-by? Do not trifle so. I had almost rather that you cried, "I will not come at all"; such perversity might end better than feigned promises and base delays. I pray God to give you a better mind than that, and may you say, "Yes, this very night, please God, I will be saved. The sun has gone down, but there is a little twilight left, and I will yield ere darkness quite sets in, I will now trust my Saviour, and hasten to him, and seek him on my knees in prayer." May the Spirit of God sweetly lead you to do this; and oh, our heart will be so glad of it. The Lord grant it, for his dear name's sake. Amen.

TWO ROYAL CONVERTS.

Kings Whreabo, of the Bassas and Massala of Vivi—A Christian Negress as Missionary and Peacemaker.

EWS has been received of an African monarch—Whreabo, King of all the Bassas, —dying at his capitol in the interior of Grand Corah, a trading section of Liberia, several weeks ago. The Bassas are among the most intelligent of the tribes along the West Coast and are very numerous. Whreabo's father was King Boyer, a warlike potentate, who used every effort to prevent the American negroes from settling at Grand Bassa. These negroes belonged to the bands of civilised blacks who had come from this country for the purpose of permanently dwelling in Liberia.

King Boyer died in battle and, after his demise, Whreabo and a brother named Taipu, each claimed the throne. A sanguinary war was the result of this contest, Taipu (who was however, forgotten her savage home and the playmate of her youth, now the monarch of her nation.

Her arrival changed the entire programme. The fiery king welcomed her, made her his wife, discarded all his other wives, and at her suggestion, made a compact of peace and friendship with the Liberians. Some time afterward he, too, embraced Christianity. The influence of this woman over the savage chief was such that he became an exemplary monarch and a staunch friend of the Liberians and the whites. He went to war no more and lived a patriarchal life to a green old age, finally dying among his own people, greatly beloved by all.

Thus it will be seen that there are good influences at work in the far interior of that savage continent which the people of civilised countries like our own know not of. The conversion of this negress, thousands of miles away, ultimately proved the means of turning a kingdom from darkness to light. After so striking an illustration of the far-reaching power of Gospel truth, who shall say that the smallest effort at teaching that truth to others is ever made in vain?

There are other kingdoms in Africa, but little known, where the light of the Gospel has already begun to shine; not strongly as yet, but with promise in its rays. On this page we give an illustration showing an Afri-friendly to the Liberian emigrants), winning the principal towns in Bassa-land and Whreabo taking to the bush. Soon afterward, Taipu was murdered and Whreabo at once assumed control. His first attitude was that of confirmed enmity to the Liberians. He looted their factories, slew their traders, and after many atrocities, prepared for a grand descent on the coast towns with the purpose of driving the Liberian settlers into the sea.

At this critical juncture, a providential and well-nigh miraculous event occurred. There arrived on the Liberian coast an English vessel, on which was a negress who called herself Jacinto Boyer. She was at first refused permission to land; but, somehow, she contrived to come ashore and, with the help of two Kroo boys who acted as guides, started for the interior to visit the Bassa king. She found that monarch in the heat of preparation for war.

It seems that Jacinto had been taken from Bassa-land to England when a mere child and there brought up in a good family. In childhood she had been the playmate of Whreabo and King Boyer had betrothed them. Since that time the girl had been partly educated and had become a Christian. She had not, can king at home. Massala, the ruler of the people of Vivi, on the Congo, is in some respects a monarch to be envied. Coming early under Christian and semi-civilizing influences, he has governed in a peaceful patriarchal way the people of his nation. In the picture the stalwart monarch is seen standing beneath the shade of a tropical tree, and surrounded by his family and attendants. In the background, in a small clearing, are the royal residence and the dwellings of the king's near relatives and officers—primitive yet well-built huts of bamboo and straw, strong, clean and far above the average of equatorial dwellings. Vivi lies along the eastern bank of the Lower Congo, between the territory of the Banza-Manteke and the Lukungas, and it has been for several years a seat of missionary activity. The American Baptist Mission Union, Congo Balolo Missions, English and Swedish Missions and Bishop Taylor's mission stations are all grouped along the same river, from Banana, at the Coast, to Equatorville, 400 miles north-east, in the wild interior. King Massala's subjects, like their sovereign, have yielded to missionary influences and put aside the old love of war and bloodshed for the peaceful pursuits of agriculture.

STUDY OF PROPHECY.

Some Useful Hints on the Interpretation of Prophecy by Pastor D. F. Lamson.*

N the first place, prophecy should be interpreted, "not only in harmony with Scripture in general, but especially in agreement with other prophecy." "No prophecy is of any private interpretation;" or as the meaning of the passage may perhaps be better given, "no prophecy is of self-interpretation;" i. e., no prophecy is to be treated as isolated and independent of other parts of the prophetic Scriptures, and interpreted by itself alone. Prophecy is not mere unorganized matter from which a portion can be removed without changing except in bulk or shape the whole mass; but a living organism, of which every part is vitally dependent upon the other, so that "if one member suffer all the members suffer with it." Each prophecy is part of a system, and bears some relation to every other part, and is essential to the proportion and perfection of the whole.

Much of confusion and incongruity in prophetic interpretation has been caused by a want of understanding and recognizing of dispensational truth, of what belongs to different spheres or eras of prophetic revelation, of a proper distinction between what relates to "the Jews, the Gentiles and the Church of God," of the difference between the "Church" and the "Kingdom," between the "Coming" and the "Day" of the Lord.

There is a grand trend to prophetic truth, which if it is once discerned and afterward followed, will keep the interpreter from going off at a tangent, misled by the sound of words, or warped by traditional exegesis, beguiled by the ignis fatui of an exuberant imagination.

It must be borne in mind, secondly, that the language of prophecy is often highly figurative, symbolical and poetical. This is not saying that prophecy does not make known literal truth, but that literal truth is often communicated through the medium of symbol, type and figure. Such a use of language is especially marked in the Old Testament, particularly in the writings of Ezekiel and Daniel, and among the so-called Minor Prophets, as Hosea; while all prophecy seems naturally to take on a poetic, and therefore more or less figurative form of expression. A forgetfulness of this obvious fact has resulted in some strange and absurd interpretation, and has often needlessly shaded the lamp of prophecy and placed stumbling blocks in the way of simple souls. Such figures as those of the dying Jacob's prophecy, of Joseph as "a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall;" and of Judah "binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine;" present little difficulty; so with Jeremiah's girdle and Nebuchadnezzar's image; but there are other figures which are confessedly more obscure, and some which may need the actual roll of events to make plain. Under the garb of figure, some of the greatest truths are set forth without any explanation at the time, but subsequent developments have furnished the key to the solution. There are magnificent and yet shadowy delineations in the book of Revelation, amidst which the devout and humble student will walk with unshod feet and bated breath; but certainly there are others in regard to whose meaning there can be no question. Common sense and devout spirit will help wonderfully in understanding the "dark sayings" of prophecy. But only "The Spirit of truth" who first indited the prophetic word, and who still presides over it, can prevent the interpreter from falling into mistake, and often grievous if not fatal error; can make the crooked place straight, and darkness light before him. The promise is good for all the ages: "Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all the truth, and he will show you things to come." (John 16: 13.)

It must be considered, thirdly, that there is often an absence of what may be called perspective in prophecy. We are familiar with the productions of Japanese art, and of Oriental art in general, which is often evidently the result of vast patience and painstaking, but which ignores the effect of distance, and groups figures with a ludicrous disregard to position and effect. We seem often in the prophets to be looking forward, as doubtless did the prophets themselves, in a straight line. We lose the effect of proportion and distance; we cannot judge of the relative nearness of events;

* From his excellent article in Primitive Paths which contains also articles on Prophecy by Dr. A. J. Gordon and others. May be obtained for seventy-five cents from Rev. George C. Needham, Manchester-by-the-Sea, Mass.

those which are just at hand and those which are remote are seen along the same line or on the same plane. The near and the distant are not separated by any sharp line of distinction, and the one sometimes passes into the other, after the manner of the photographer's dissolving views. Thus in Isaiah, 10th and 11th chapters, we have the Fall of Assyria, and immediately following the rise of the "Branch," with no hint that centuries were to intervene. In the 51st of Jeremiah, there is a prophetic portraiture of the first siege of Babylon and of its final destruction, in a continuous narrative, although a hundred years actually separated these two events. In Joel, we have a prediction of the outpouring of the Spirit (2:28) which Peter declares (Acts 2:16-17), was fulfilled on the day of Pentecost. But with the prophet, words having reference to events still in the future follow without a break: "And I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth . . . before the great and terrible day of the Lord come."

This indeed may be said to be a general law of prophecy. Words called forth by some temporary occurrence are continually rising into eternal significance. In the Psalms and the prophets saints of God so pour forth their sorrows as to foreshow the deeper mystery of our Lord's passion. The language of David in celebration of Solomon's glory swells onward to the universal reign of Christ. "One increasing purpose" is thus seen to run through the ages, and the "broken lights" of time merge into a golden apocalypse. Thus, in many cases, the prophetic vision seems to pass beyond the immediate object of vision, and to rest upon another immeasurably far away.

It may be added in this connection, that the prophets do not always seem to have understood the meaning of their own prophecies. "Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves but unto us, they did minister." Thus the inspired seer often "built better than he knew." The near event and not the distant often chiefly, if not exclusively, filled the horizon of his vision. Thus, Isaiah in writing the 35th chapter of his prophecy, may have had in his own mind simply the return of the Jews from the captivity; while the Holy Spirit, in making the prophet his organ and mouthpiece, had in view also the transcending glories of Messiah's times.

The voice of prophecy has long since been hushed. In closing up "the volume of the book," the seer of Patmos put on record the solemn warning, "If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book." (Rev. 22:18.) Prophecy has "failed," in the sense that "tongues" have "ceased," as spiritual endowments intended for a special and temporary purpose. But it may well be that "God has more truth still to break forth from his holy word," especially along the lines of yet unfulfilled prophecy, awaiting the labors of diligent and devout delvers in the mines of Inspiration, to be brought forth as it is needed, to quicken the faith, sustain the courage and brighten the hope of believers, to furnish warmth for days of coldness when the ice age of rationalism shall sweep over Christendom, and light to relieve the deepening gloom of the declining days of apostasy, "until the day break and the shadows flee away."

The fabled golden age is in the past; the true is yet to come; through clouds and darkness, through pain and weariness, through defeat and loss, it is hastening on. It is an inspiring thought, brethren, that before we meet again in conference, it may be already here.

THE BIBLE IN ITALY.

REV. ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, of Venice, affirms that of the families in Venice who can read, there are now few who do not possess a copy or at least a part of the Scriptures. The issue of the illustrated Bible in one cent parts by Signor Sonzogno, editor of a Milan newspaper, has done much to popularise the book in Italy, and to create a hunger for the Word. Mr. Robertson believes that more copies of the Bible were sold in Italy last year than of any other book. Similar testimony is borne by the colporteur of the Bible Society of Scotland at Lecce. The people in various cities are becoming interested readers of the Scriptures, and many have a family Bible. There appears to be a general religious movement in the district. A priest noted for his superstition and hatred of Protestantism has passed through a great change since he read the Scriptures, and is anxious to become a preacher of the gospel. The bishop refused to visit one town at a high festival, because it was given up to Protestantism; but he sent a substitute who called on the colporteur, and twice had serious conferences with him.

CHILDREN OF GOD.

Suggestions for the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Sept. 6. John 8:31; 15:1-8.

HOW can we show that we are God's children? This question is the Christian Endeavor topic for the week. "Please teach me how to play with expression," said a lady to her music-teacher. "Ah mees," said the Teutonic professor, "you must mit your heart play." The spirit of that answer is the spirit of the true answer to our question. We need not be concerned to show that we are God's children so much as to be God's children. True, he has some naughty, disobedient children; but the trouble in their case needs correction within rather than without. When the branch abides in the Vine it will bring forth fruit. The conscious effort after appearance is apt to produce only veneer, which may cover a very inferior wood. The unconscious influence of the child of God must be felt if he is living near his heavenly Father. Men will take knowledge of him that he has been with Jesus. His life as well as "his speech betrayeth him." The concern about what men will think or say of him is unworthy of the Christian. He should, as Oliver Wendell Holmes says of one of his characters, "be careful only to report at Headquarters." "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he." If he is impure of heart, he needs converting and purifying grace, even though, through concern for his own reputation, he so restrain himself that his life is without reproach.

There are certain visible characteristics which should distinguish a child of God. The world expects to see them in him. If it does not see them, it brands him as a hypocrite, or, worse still, concludes that the boasted power of religion is a myth. Deeply as this is to be deplored, it is not the characteristics he should seek, but the root of which these characteristics are the outgrowth. The faith which does not manifest itself in the life is worthless. "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch and is withered." The child of God should bear the family likeness, should love his brethren, should love all men, should be pure, patient, meek, long-suffering, thinking no evil—in a word should be Christ-like. He will be all these in proportion as he loves God. The divine life implanted within him will grow daily, will crowd out the evil natural and acquired, will increase in strength while the evil becomes weaker and loses its power of control. "What would Jesus do?" becomes the law of life in all doubtful circumstances; in all perplexities and in all temptations. We imperceptibly grow like our ideals. "We . . . beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image . . . even as by the Spirit of the Lord."

FOR USE, NOT ORNAMENT.

AN inquiry which perhaps many other King's Daughters would like to make is answered by Mrs. Bottom in the Lady's Home Journal. Here is the question and the reply: "Do you think it is much of a help to wear the cross? I find that, after wearing it awhile, I became accustomed to seeing it just like any other article of jewelry; and it does not seem to help me at all. Then there are so many girls who have sent for it as simply being a pretty little thing; that seeing a girl with a cross does not always mean that she is a real 'Daughter' of the King. I wish the cross would serve as a reminder when I am impatient and cross."

"Do I think it is of much help to wear the cross. It may be or it may not be. You will never get any more out of it than you put in it. You can wear it as a sacred symbol that all you do or bear is to be 'In His Name'; that your life is to be of service to others as his life was. This you do consciously; but much of the good we do is done unconsciously."

"A young girl that I met one day in a car will never know how much good she did by acting out what the cross stands for. She was with her mother and younger sister, and baby brother. The little brother was cross and fretful, and I expected to see her hand the child over to the mother who sat opposite: but she didn't. She tried in every way to interest and amuse the little fellow, and finally she succeeded, and at last he fell asleep in her arms. And I watched her. O, how lovely the cross looked on that young girl!"

THE Y. M. C. A. JUBILEE.

THE next World's Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations will be held in London in 1894. So the Amsterdam Convention decided before separating. It was probably influenced in making the selection of that city, from many rival claimants for the honor, by the fact that the year 1894 will be a jubilee year in London. In 1844, just fifty years prior to the date fixed for the convention, Mr. George Williams, a prominent dry-goods merchant in London called a few Christian friends together and formed the "Society for Improving the Spiritual Condition of Young Men" which subsequently took the now familiar name of Young Men's Christian Association. When such a convention as that which has just assembled in Amsterdam, with its five hundred delegates representing associations of Christian young men of many lands, meets in 1894, the first subject on the paper may well be, "What hath God wrought."

CHRIST-LIKE WORK IN THE SOUTH.

A SINGULARLY beautiful address to the King's Daughters of South Carolina, was made recently by the State Secretary Miss Mary T. Lawton in presenting her report. The address, which is published in full in the Silver Cross, deserves to be read by every King's Daughter who is longing to realize fully what is really signified by the badge she wears. The following is an extract which is typical of the whole:

Think what it would have been to meet the members of Circles from the many counties I am going to report. Add to these the hundreds in our own city [Charleston], and we should have present this afternoon more than two thousand women, in South Carolina alone, who have linked themselves together hand and heart to make the world a little brighter and better for Christ's dear sake. Their deeds of love are no more to be reckoned than the sands of the sea.

In my capacity as State Secretary, which has been a personal privilege and joy for four years, I have tried to emphasize the power of personal contact rather than alms-giving without investigating the merits of cases to be relieved. As the result, beautiful letters come to me through the year, bringing messages that tell in the simplest and humblest way of work among the sick, the aged, strangers, work in the hospitals, of teaching, such deeds acceptable surely to the King. Often letters like this come to me: "We collected and expended $190 for rents, medicine, clothing, fuel, and have made regular visits, relieving where best we could from our small means. Have no special line of work, but try to do each day every little thing that we find to do 'In his name.' Each member wears the cross and tries to do better and greater work for the King." Tears well to my eyes, and I think, dear women, what more definite line of work could you do than this Christ-like work of going about like him to relieve distress?

ONE PASTOR'S SYSTEM.

IN an address at the recent Convention of Christian Workers, reported at length in the Golden Rule, the Rev. Henry N. Kennedy, of Winsted, Conn., made the following remarks on the value of the Christian Endeavor work, and the plan he has adopted for solving the difficulty experienced by other pastors as to the question of age: He said "I advocate a Christian Endeavor college in every church. If a pledge is good for young men and women between the ages of thirteen and thirty, why is it not good for children from seven to twelve, or for maturer people of from thirty to ninety? This idea is at the basis of what I call the Christian Endeavor College in my church, which is now entering on its third year of successful operation. It consists simply of a freshman class, or Junior Endeavor society, a middle class, and a "senior" class, or senior Endeavor Society, or the pledge applied to the regular church prayer meeting. A regular system of graduation from one class to another is secured by limiting the age of continuance in the Junior society, and by a natural process of evolution and education in the regular Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor."

THE SOLVENT OF THE SECTS.

IN a report of the great Minneapolis Convention, a correspondent of the London Christian World has this to say of the auguries which he drew from the spirit prevalent in the wonderful gathering:

After attending nearly all of the sessions of this great Convention, I am led to believe that in this new movement among the churches, we have the solvent of the sects. An Episcopalian Bishop addressed one session, and was well received. Congregationalists and Baptists, sects that outside that hall were mutually conflicting in principle, the Quakers and the Disciples of Christ, the steady 'wheel horse' denominations, whose histories are monuments in the ages, and those that sprung up but yesterday; all these met for once together, and they will meet next year, and next, and always! The remarkable thing was that from the speakers of all the churches barely a hint was given of any difference in opinion, and one came away feeling that there is only one Christianity in the world, and that these surface divisions will be somehow defeated by these young people whose religious enthusiasm has been harnessed to this new work. There is no other growth in religious societies like that of this new movement among American young Christians. It will have been noticed that the Christian Endeavor movement is entirely undenominational. To this fact it undoubtedly owes its phenomenal success. Your readers know something of the bitterness that drives apart the sects. The religious history of the Christian centuries is marred with the unfortunate division and strife among the followers of the Cross. It is only in later years that much 'common sense' has mediated between the sects. But even to-day the different branches of the church are far apart, and there are few religious platforms on which all do gladly stand. But one such platform is here.

THE Y. W. C. A. IN SUMMER.

It is gratifying to notice that the Young Women's Christian Association of New York, is not limiting its efforts for the benefit of young women to those who can avail themselves of the Association home by the sea. There are some girls who must stay in the city, however scorching the days and sultry the nights. And these days and nights are all the more hard to bear by their loneliness. So many of the girl's friends are away in the mountains or at the beach for their vacation that she naturally feels desolate. She feels the time pass slowly. Many churches are closed and nearly all the religious work connected with them is suspended. Recognizing this fact, a number of members of the Society connected with the Association who bear the name of "United Workers" have organized several circles for entertainment and instruction. On one evening the circle is literary, and pays its attention to some standard author, one member reading a brief sketch of his life and the others reading extracts from his works. Another evening is devoted to the needle. The members are deep in the mysteries of millinery and learning how to trim their own hats and bonnets, how to embroider, crochet, etc. Another evening the circle is musical and still another is devoted to Bible study. This latter has been made unusually interesting by a judicious selection of subjects such as the life, character and times of some one of the Bible authors. Beside these circles there is another, specially for the young girls under sixteen, which is occupied with music and games.

Very hearty commendation does the Association deserve for undertaking work of this character which is cheering many girls who must otherwise find the summer in the city a very dull and weary time.

We shall be glad to receive from readers who are members of Christian Endeavor Societies, the King's Daughters, etc., reports of the progress of the work in their localities and of any new methods which have been found successful.

REST COMETH AFTER ALL.

BEYOND the toil, the burdens of the day,
Beyond the tempests and the storms of life;
Far from the tumult of the weary way,
Beyond the longing and the ceaseless strife;
Out of the darkness and the gloom of night,
Beyond the hills where shadows never fall,
And far beyond the range of mortal sight,
Rest cometh after all.

After the fever and the restless pain,
After the waiting and the weary years,
After the conflict and the loss and gain,
After the sorrow and the useless tears:
Far, far beyond the lofty heights of Fame,
Beyond the hills where shadows never fall,
Beyond the fear of censure and of blame
Rest cometh after all. —Selected.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

Dinner-Bells and Church-Bells—The "Muezzin" and his Call to Prayers.

DINNER was over and the children gathered in the cosy sitting-room for their evening chat.

"I was thinking of the dinner-bell and the alacrity with which you respond to its ring," said Uncle John, in answer to a question by Tom, who noticed the traveller in deep thought, on a low settee. "The ready response was proof of a healthy appetite," he added with a smile. "Our Saviour, you remember placed hunger among the beatitudes—not hunger for food from the table but for the soul. You cannot live and grow spiritually without food, any more than you can support the body without eating. Now tell me, do you listen to the ringing of the church-bell with the same delight?"

The little ones hung back, silent. "We do love to go to church," said Tom, bravely speaking for the others; "but I think, Uncle, we don't answer the bell quite as quickly as we ought to. Sometimes I'm not quite ready, and then—there's the others, too; well, we often don't get there till service is just begun."

"There is no such languid response to the dinner-bell, eh?" quizzed Uncle John.

"No, sir," said the children in chorus. "In some parts of the East," he continued, "there are no bells used to call the worshippers to service or prayers. In Mohammedan countries, the muezzin, an official connected with the mosque, goes up five times every day and night to a tower called a minaret and, spreading out his hands over the city, calls aloud to the faithful to come to prayer."

"In the middle of the night, too?" asked Ted.

"Yes, and they respond very promptly," was the reply. "When the good Moslem hears the call 'Allah! Allah! Achbar!' he instantly rises from his couch and begins his devotions. To him it is a sacred duty. The muezzin, who is often a blind man, so that he may not be distracted from his devotions by the sights around him, lifts up his voice in a chant which is called the Adan, and cries, 'Allah is most great! There is no God but Allah. I testify that Mohammed is the apostle of Allah. Come to prayer.' In the morning chant he varies these words somewhat and adds, 'Prayer is better than sleep.' The night-calls are not intended for the entire population, but for those who wish to perform special nightly devotions. The first night-call is named Ula, the second Ebed. Here is a photograph of one of these muezzins uttering the morning call to orisons. The loud crying of the blind old man has startled the birds from their nests under the minaret."

"All over the East," continued Uncle John, "religion is characterised by an earnestness and enthusiasm such as is unknown in other parts of the world. The Hebrew is a devout and untiring worshipper, never failing in his sacred duties. The Moslem is never ashamed to sound forth the praises of Allah. He will spread his carpet wherever he may happen to be at the moment, and no matter who looks on, will kneel down and pray. This same enthusiasm is peculiar to most Oriental faiths. These people in this respect furnish a good example to Christians, who are often too indifferent and faint-hearted in their duties, when they, of all others, should be the most zealous and earnest. But the Gospel of Christ is spreading hopefully among these people in the East, for it is the glory of our religion that it is adapted to all manners and conditions of men."

"When did men begin to pray?" inquired one of the children, thoughtfully.

"Man prayed from the very beginning of time," said Uncle John. "He must have realised his dependence upon God from the first. The earliest mention we have of public prayer is in Genesis 4: 26, where we are told that in the days of Enos, the son of Seth, men 'began to call upon the name of the Lord.' From that time till our own day, prayer has marked during the battle with the Amalekites? So, when you have any difficulty to face, do not forget to take it to God in prayer, for no matter what it is, he will give you help to master it, if you go to him in the right spirit."

People who Worry.

ONE of the most cheerful of women, yet one who has experienced much affliction, is Mrs. Amelia A. Barr, the famous authoress. Her life for years was a battle against difficulties that would have overwhelmed most women; yet an admirable Christian courage enabled her to surmount them. Here is a piece of advice she gives to other Christians who, like herself, have been victims of worry:

Worriers live under a low sky. They are such cowards that they will not trust God except upon good security. Now, faith casts a kind of honor upon God; it shows that we believe in his goodness, and trust in his care; but worrying tells him to his face that either his will to do us good, or his power is wanting. Yet to argue with worriers is little use; convince them at every point, and they will settle down the next hour into the old vaporing, aggravating belief.

What remains for them? They must pray to God and help themselves. No one is justified in encouraging a fussy, tormenting anxiety about trifles. Egotism and selfishness are at the bottom of it. If they will remember that there is no cause why they should be exempt from the little vexations common to humanity, and which are part of the universal scheme of things relating to the great circumstance—life—they will get at once on to higher ground. For even if their depression continue, it is humanized when it is no longer the distinction between the wicked and the righteous.

"Family prayer was a daily event in the households of the patriarchs. Jesus, when on earth, devoted himself specially to prayer, even when his life was full of work and excitement. When he had not time to eat he still found opportunity to pray. Martin Luther, whenever he had any special business on hand, always allowed himself a longer time than usual for prayer. It is the soul's best preparation for the trials of life, and smooths over troubles that else would overcome us. Do you remember how Moses was supported by Aaron and Hur, when he prayed on the mountain selfish and personal. Those who have known great calamities, real heart-breaking losses and griefs, are not worriers. The presence of a great sorrow hushes all fretful complaining. Little things "don't signify" when the home is breaking up, or the grave is open.

Here is a good verse for worriers to consider:

I think not of to-morrow,
Its trials or its task;
But still, with child-like spirit,
For present mercies ask.
With each returning morning,
I cast all things away;
Life's journey lies before me—
My prayer is for to-day.

A LEGEND FOR LISTLESS ONES.

THE world is full of them, alas! that it should be so. They would be very worthy people and excellent members of society, if they could summon up a little energy and begin to do something. It is told of Lady Holland, an English grand dame, that she was forever lamenting that she had nothing to do, and did not know how to pass the time. One day, the good poet Rogers gave her a shock. "Try something new," said he, very gravely. "Why don't you try to do a little good?" The advice opened her eyes and it is recorded that she adopted it.

In this age of Christian activity, there is no room for do-nothings, certainly not in the church, and not even in the home. Listlessness is the foe of spiritual progress. The sooner the children learn the value of energy the better. And nowhere can it be expended to more advantage than in the service of the Master. Listlessness is like the rust that eats away the precious treasure unless speedily rubbed off.

It is told of an Arabian princess that she was presented by her teacher with a beautiful ivory casket, and enjoined not to unlock it for a whole year. She wondered what it could contain and many times she was on the point of turning the key in the tiny lock, but she refrained. At last the year expired and the princess unlocked the casket when she was surprised to behold nothing but a little heap of rust; the form of something beautiful could be discerned, but the beauty had gone forever. She saw a slip of paper containing these words:

May you learn from this a lesson for your life. This trinket, when inclosed, had upon it a single spot of rust, by neglect it has become the useless thing you now behold; only a blot on its pure surroundings. So a little stain on your character will, by inattention and neglect, mar a bright and useful life, and in time will leave only the dark record of what might have been.

So the rust of listlessness will destroy whatever is beautiful in us, if it be not brushed away and the character kept bright and shining by a life of activity and godly usefulness.

A Lesson from the Birds.

THE domestic affection and intelligence of some members of the feathered race are quite remarkable. A wren built her nest in a box on a New Jersey farm. The occupants of the farmhouse saw the mother teaching her young to sing. She sat in front of them and sang her whole song very distinctly. One of her young attempted to imitate her. After proceeding through a few notes its voice, broke and it lost the tune. The mother recommenced where the young one had failed, and went distinctly through with the remainder. The young bird made a second attempt, commencing where it had ceased before, and continuing the song as long as it was able, and when the notes were again lost, the mother began again where it had stopped and completed it. This done the mother sung over the whole series of notes the second time with great precision, and again a young one attempted to follow her. The wren pursued the same course with this one as with the first, and so on with the third and fourth, until each of the birds became a perfect songster. The loving patience of the mother-bird furnishes an example that might well be remembered by ourselves in dealing with our children. We are apt to be out of temper with their childish failures, forgetting how gracious our heavenly Father is in bearing with our own shortcomings.

A Boy King and his Mother.

LITTLE ALFONSO XIII., the boy King of Spain, is intensely fond of his mother. Since his late illness, during which she tended him day and night, the youthful monarch has shown a love and admiration for his devoted parent that are much commented on in Madrid. She is first in his prayers and his thoughts, and she always sits at his right hand. His pictures are common in Europe, and all of them are pleasing. In one he is in the chair of state. On a footstool, before him, are two sisters, and at his right sits his mother. Standing before him, in a rich uniform, is one of the officers of Spain, who is reading a long address to his sovereign as solemnly as if he were in the presence of a monarch of ripe years.

It is especially fortunate that his mother is a woman of good sense, high character, and an exceedingly kind heart. She has greatly endeared herself to the people of her adopted country by her wisdom and benevolence. Late, the eloquent leader of the Spanish Republicans, Senor Castelar, explained the quiet condition of his party by saying:

"One cannot make war upon a baby and a woman."

The Captains Bargain

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

BY JULIA McNAIR WRIGHT.

[Published by special arrangement with The National Temperance Society.]

EXPECTING to have some time at his disposal Robert thought he could not do better than put his project into execution at once. He had in his pocket the twelve dollars his father had given him and he determined that he would go that morning and buy some suitable present for every one of the family and send it to them to show them that his heart was with them, though in bodily presence he might not be with them for years! There was a store where Eliza had liked to trade, and where she had been wont to say that goods were cheap and well-selected, and the young girl-clerks were very good and attentive. There Robert would go and do his shopping. But what should he get, and how much would twelve dollars buy? Who could tell him? He would throw himself on the mercies of a girl-clerk.

Now, as it was early in the day, before the tide of shopping began to flow fast and furious through the big store, when Robert, a very handsome and winsome fifteen-year-old boy, most faultlessly arrayed, put his face inside the door of the huge establishment, he saw behind a counter, standing at ease, a very smiling and pretty maiden, with rosy cheeks and golden hair,—a kind of eighteen-year-old Pink. To her, as to a tutelar angel, did Robert turn for counsel and direction.

"If you please, Miss, I want to buy a present—for my mother—and sister."

"Yes? Fancy goods? laces? albums? Which department of the store will you go to?"

"I think—I had—better get dresses."

"Oh," said the damsel, taking in Robert's fine linen, bottle-green cloth, and tan-colored kid gloves. "Something in silk, then?"

Robert was quick-witted enough to see the situation.

"No, if you please," he said, sitting down before the counter and bending over to intrust his confidences in the maiden. "They are my adopted mother and sister, and the rest—they live in the country and they are poor. I want to send them all presents, and I have twelve dollars, and I want to make it go as far as I can. I wish you would help me pick out the things. I never went shopping before. I can sell things but I don't understand buying."

"I see," said the damsel.

So she slipped from behind the counter and had a short interview with a stout "floor-walker."

"I may go with you and help you do your shopping," said the girl, coming back to Robert. "We have some excellent bargains in dress-goods, if you don't mind last winter's goods instead of this fall's patterns. How old is your sister?"

"She is thirteen, and she has blue eyes and yellow hair."

"Is your mother a big woman?"

"No; she is a little woman. She is thin, and not as tall as you are. She is dark."

"Now, I know about the colors and the number of yards you will want," said the obliging girl, "so let us go to the bargain counter. But tell me, first—how many other presents must you get out of the twelve dollars?"

"There is the little sister—the twin—she is ten. I would like to get her a calico dress. Besides these, are father, Bop, Jerry, and the other twin—the boy. I want to get them all something, and I must save out enough to pay for sending the package up to Lal's Mountain."

The girl consulted a book.

"We can send the parcel for you for fifty cents. Will you get handkerchiefs and neckties for your father and the boys? We have some very good bargains in those things just now. Or stockings,—we have a very cheap line of stockings."

"Pink knits all the stockings."

"She must be busy, then, to knit for such a lot of them."

"She is busy. She always has her knitting in hand. But then, for Jerry, one stocking is a pair; for you see he has one wooden leg, and that saves him one stocking."

"I hope none of the rest are so unlucky," said the girl, laughing.

"No, they are not. And then, too, Jerry has only one eye. But for all he has only one leg, and one eye, he can run the mill."

"Ah! a mill, is it? That accounts for the one leg and the one eye. Mills are terribly dangerous places. I wonder they leave any one alive that goes near them."

"Our mill is not dangerous. And, then, it was not the mill that hurt Jerry. Whiskey did it!"

"Oh! Well, I hope Master Jerry has reformed. He had better have left whiskey alone. Let it alone, I say, and it won't hurt you."

"I think you make a mistake there," said Robert. "Jerry let it alone; he never touched a drop in his life, and yet he lost a leg and one eye because other folks touched it. It seems we are never safe from whiskey, as long as any one uses it. A drunken carman lost Jerry a leg; and a drunken shoemaker lost him an eye."

They had been treading the mazes of the store, and turning over a great pile of woollen dress-goods during his chat. The pleasant girl now fixed on a piece of goods of small blue-and-black plaid.

"There! This is nice, and very cheap, and just enough for a girl of thirteen who does not use many furbelows. I should take that, if I were you. And this dark-brown serge is a remnant, sold cheap. I am sure your mother would like that. Come over to the calico counter. Here is a very nice dark piece, with violets on it. That is going at about half-price."

Robert agreed to the young girl's taste, and then followed her to the baskets where were bargains in handkerchiefs, neckties, and other small wares. He bought a pair of chamois-skin gloves for Captain Allen, and a leather pocket-book—alas! that it was doomed to be so empty—ties and handkerchiefs for Jerry and the boys, and buttons and other material for making up the dresses. He was overjoyed to find how far the maid made his money go, and had not been so happy since he was torn from his home and the family therein. At last, eleven dollars and a half, to the very last cent, were spent.

"You will write out the address for me," said the girl, "and I will have the parcel sent, prepaid."

"Will you give me a card to write a line on, to put in the bundle?" said Robert.

And, taking out his new pen, he wrote on the card: "A token of my true love." As he wrote, the observant shop-girl wondered how it was that the hand from which Robert had pulled the fine kid glove was evidently the hand of a boy that had worked hard, and she also wondered how it was that the relatives of a boy with so fine a watch, so nice a suit, and so elegant a pen, should be poor enough to need and use the simple gifts that the lad had just purchased. But girls who clerk in stores see many curious things.

After the shopping was done, Robert bade his fair helper good-bye, and walked off to Fairmount Park. He had not left himself a cent for car-fare, nor to buy a biscuit for lunch. But in thinking how pleased Eliza and the others would be with their presents, he forgot to be tired or hungry. He sat on one of the Park benches and counted up the years before he should be done with school, and be a man, and be earning money for himself, which money he should share with those who had shared their little all with him. Would old Mr. Wick live until then, and the mortgage on the mill escape foreclosure? He realized his father's hostility to the Allens; he wished he could make them friends, but he felt that at present the less he said about them the better. It was a long walk back to the hotel. He happened to reach there just as his father returned in the carriage. As they went up to their room to make ready for dinner, Mr. Murray said:

"You look tired, my son. Where have you been?"

"To Fairmount Park."

"But you never walked home from there?"

"Yes, sir. I—had spent all my money," said Robert, embarrassed.

"Did you get your dinner there?" asked his father. "No? Why not?"

"I had spent all my money, sir. I am afraid you will think me a spendthrift now. The other day you thought I was going to be a miser, and Robert laughed in a hesitant fashion.

"I gave you twelve dollars this morning," said his father. "I hope, my dear boy, you have not fallen in with sharpers. However, whatever it is, I beg that you will not fear to speak out, and say just what you have done with it."

"I went up to the store, sir, and I spent eleven dollars and a half in buying presents, and fifty cents in sending them. I got my mother and Pink and the little one dresses; and handkerchiefs and ties and so on for the rest. I enjoyed it very much. A very nice girl-clerk helped me buy the things. I hope you are not angry with me, but I could not keep money in my purse and not send a present to them, when I have so much and they have so little, and they have always shared and shared alike with me." Robert's big brown eyes were fixed on his father, with that steadfast look which Mr. Murray knew so well.

"Of course I am not angry," said Mr. Murray, coldly. "You can do as you please with your own. And," he added bitterly, "I fancy they will be ready to take whatever you give them."

"No, sir," said Robert, quick to catch the tone of imputation of greed; "oh, no. They are very independent. They will not send me back my presents, because they will know that would hurt my feelings, but they would not take money from me, and they would not let me keep on sending presents. They would feel that the money was yours, not mine."

"Well, well, son, they have a vigorous defender," said Mr. Murray, laying his arm over Robert's shoulder. "Come to dinner. You must be half dead with fatigue and hunger. Hereafter, never spend your last cent. Remember that."

Mr. Murray could not feel irritated long that evening. He was in a very happy mood. The report of the doctor had been far better than his fears. He had no chronic disease. A long nervous strain had worn and weakened him, but now that he was satisfied and happy, with proper care there was no reason why he should not live for the next twenty years. He could see his boy grow up to manhood! He could hope to see him prospering in business, happily married, his family about him! His heart glowed at the thought of having years to live with his beloved son. And then his mind was relieved about the matter of the will. The future of Robert was secured. He had arranged all for him with care. He had seen two of his most trusty friends, men of tried integrity, and he had obtained their consent to be appointed Robert's guardians. Now, if left an orphan, Robert would not go back to Lal's Mountain to lavish his all upon the Allens. Until he was twenty-four years old, and therefore had had time to forget his early friends, the boy's fortune was secure. This was a good day's work. Mr. Murray rubbed his hands, ordered turtle soup and roast venison for himself and Robert, and talked cheerfully through the meal. There was a lecture that evening on India, illustrated with stereoscopic views; he took Robert to hear and see it.

"There," he said, as they walked home, when it was over, "when you have finished your school-days, you and I will travel, and see those far lands for ourselves."

When they were back in their room, Mr. Murray lay on the sofa, and told his plans.

"Robert, I will give you this first year in school to decide on what you wish to be. If you choose to go to college, in two years you will be well fitted. If you prefer the Polytechnic, and the Mining Engineer's course, you can enter upon it next year."

"I mean to buy a lot near the city and build a house and furnish it. You shall furnish your own room to suit yourself. I want you to have some place to call home, and think of as home. That house shall be headquarters. We will bring there the treasures we collect. You can invite your boy-friends there for vacations. We shall have a garden, a small conservatory, a stable, a carriage, and a pair of riding horses. And at school—wherever you are—at college, at the Polytechnic, you will work very hard and not distract your mind with other things. Tell me, Robert, do you like these plans?"

"Yes, sir," said Robert, sincerely.

What boy would not like to hear of a plan for a room furnished to his own taste—of a riding horse always at his service?

"I don't want you to be without a business, a regular occupation, an aim in life, Robert. I have money enough to keep you without labor. But I have seen enough of these Golden Youth who do nothing but spend the money their fathers have earned by toil and care. What right, in this busy world, has a young man, full of bodily vigor and mental power, to spend his years yachting, dancing, giving dinners, playing tennis and polo, day in and day out, and riding forth at times to exhibit before the ladies his fashionable clothes and his horsemanship? I say that such a life is contemptible and unmanly. As the French say, we should all of us show the raison d'être; that is, the reason of our existence. A man has no right to live merely to eat up the proceeds of other men's labor. That is the curse of the Old-World system of hereditary aristocracy, and it bids likely to be the curse of the New World with its plutocracy."

"Mind you, my lad, I have worked and made my money. I expect you to work and make money. And as the money rolls up, we can use it well. I like to see men found libraries or hospitals; present public-gardens or picture-galleries in their cities; help on all great philanthropic enterprises. It is grand to have enough money of your own earning in your hand, to be enabled to respond liberally when you are appealed to to help on good work. If there is a man I envy it is Peabody, who has written his name in golden letters around the civilized world. When I was a young man the five letters in the name Dodge represented to me a man who was never deaf when a cry for help was lifted. When I myself was giving way to sin,—when I was suffering untold agonies because the penalty of my sin had fallen upon me,—I honored the man who with other men was battling the curse under the power of which I had fallen. Be a man, my son,—a good man, a useful man, a great man,—such a man as I should have been but was not."

Robert, whether he would or not, could not fail to see the mingling of noble and foolish ambitions in his father's wishes for him. It occurred to him that justice should first be served, and justice demanded a grateful recognition of the kindness of Captain Zekiel and his family. To stand shoulder to shoulder with such a family and pull them through their adversities seemed to Robert as good a work as could be done, and if his father was inclined to love temperance people for their work's sake, where was there a stauncher little temperance woman than Mistress Eliza? He felt inclined to put these pertinent propositions to Mr. Murray, but abstained, remembering that the same Eliza had carefully taught him a lesson, now nearly out of date, but none the less valuable, namely, that young people are not particularly commissioned to criticise their elders. The day of right feeling between the Superintendent and the Captain might come all the quicker if Robert maintained a respectful silence. All this passed in his mind while his father was talking, and he said heartily:

"I think you are a good man, father. When a person has done wrong and is sorry for it, and does wrong no more, we think other people should not be throwing up the past to them. God does not cast it up against them, for I remember once the schoolmaster gave us a lesson on that, and his text was, 'His sins which he hath committed shall no more be mentioned unto him.' And so I think we should not be bringing up the past in hard words against ourselves. There is no need of our doing what God would not and our fellow-men should not, is there?"

Mr. Murray smiled, and patted Robert's hand. "You are a great comfort to me, my son." Then added, sadly, "But my sins cost us your mother."

"I believe," said Robert, "that as soon as my mother got to heaven, an angel was sent to tell her that all would turn out right for you and me, and so she at once forgot the sorrow she had had, and has been perfectly happy ever since. It must be so, you know, since no trouble can get into heaven."

Mr. Murray at first took some present comfort from these suggestions. Then, as he belonged to the human variety "self-tormentor," he began to think that Robert was such a wise, good boy, he must be going to die early. While he made himself miserable over that, Robert began to tell him a certain episode of his life, wherein he had brought down on himself the wrath of the schoolmaster by painting a boy's face with walnut juice. This recital revived the spirits of Mr. Murray, who realized that there was nothing alarmingly angelic in his progeny.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

W. G. Miller, Fort Wayne, Ind.—The writing you submit has the general characteristics of Arabic but you should refer it to the principal of the Taylor University of Fort Wayne.

J. Gething, W. J. Estabrook and others, Cleveland, O.—Which is the right day to be observed as the Sabbath, the first day of the week or the seventh?

This question has already been answered in No. 28 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

I. B. Galloway, Vernon, Wis.—Is it right for a Christian to swear, or promise, to obey and keep secret a Code of laws which at the time is unknown to him?

This question has already been answered in No. 29 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

M. M. Burlington, Ia.—Where do we get the word "picnic"? How did it originate?

Open-air entertainments first became known as "pick-and-nick" parties about 1802, in England. The custom was that those who were to be present should supply the eatables and drinkables; each person "picked" out what he or she was willing to furnish and the articles so selected were "nicked" or checked off.

P. D., Waterbury, Conn. What is the proportion of illiteracy in the different countries of the world?

According to the most recent estimates, from census and other sources, the percentage of population over ten years of age, who can neither read nor write, is as follows: Russia, Roumania and Servia, 80; Spain, 48; Hungary, 43; Australia, 30; Ireland, 21; France, Belgium, 15; England, 13; Holland, 10; United States (whites), 8; Scotland, 7; Switzerland, 2 1-2; Germany, 1.

Geo. V. Nelson, Chester, Ark.—(1) What evidence is there that the twentieth year of Artaxerxes was B. C. 445? (2) Is the Greek word translated "world" in Matt. 24:3 more correctly translated "age"?

(1) The evidence of the historians Diodorus (11:69; 12:64) and Thucydides (4:50) who give the date of his accession as the year corresponding with B. C. 465. We believe Plutarch confirms them. (2) Yes. If you look in the Revised Version of the New Testament you will find the words rendered in the margin: "The consummation of the age."

Maria B., Dorchester, Mass.—From what nation do we inherit the word "dollar"? I know it is not an American word. What is it?

There is a German legend to the effect that a very honest tradesman, named Joachim, who lived some hundreds of years ago, was commissioned by the king to make a quantity of coin for the royal treasury. He did this so satisfactorily that whenever his mark was seen on any coin it was at once regarded as sure to be full weight and sound metal. Joachim lived in a "thal" or valley, and his pieces were called "thalers," because made in his mint in the valley. Gradually the word became metamorphosed into "dollars," having the same meaning, and to-day the "thaler" or "dollar" of Germany is the relic of the honest tradesman. The sign on the dollar—the two upright bars and the "S" across—is said to be of still more ancient origin, representing the two pillars of Hercules, united by the gracefully curving banner of Spain. The mark is undoubtedly of Spanish origin.

H. H. G., Turnerville, Tex. (1.) How do we know that every book of the old and New Testament is inspired and when and by whom compiled? (2.) To what object of mercy can $25 or $50 be given that will yield the most? (3.) Who can give me a Constitution and By-laws of the Christian Endeavor Society? (4.) How long from the Creation of the World to the Birth of Christ?

(1.) The internal evidence of the Scriptures is accepted by most Christians as conclusive of their inspiration. For fuller reasons we would refer you to the works of Cumming, Salter, Marton, and other authorities. The identity of the authors of the various books of the Bible is established partly by written records, partly by tradition. The Jews have been unanimous in their belief that the Pentateuch was written by Moses, most of the Psalms by David, the Proverbs by Solomon, and in acknowledging the authenticity of those books whose writers' names are now lost. The successive councils of the Christian Church and secular historians have made the same admission. The nature of the inspiration claimed for the Scriptures is that conferred by an influx of the Divine Spirit guiding the writers as to the substance of what is written and recorded. The thoughts thus inspired are clothed by the writers in language of their own. It is not contended that every word and phrase is literally dictated or inspired. (2.) Deserving Christian projects are set forth in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from time to time, and from these you may be able to select one that enlists your sympathies. (3.) Address Rev. F. E. Clark, 50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass. (4.) About 4,100 years.

C. H. C. J., Quincy, Mass.—Does the Bible teach the baptism of infants?

Your question has been debated by every generation for centuries and on each side have been many learned, sincere and godly men. The Baptists contend that the Bible does not teach infant baptism; their opponents reply that it does not forbid it, but implies that it was practised by the early Church as when the jailer was converted "he and all his" were baptized. (Acts 16:33.)

Alice R., Live Oak, Ala.—What are the duties of a bridesmaid and why is it considered unlucky to serve in that capacity more than once?

A bridesmaid's duties are to attend the bride-elect for some time previous to the wedding and at the ceremony itself. She formerly used to go shopping with the bride and help select the wardrobe and to send out the invitations; she also helped to make the bridal toilet and to entertain the women guests. She is generally the recipient of a handsome gift from the groom or some wealthy relative of the principal parties. We do not know that it was ever considered unlucky to act as bridesmaid more than once, though there is an old proverb which says: "Three times a bridesmaid, never a bride."

A. W. Folsom, Bennington, Blue County, Choctaw Nation—I wish to know something about the Indian people; who they are, where they came from and how they came to America.

According to some of the very highest authorities, the language of the American aboriginal races corresponds with certain languages found in Asia, Australia, Europe and even Africa. The preponderance of testimony of this character, however, points unmistakably to Malay, Mongol or Tartar origin. The similarity consists in complexion and general physique and monosyllabic speech. This refers to the North American Indians alone. The Aztecs, Peruvians and Mexicans are believed to be descended from an earlier civilization. Behring's Straits, the Aleutian Isles and the Polynesian Archipelagoes were probably the routes by which the distant progenitors of the North American Indians found their way to this continent. It does not appear that, previous to the discovery by Columbus, any civilized race ever came to the eastern or western shores of America, and attained a foothold.

G. A. Perkins, Rocky Ford, Otero Co., Colo.—(1) By what authority do we get the name of Dives for the rich man at whose gate Lazarus died? (2) What countries constituted the Roman Empire in the time of Christ? (3) Whom does the brother of the Prodigal Son represent? (4) Whom do the five foolish virgins represent?

(1) The story of Dives and Lazarus is a parable. In some old traditions the name of the rich man is given as Dobruk, and in others as Nimeusis. Lazarus, according to the best commentators, is the representative of the regard which God exercises to those of his saints whom the world spurns, as Dives is of the unfeeling and heartless rich, who take their pleasure in this life, thoughtless of the sufferings of others and of the future world. By some Dives has been regarded as a real personage. (2) When the Emperor Augustus died (14 A. D.) the Empire was bounded as follows: On the north (from Germany) by the Rhine but including Friesland and Holland; from Lake Constance along the Danube to Lower Moesia; its eastern boundary was the Euphrates; in the south it included Egypt, Libya and the whole of Northern Africa, as far west as Morocco and inland to the Sahara. (3) Like all Christ's utterances, this Parable had an application for every age. In his time, and that immediately subsequent, the elder brother, doubtless, represented the Jew objecting to the reception of the Gentile. In our day the elder brother represents the Christian of a like spirit, who witholds a hearty greeting to the converted reprobate. (4) They represent careless, worldly Christians, whose souls have not been replenished with the oil of grace by the Holy Spirit. When Christ appears to summon those who are expecting him to meet him in the air, these sleeping Christians will be left behind to suffer under Antichrist in the great tribulation, and will enter into blessedness only after severe affliction.

PARABLE OF THE SEEDS.

A N eminent Sunday School worker recently held a large gathering of children rapt in attention by telling them a parable of the seeds. As children of larger growth often need to learn the lesson it teaches, the following extracts are given:

A gardener was giving directions to a young lad who had come to be taught that good business. "This mustard and cress," he said, "you will scatter on the ground—there's no need to cover it at all. This onion seed you must cover lightly. Here is some parsley seed—that you will sow at least an inch deep. The watercress you must put in pots and the pots into a pan of water; I will see to them later myself. These cucumber seeds you must sow under the frame yonder at once—there's a nice warmth there now." When the gardener and his apprentice had gone, the seeds broke out into talk. The mustard and cress gave themselves airs because they thought that it was a fine thing not to be covered with dirt. Then the onion seeds growled because it was not to have the same fate as the mustard and cress. "Why," they asked, "should we be covered with soil, when the mustard and cress are to have the air and daylight?" Then the parsley began to grumble. "What sense is there," they asked, "in sinking delicate seeds like us deep into the ground?" The watercress seeds did not like what the gardener had said about them. "Why should we be placed in damp earth?" they wanted to know. "Why should not we have a nice warm place like the cucumber seeds? What have they done that they should have glass over them and hot soil beneath them?" And so they went on grumbling or boasting, but mostly grumbling. They did not understand, poor things, that the gardener knew what was best for them, and that some of them would grow best near the surface and some more deeply sown, that some of them needed moisture, and others needed heat. But you know that the gardener was not favoring some and despising others, but favoring all according to his knowledge and experience. And you know that the great gardener, who sows souls, has his own good reasons for what he does; and he sends some of us to mansions and some to cottages; lets some of us begin work while we are children, and allows others to have a longer time at school and colleges, puts some of us in poverty and some in wealth; not because he has favorites, but according to his knowledge of what is best for us. We cannot expect to understand why he does things so, but by-and-by we shall know, when his garden is in its summer fulness and autumn ripeness. In the meantime let us neither grumble nor boast, but do our best to be cheerful and grow.

A DREAM OF BEULAH.

EARTH'S jar and din, her strife and sin,
Are passing by forever;
Her minor plaint, now far and faint,
The winds shall bring back never.
Supernal skies beam on our eyes,
And up the echoing glory,
Divinely float, on silver notes,
The old, old blessed story.

The lily fair in a garden rare,
The royal rose in beauty;
The gardener true hath planted new
For his King in loyal duty.
The spicy trees perfume the breeze;
The odorous fruit hangs golden;
While filtered light hath banished night
To eyes now un beholden.

Narrow and low the stream doth flow,
The wavering waters glisten;
There's music here in the rippling clear,
Be still, my soul, and listen.
The shimmering strand of Morning Land,
Her softened radiance sifting
Adown the tree of life we see
And the green leaves waving, lifting.

The angels bright, from the Heavenly Height,
A loving service render;

O'er shining hills and leaping rills
Their white wings wave in splendor.
On pinion strong they sweep along,
Their princely orders wearing;
They hold a seal—their smiles reveal
The message they are bearing.

They near the shore—our day is o'er,
We know the blessed token,
And summons sweet our Lord to meet
Though not a word be spoken.
Where Jesus trod, up to our God
We'll tread with anthems ringing;
Though clouds enfold the City of Gold
The pearly gates are swinging.

We'll soon be there in a mansion fair—
The trumpeters are sounding
The stirring strain from plain to plain
From hill to hill resounding.
The tuned harp swells, the golden bells
Chime out a joyous greeting,
In royal state a glad throng wait
And sweet will be the meeting.

Yes, Hood's Sarsaparilla is really "peculiar." Prepared by a combination, proportion and process unknown to other medicines, Hood's Sarsaparilla accomplishes cures hitherto unknown.

"A new theory has been started with regard to the use of soap on the face. Women who for years have been careful of their complexions, would never, under any circumstances, wash the face in soap, as it was said to roughen and coarsen the skin. Now, that Ivory Soap has been invented, this idea is exploded, and a well-known physician in the metropolitan profession recommends his women patients to use it freely every day, lathering the skin well. He states that none but the most beneficial results will be effected by this method of improving the skin.

He holds—with considerable plausibility—that the pores of the face become as much clogged by grease and dirt as the hands or any other portion of the body. And if soap is considered a necessary purifier in the bath, its needs must be felt equally on the face. By an abundant and regular lathering the facial pores, he claims, are kept open, clean, free from the clogging matter that produces unsightly blackheads, acne, pimples, and a pure, healthy, fresh and brighter complexion is the resultant. Not mincing matters, he says that the trouble with most women who have sallow, pasty skins is, that from year's end to year's end they never have a really clean face."

A Vacation Trip TO THE ROCKIES.

"Manitou and the Mountains" have become household words, and when one nowadays contemplates a summer trip, the popular point, Manitou, at once comes to the front in the minds of all, and the decision in nine cases out of ten is, "Yes, to Manitou we will go."

THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RY runs Through Car Vestibule Trains from Chicago to Colorado Springs, and on fast trains are Through Day Coaches, Through Chair Cars, Through Pullman Sleepers and Dining Cars.

At Colorado Springs, which is virtually at foot of Pike's Peak, there is an electric line to Manitou (six miles away), and one can leave the Springs at any quarter hour interval. There are steam roads also from Colorado Springs to Manitou.

An excellent plan is to take carriage at Colorado Springs and drive to Manitou, taking in en route the Garden of the Gods, so widely advertised, and in which are such wonderful sights, and the detour on this route is but little, and the tourist is well repaid the time and trivial increased expense.

But on arrival at Manitou the climax is reached in delightful drives, babbling brooks, lovely lakes, and cool corners in the shady parks that abound at this foot-hill village.

We can not begin to tell you of the wonders and beauties of this popular resort, but just mention another feature that overtops all. It is the new railroad built from Manitou to the top of Pike's Peak, and in a Railway Car you can now be carried to the Clouds—Cheaply, Speedily and Safely.

Take a trip via the Rock Island Route to Manitou, Colorado, in your summer vacation.

Mr. Spurgeon's New Book.

WITH A PAGE OF PRECIOUS PROMISES FOR EVERY DAY OF THE YEAR.

THE CHEQUE BOOK of the BANK OF FAITH. BEING PRECIOUS PROMISES ARRANGED FOR DAILY USE. With Brief Experimental Comments. Nearly 400 pages. 12mo. Price $1.50.

In Mr. Spurgeon's Preface he says: "I believe all the promises of God,—but many of them I have personally tried and proved, I have seen that they are true, for they have been fulfilled to me. I commenced these daily portions when I was wading in the Surf of Controversy. Since then I have been cast into 'waters to swim,' which, but for God's upholding hand, would have proved waters to drown in. The waters rolled in continually, wave upon wave. I do not mention this to exact sympathy, but simply to let the reader see that I am no dry-land sailor—I know the roll of the billows, and the rush of the winds. Never were the promises of Jehovah so precious to me as at this hour."

N. Y. Christian Intelligencer: "When it is stated that this well-named book contains a SCRIPTURE PROMISE FOR EACH DAY IN THE YEAR, commented on, in his best vein, by the prince of practical and experimental preachers, enough has been said to commend as first in its class. It is most admirably adapted for daily reading either in the family or the closet, and wherever used will be found spiritually stimulative."

"Mr. Spurgeon's words are so plain, his style so sparkling, and his spirit so devout, that the reading of his productions is almost sure to excite a mental glow and awaken holy aspirations. This book is brimful of quickening, soothing, soul-lifting power, and is admirably adapted to the end in view."—N. Y. Witness.

MR. WEBSTER'S SAVINGS.

He Put Them in the Lord's Bank and They Drew Good Interest.

He put them in the 'Lord's Bank,' and they drew good interest, too."

"Yes, I suppose it's true. Let me see, what did he say? I'm getting too old for the work."

The speaker was an old man, bent of frame, and with head polished and bright as a mirror, where, forty years ago, a crop of luxuriant dark hair had been. He was busy with his plane in the one room that served him for workshop, sitting-room, and bedroom. The delicate walnut shavings fell about his feet as the plane went briskly along for a few minutes, and then ceased, and the old man leaned back against the wall and began muttering to himself again.

"It will be hard work to live, I expect. I think the boss might have found me something to do. I don't want much, but I must have something to keep me alive. Nothing after next Saturday, and I've only four dollars left now, and the pay I shall have for this job. That'll be all I shall have to keep me next week. Rather a dull lookout for you, George, my boy."

A few turns more at the plane followed this summing up of his worldly position; but the work dragged to-day, and the old man's mind reverted to the conversation which troubled him.

"What did the boss say? 'Retire on my savings?' Yes, that was it, 'and live like a gentleman.' Wonder if I ought to have saved. I've had plenty of money in my time, but I never saved. Not I. Mary used to say, 'We'll put it in the Lord's bank. It'll be safe there.' God bless her, she was a good wife and a good Christian, but I'm almost thankful she did not live to hear that Wace won't give me any more work. Wonder what she would have said. I don't believe that she would have lost heart. She would have said 'God won't desert us in our old age.' What was it she used to sing?

Even let the unknown morrow
Bring with it what it may,
It can bring with it nothing,
But he will bear us through;
Who gives the lilies clothing,
Will clothe his people, too.

The old man's voice quavered a little as he sang the familiar words, but there was a note of conviction and joy and fervor that would have astonished any listener who happened to know that only four dollars stood between the old man and starvation.

"The Lord's bank," he soliloquized, as he stopped to take breath; "well, I don't know that there's much in it. Not much of my putting in, though the capital's enormous. We've had our interest all along in the pleasure it gave us. After the boys died and then little Fanny, it was very lonesome, and we took little Willie when he was left an orphan, and we brought him up, and he's doing well now. And then we took Freddy Bertram when the widow died, and we brought him up, too, and he learned the trade. It cost us a deal of money, but it brightened the house like, to hear the children's voices, and there's no saying what might have happened to both of 'em if we hadn't seen to 'em. Then there was the money we gave Joe Brown when he broke his leg, but then we should have done that anyhow, because we were sorry for him. And then—but what's the use? It was all the same. We gave the money, and it was good to see how happy it made 'em. I can't say it's in the Lord's bank. I've no claim on him for it. He'll take care of me now, I know, because he is so good. But I've no claim—no claim."

The old man shook his head with an air of conviction. He seemed satisfied that his case was bad, but he was not despondent now. God was good, and he was not afraid. The work went on again, this time with a whistle of a cheerful hymn tune. It was getting too dark to see, and after awhile the tools were laid aside, and the old man stood by his window enjoying the brief interval of twilight.

"I'd like to see Freddy's wife," he said presently. "He must be getting on well to get married. Fred was a smart boy, and I've no doubt his store in Montreal is a good-sized place. I'd like to see him again. He said in his letter he and his wife were going on their marriage tour. I wish they'd have come this route. I'm real glad, though, the boy's doing well. The money I spent on him has done good, and I shall manage, somehow. It was better spent than put in the bank to keep me. David was an old man, and he said he'd never seen the righteous forsaken. Neither have I, and I'm over seventy."

Again the old man sang his wife's favorite hymn, and the words "will clothe his people too," came forth with a roll of triumph. They were scarcely uttered, when the door of the workshop was pushed open without ceremony, and the old workman, turning round, saw a gentleman and lady enter. His first thought was that God was fulfilling his promise by sending him a customer, and he bent deferentially before his visitors.

"You don't know us, Mr. Webster," said the gentleman.

"No," said the old man, "no, I don't know you, but there's something familiar in the tone of your voice. I think I must have met you somewhere."

"Yes, you have, and if you had not met me I might have been in some state's prison now or lying dead in a drunkard's grave. I am a respectable tradesman now, with a good bank account and the best wife in the world. Fred Bertram's name is respected on the other side the frontier, but all he is, and has, he owes to a good old Christian named George Webster, who was a father to an orphan boy."

"Fred, my boy, is it really you? God bless you," said the old man, his voice thick with tears of joy. "God bless you and your wife, too. I'm glad to have seen you both before I die."

"Oh, don't you talk of dying yet; I have something else for you to do. I am coming in the morning to give away everything here but your old arm-chair and your old Bible. I am going to take you and them away with me to my home. I always said when I had a home I would not sleep in it until you were there, and I am going to keep my word."

"No, Fred, my boy. It's good of you to say so, but I can't go to be a burden on you and your wife."

"Look here," said Mr. Bertram, "my wife knows all about it, and we're agreed on this, so, you obstinate old man, you may consider yourself booked north, and you are going to live in a house that is a good deal more yours than mine."

"Well," said the old workman, when his visitors were gone, "I guess I'm provided for, after all. I wish Mary was alive to see it. I know what she would say. She was quite right. The Lord's Bank was the best place for our savings."

A PARISIAN PERSECUTOR.

A RECENT visitor to the French capital tells a remarkable story of the conversion at one of the McAll mission stations of a woman who had been a bitter and relentless opponent of the work. He says: "One of the latest converts is of a woman at the Gare d'Ivry, Paris. She was the wife of the janitor at a building which had to be entered by those who attended the mission-hall. She manifested the most vindictive hatred to the evangelists and the people who attended the services. She even used to let a savage dog loose upon the people, several of whom were bitten. The devoted evangelist, M. Sagnol, bore wonderfully with her, and persisted, in spite of her rude treatment, in often paying her short visits, though, to use his own expression, he could not succeed in putting in a word for Christ. Several of his friends, however, agreed with him to make the woman a special subject for prayer. One day she surprised the evangelist by saying, 'You cannot imagine how wicked I am.' That is a good sign; when we begin to know ourselves, there is hope of amendment." "Ah! sir, you mistake. I shall never be changed; the evil is too old, it has taken too deep root." For a long time she seemed hopeless. After some appropriate passages of Scripture had been read to her she only cried, 'I am lost, I am lost!' M. Sagnol then asked her to attend the hall, which she had never once entered for any meeting. 'Come in,' he said, 'I will pray with you, for the Good Shepherd is seeking to save you.' She wept much. On his next visit, a week afterwards, a mighty transformation had taken place. 'All is well,' she said, 'I am in peace. He has found me.'"

A PICTURE SERVICE IN ARMENIA.

THE missionaries in the territories under the government of the Sultan of Turkey are following in a scriptural way the Apostle's example of being "all things to all men." Some inveterate opponents of the Gospel who would on no account attend the preaching, have been induced to listen to the explanation of pictures. A description of one of these services held at Chomakiu in Eastern Turkey is sent to the Independent by Rev. J. L. Fowle, a missionary of the American Board. The following is an extract from his letter:

Of the 300 present at least one-half were Gregorians (Armenians of the old church). Through ignorance and bigotry many of these latter had never set foot inside our Protestant chapel in all the years that the Gospel has been preached there. But that night curiosity got the better of bigotry; in spite of priestly protest they crowded in, and as most of the pictures were on Bible scenes, the explaining of them gave us a good chance to preach the Word. Abraham sacrificing Isaac; The Judgment of Solomon; Daniel; The Prodigal; and some of those regarding the Christ were especially useful in this line. They kept very quiet, but exclamations of surprise could not be restrained; some were moved to tears, and many of the devout made the sign of the cross and repeated the formula, "God is blessed!" This was especially true on Saturday evening when more than 400 were present, at least 250 of them being Gregorians. We had arranged for an examination for candidates for admission to the church on Saturday at 5 P. M., and a sermon at 8 o'clock. But the brethren begged so hard on behalf of the Gregorians who had not seen the pictures that I consented to show the lantern again after the sermon. To prevent any one's saying we had inveigled them into listening to a sermon we told them that, by appointment, there would be a sermon, and that any who did not want to listen were at liberty to go. Not a soul stirred, and for more than an hour they listened to a simple Gospel sermon preached by my companion, Karmi Effendi. Then the lantern was brought in, and they listened eagerly to a series of short sermons, with the pictures as texts. On Sunday large numbers of these same persons—men and women formerly bitterly opposed to us—were present, both morning and afternoon.

A SUPERSTITIOUS PEOPLE.

WHILE curious superstitions are encountered in all lands and many of them exist even among ourselves there is no land in which they exercise so much influence as in Ceylon. Mr. W. S. Howland gives a long list of these strange notions which, it appears, often survive after the Ceylonese native has learned from the missionary the truths of the Gospel. "A whole code of signs," he says, "are connected with lizards. In general their chirping is regarded as a warning. I have known a large company to be listening apparently with great interest, and the word seemed to have power over their hearts, when suddenly a lizard chirps, and all the interest is gone, they are uneasy, and one after another leaves. One family I knew were just starting out to attend a festival, when a lizard chirped, and they felt themselves obliged to stay at home. The flight of crows, hawks, and other birds, has various meanings. A new house has a white flag put on its roof, to prevent crows from alighting on it, which would be ill-omened. It is unlucky to see a deformed person first in the morning. A conch shell is buried by the door-sill, so that its white surface may be the first thing seen in the morning and bring good luck. Above all, they are afraid of the evil eye. A child's good looks, if praised, will cause it to waste away and die. A good crop must not be commended. Often we see a hideous scarecrow, as we should call it, in a tobacco field—a stuffed man with a bow or gun; but it is only there to keep off the evil eye, by attracting attention to itself rather than to the crop. Moreover, evil spirits are everywhere, and up to all sorts of mischief, and must be warded off. Mystic figures and diagrams on a scroll, in a gold or silver case, are bound on the arm or neck. Devil drivers with all their arts are employed. Certain trees are considered haunted."

THE CHILDREN'S FRIEND.

The Rev. T. B. Stephenson, the new President of the Wesleyan Conference in England, and His Noble Work for the Master.

At its recent session in Wesley Chapel, Nottingham, England, the 148th Conference of the Wesley Methodist Body elected as its President the Rev. T. B. Stephenson, D.D., to succeed the retiring President, Rev. Dr. Moulton. The selection of Dr. Stephenson for this high office brings into prominence one of the most eminent and devoted of God's servants in the Methodist ministry, who has given abundant proof of his deep and earnest sympathies with the poorer classes and those whom it is difficult to reach through the usual channels of church organization. Dr. Stephenson has, by his evangelistic ardor, his zeal in the temperance cause and his unceasing efforts in behalf of the fallen, succeeded in accomplishing so great a moral work in a number of English cities, that we are justified in presenting his portrait and a sketch of his career to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the present issue.

Origin of the Home.

Born in Sheffield and educated at the London University, he received his preparation for the ministry at the Richmond Theological Institution, and was afterward stationed successively at Norwich, Manchester, Bolton and London. While laboring in the latter city as a Wesleyan minister, his field being in the neighborhood of a notorious quarter known as the "New Cut," he was impressed with the wretchedness, vice, and crime which infested that locality, and longed to do something practical in the way of rescuing the children from the inevitable career awaiting them if left to such surroundings. Calling to his help a few friends like-minded with himself, a little house in Lambeth was taken, and transformed into a refuge for a few poor and needy boys and girls. A stable at the rear was transformed into a dining-room, and a hay-loft over it into a dormitory. Such was the small beginning. Presently another house was taken until at length the home was moved to Bonner Road, Victoria Park, and from that time it rapidly developed, till to-day

There are Over 800 Children in the various branches of it. Though under the direction of the Wesleyan Conference, no question of sect or creed influences the selection of its inmates, the most pressing and needy cases being invariably dealt with. Strange histories are attached to many of the children thus rescued and nourished.

The principle on which this institution is based is to supply these children with a home. It is not a mere institution where the children are gathered together, fed, clothed, taught in a mass; but it is a collection of families, each having its own house, its "house-mother," and distinct family life. There can be no doubt this home life is the secret of the success which has attended Dr. Stephenson's work. A child is brought from the vilest surroundings, unaccustomed to control, vicious, dishonest, and devoted himself exclusively to the over-sight of the Home and its varied branches.

ISLE OF MAN BRANCH.

weeks it may be seen playing amongst other children

Singing the Songs of Zion, clothed, and in its right mind. What has wrought the change? The same divine power of love, which brought the Son of God into the world to seek and save the lost.

In a little book, entitled The Story of the Home, Dr. Stephenson points out the distinctive features upon which the work is based. 1. It is a religious work, a mission for Christ Jesus to his neediest little ones. 2. It is industrial, for the children are trained to habits of industry, and put upon the lines of industrial progress. 3. The idea suggested by the title "Home," is admirably carried out by the system adopted of placing in barracks, but in homes.

In addition to the London Homes there are others near Bolton in Lancashire, at Ramsay, Isle of Man; at Milton, near Gravesend; and at Erdington, near Birmingham, several of which are illustrated in this issue. There is also a branch

In Canada where the children who emigrate there are lodged until situations are found for them. Before their arrival the resident governor has advertised their coming, and received applications for them, making inquiries as to the character and suitability of the applicants. Within a few weeks most of the children are provided with situations in Canada, but they are by no means lost sight of. By correspondence, inquiries, and personal visits, the agent makes himself acquainted with their condition and circumstances.

In 1880, the Wesleyan Conference testified its appreciation of Dr. Stephenson's

labor by electing him into the "Legal Hundred," and the following year he received from an American university the honorary degree of LL.D. He served as a member of the London School Board and took an active part in philanthropic and social movements. It is now thirteen years since, owing to the great development of philanthropic work, he relinquished other duties

Upward of $75,000 annually are required to sustain these organizations. The London branch is situated on Bonner road, near Victoria Park, and consists of a square block of buildings with gymnasium and playgrounds, and having workshops in the rear, where the children are taught the rudiments of the useful trades. Each individual building has its distinctive name, being called after the donor; thus: "Laleham House," is the gift of a lady and her wealthy pupils at Laleham, Clapham; the "Sunday School House," is the result of contributions by Sunday School teachers and scholars during two years; the "Walton Memorial House" was the gift of a gentleman in memory of his deceased wife. The "Home Chapel," where services are held, is a simple yet beautiful equipped schools. The Wheatsheaf Farm, connected with the Bolton branch, has a beautiful building (which was formerly a whiskey-shop) and 100 acres of land.

Soon after the "Home" was founded its promoters had their attention directed towards emigration, inasmuch as many of the boys and girls began to approach the age at which it was right to earn their own living, and two difficulties had to be faced. The labor market was not in a condition which promised much aid to them in their struggle, and, on the other hand, many of them were taken from associations which would be certain to cling around them with a most disastrous effect. Hence it was an absolute necessity that they should be enabled to commence their active career in some place to which their relatives could have no easy access, and from which, during the first years in which their judgment was to grow to independence, it would not be easy for them to return to their old haunts. At that time the late and deeply lamented Dr. Punshon was resident in Canada. He took, from the very first, a deep interest in the work of the "Home," and suggested that that great and enterprising country would afford peculiar advantages to the children. At his suggestion Dr. Stephenson paid a visit to Canada, in order to make the necessary inquiries, and at length it was determined to send out parties of children to that country. Through the liberality and influence of Dr. Punshon, aided by many generous Canadian friends, the committee were able to establish the Canadian Branch, which is a commodious house, with eight acres of land attached, and conveniently situated near the city of Hamilton, Ont. A Canadian farmer will take a boy of ten or twelve into his house, and treat him as a member of his own family. When a party of young emigrants are thus sent out an officer of the "Home" goes with them, and on their arrival they proceed direct to the Canadian branch, where they pass into the hands of the resident governor. Almost all of those so provided for have prospered and done credit to the excellent Christian training received at the Home.

The Princess Alice Orphanage.

One of the latest extensions of Dr. Stephenson's plans is the Princess Alice Orphanage, which owes its origin to the liberality of Mr. S. Jervis, a wealthy gentleman of Birmingham, who gave $50,000 as the nucleus of a fund for the purpose. It is situated at Erdington, near Birmingham, on an estate of eighteen acres, and accommodates 300 orphans. It is established for the destitute orphan children of Christian parents. Like the other branches of this far-reaching moral and benevolent enterprise, it is not endowed, but is entirely dependent upon the voluntary offerings of practical Christian people who sympathize with those helpless little ones and are willing to stretch forth the helping hand of mercy. The cost of maintaining the Homes is great, and the financial pressure is often severe, but thus far God's people in many lands have not failed to respond nobly to these deserving charities, remembering the risen Saviour's injunction: "Feed my lambs."

THE CORN-CRIB OF EGYPT.

Dr. Talmage's Text is: Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you. Gen. 43: 3.

THIS summer, having crossed eighteen of the United States, North, South, East and West, I have to report the mightiest harvests that this country or any other country ever reaped. If the grain gamblers do not somehow wreck these harvests, we are about to enter upon the grandest scene of prosperity that America has ever witnessed. But while this is so in our own country, on the other side of the Atlantic there are nations threatened with famine, and the most dismal cry that is ever heard will I fear be uttered, the cry for bread. I pray God that the contrast between our prosperity and their want may not be as sharp as in the lands referred to by my text. There was nothing to eat. Plenty of corn in Egypt, but ghastly famine in Canaan. The cattle moaning in the stall. Men, women and children awfully white with hunger. Not the failing of one crop for one summer, but the failing of all the crops for seven years. A nation dying for lack of that which is so common on your table, and so little appreciated; the product of harvest field, and grist-mill, and oven; the price of sweat, and anxiety, and struggle.—Bread! Jacob the father, has the last report from the flour-bin, and he finds that everything is out; and he says to his sons: "Boys, hook up the wagons and start for Egypt, and get us something to eat." The fact was, there was a great corn-crib in Egypt. The people of Egypt have been largely taxed in all ages, at the present time paying between seventy and eighty per cent. of their products to the government. No wonder in that time they had a large corn-crib, and it was full.

The morning for starting out on the crusade for bread has arrived. Jacob gets his family up very early. But before the elder sons start they say something that makes him tremble with emotion from head to foot, and burst into tears. The fact was, that these elder sons had once before been in Egypt to get corn, and they had been treated somewhat roughly, the lord of the corn-crib supplying them with corn, but saying at the close of the interview: "Now, you need not come back here for any more corn unless you bring something better than money—even your younger brother Benjamin." Ah! Benjamin—that very name was suggestive of all tenderness. The mother had died at the birth of that son—a spirit coming and another spirit going—and the very thought of parting with Benjamin must have been a heart-break. "Why did you tell them you had a brother?" said the old man, complaining and chiding them. "Why, father," they said, "he asked us all about our family, and we had no idea he would make any such demand upon us as he has made." "No use of asking me," said the father, "I cannot, I will not, give up Benjamin." The fact was that the old man had lost children; and when there has been bereavement in a household, and a child taken, it makes the other children in the household more precious. So the day for departure was adjourned, and adjourned, and adjourned. Still the horrors of the famine increased, and louder moaned the cattle, and wider open cracked the earth, and more pallid became the cheeks, until Jacob, in despair, cried out to his sons, "Take Benjamin and be off." The older sons tried to cheer up their father. They said: "We have strong arms and a stout heart, and no harm will come to Benjamin. We'll see that he gets back again." "Farewell!" said the young men to the father, in a tone of assumed good cheer. "F-a-r-e-w-e-l-l!" said the old man; for that word has more quavers in it when pronounced by the aged than by the young.

Well, the bread party—the bread embassy—drives up in front of the corn-crib of Egypt. These corn-cribs are filled with wheat, and barley, and corn in the husk, for those who have travelled in Canaan and Egypt know that there is corn there corresponding with our Indian maize. Huzza! the journey is ended. The lord of the corn-crib, who is also the Prime Minister, comes down to these arrived travellers, and says: "Dine with me to-day. How is your father? Is this Benjamin, the younger brother whose presence I demanded?" Be quick and send word back with the swiftest camel to Canaan to old Jacob, that "Benjamin is well; all is well; he is faring sumptuously; the Egyptian lord did not mean murder and death; but he meant deliverance and life when he announced to us on that day: 'Ye shall not see my face unless your brother be with you.'"

Well, my friends, this world is famine-struck of sin. It does not yield a single crop of solid satisfaction. It is dying. It is hunger-bitten. The fact that it does not, cannot, feed a man's heart was well illustrated in the life of the English comedian. All the world honored him—did everything for him that the world could do. He was applauded in England and applauded in the United States. He roused up nations into laughter. He had no equal. And yet, although many people supposed him entirely happy, and that this world was completely satiating his soul, he sits down and writes: "I never in my life put on a new hat, that it did not rain and ruin it. I never went out in a shabby coat because it was raining and thought all who had the choice would keep in-doors, that the sun did not burst forth in its strength and bring out with it all the butterflies of fashion whom I knew and who knew me. I never consented to accept a part I hated, out of kindness to another, that I did not get hissed by the public and cut by the writer. I could not take a drive for a few minutes with Terry without being overturned and having my elbow-bone broken, though my friend got off unharmed. I could not make a covenant with Arnold, which I thought was to make my fortune without making his instead, than in an incredible space of time—I think thirteen months—I earned for him twenty thousand pounds, and for myself one. I am persuaded that if I were to set up as a baker, every one in my neighborhood would leave off eating bread." That was the lament of the world's comedian and joker. All unhappy. The world did everything for Lord Byron that it could do, and yet in his last moment he asks a friend to come and sit down by him and read, as most appropriate to his case, the story of "The Bleeding Heart." Torrigiano the sculptor, executed, after months of care and carving, "Madonna and the Child." The royal family came in and admired it. Everybody that looked at it was in ecstasy; but one day, after all that toil, and all that admiration, because he did not get as much compensation for his work as he had expected, he took a mallet and dashed the exquisite sculpture into atoms. The world is poor compensation, poor satisfaction, poor solace. Famine, famine in all the earth; not for seven years, but for six thousand. But, blessed be God, there is a great corn-crib. The Lord built it. It is in another land. It is a large place. An angel once measured it, and as far as I can calculate it in our phrase, that corn-crib is fifteen hundred miles long and fifteen hundred broad, and fifteen hundred high; and it is full. Food for all nations. "O!" say the people, "we will start right away and get this supply for our soul." But stop a moment; for from the keeper of that corn-crib there comes this word, saying: "You shall not see my face except your brother be with you." In other words, there is no such thing as getting from heaven pardon, and comfort, and eternal life, unless we bring with us our Divine Brother, the Lord Jesus Christ. Coming without him we shall fall before we reach the corn-crib, and our bodies shall be a portion for the jackals of the wilderness; but coming with the Divine Jesus, all the granaries of heaven will swing open before our soul, and abundance shall be given us. We shall be invited to sit in the palace of the King and at the table; and while the Lord of heaven is apportioning from his own table to other tables he will not forget us; and then and there it will be found that our Benjamin's mess is larger than all the others, for so it ought to be. "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive blessing, and riches, and honor, and glory, and power."

"IS THIS BENJAMIN?"

I want to make three points. Every frank and common-sense man will acknowledge himself to be a sinner. What are you going to do with your sins? Have them pardoned, you say. How? Through the mercy of God. What do you mean by the mercy of God? Is it the letting down of a bar for the admission of all, without respect to character? Be not deceived. I see a soul coming up to the gate of mercy and knocking at the corn-crib of heavenly supply; and a voice from within says: "Are you alone?" The sinner replies: "All alone." The voice from within says "You shall not see my pardoning face unless your Divine Brother, the Lord Jesus, be with you." O, that is the point at which so many are discomforted. There is no mercy from God except through Jesus Christ. "Coming with him we are accepted. Coming without him, we are rejected. Peter put it right in his great sermon before the high priests, when he thundered forth: "Neither is there salvation in any other. There is no other name given under heaven among men whereby we may be saved." O, anxious sinner! O, dying sinner! O, lost sinner! all you have got to do is to have this Divine Benjamin along with you. Side by side, coming to the gate, all the store-houses of heaven will swing open before your anxious soul. Am I right in calling Jesus Benjamin? O, yes. Rachel lived only long enough to give a name to that child, and with a dying kiss she called him Benoni. Afterward Jacob changed his name, and he called him Benjamin. The meaning of the name she gave was "Son of my Pain." The meaning of the name the father gave was "Son of my Right Hand." And was not Christ the Son of pain? All the sorrows of Rachel in that hour, when she gave her child over into the hands of strangers was nothing compared with the struggle of God when he gave up his only Son. The omnipotent God in a birth throe! And was not Christ appropriately called "Son of the Right Hand?" Did not Stephen look into heaven and see him standing at the right hand of God? And does not Paul speak of him as standing at the right hand of God making intercession for us? O, Benjamin—Jesus!

TORRIGIANO'S SACRIFICE.

Son of pang! Son of victory! The deepest emotions of our souls ought to be stirred at the sound of that nomenclature. In your prayers plead his tears, his sufferings, his sorrows and his death. If you refuse to do it, all the corn-cribs and the palaces of heaven will be bolted and barred against your soul, and a voice from the throne shall stun you with the announcement: "You shall not see my face except your brother be with you."

My text also suggests the reason why so many people do not get any real comfort. You meet ten people; nine of them are in need of some kind of condolence. There is something in their health, or in their state or in their domestic condition that demands sympathy. And yet the most of the world's sympathy amounts to absolutely nothing. People go to the wrong crib, or they go in the wrong way. When the plague was in Rome a great many years ago, there were eighty men who chanted themselves to death with the litanies of Gregory the Great—literally chanted themselves to death, and yet it did not stop the plague. And all the music of this world cannot halt the plague of the human heart. I come to some one whose ailments are chronic, and I say: "In heaven you will never be sick." That does not give you much comfort. What you want is a soothing power for your present distress. Lost children, have you? I come to you and tell you that in ten years perhaps you will meet those loved ones before the throne of God. But there is but little condolence in that. One day is a year without them, and ten years is a small eternity. What you want is a sympathy now—present help. I come to those of you who have lost dear friends, and say: "Try to forget them. Do not keep the departed always in your mind." How can you forget them when every figure in the carpet, and every book, and every picture, and every room calls out their name. Suppose I come to you and say by way of condolence: "God is wise." "O!" you say, "that gives me no help." Suppose I come to you and say: "God, from all eternity, has arranged this trouble." "Ah!" you say: "that does me no good." Then I say: "With the swift feet of prayer go direct to the corn-crib for a heavenly supply." You go. You say: "Lord, help me; Lord, comfort me." But no help yet. No comfort yet. It is all dark. What is the matter? I have found. You ought to go to God and say: "Here, O Lord, are the wounds of my soul. I bring with me the wounded Jesus. Let his wounds pay for my bereavements, his loneliness for my loneliness, his heart-break for my heart-break. O, God! for the sake of the Lord Jesus Christ—the God, the man, the Benjamin, the brother—deliver my agonized soul. O, Jesus of the weary foot, ease my fatigue. O, Jesus of the aching head, heal my aching head. O, Jesus of the Bethany sisters, roll away the stone from the door of our grave." That is the kind of prayer that brings help; and yet how many of you are getting no help at all, for the reason that there is in your soul, perhaps, a secret trouble. You may never have mentioned it to a single human ear, or you may have mentioned it to some one who is now gone away, and that great sorrow is still in your soul. After Washington Irving was dead, they found a little box that contained a braid of hair and a miniature, and the name of Matilda Hoffman, and a memorandum of her death, and a remark something like this: "The world after that was a blank to me. I went into the country, but found no peace in solitude. I tried to go into society, but I found no peace in society. There has been a horror hanging over me by night and by day, and I am afraid to be alone."

How many unuttered troubles! No human ear has ever heard the sorrow. O, troubled soul, I want to tell you that there is one salve that can cure the wounds of the heart, and that is the salve made out of the tears of a sympathetic Jesus. And yet some of you will not take this solace; and you try chloral, and you try morphine, and you try strong drink, and you try change of scene, and you try new business associations, and anything and everything rather than take the Divine companionship and sympathy suggested by the words of my text when it says, "You shall not see my face again unless your brother be with you." O, that you might understand something of the height, and depth, and length, and breadth, and immensity, and infinity of God's eternal consolations.

I go further, and find in my subject a hint as to the way heaven opens to the departing spirit. We are told that heaven has twelve gates, and some people infer from that fact that all the people will go in without reference to their past life; but what is the use of having a gate that is not sometimes to be shut? The swinging of a gate implies that our entrance into heaven is conditional. It is not a monetary condition. There is nothing to be paid at that door for entrance; but the condition of getting into heaven is our bringing our Divine Benjamin along with us. Do you notice how often dying people call upon Jesus? It is the usual prayer offered—the prayer offered more than all the other prayers put together—"Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." One of our congregation, when asked in the closing moments of his life, "Do you know us?" said: "O, yes, I know you. God bless you. Good-by. Lord Jesus, receive my spirit;" and he was gone. O, yes, in the closing moments of our life we must have a Christ to call upon. If Jacob's sons had gone toward Egypt, and had gone with the very finest equipage, and had not taken Benjamin along with them, and to the question they should have been obliged to answer: "Sir, we didn't bring him, as father could not let him go; we didn't want to be bothered with him," a voice from within would have said: "Go away from us. You shall not have any of this supply. You shall not see my face because your brother is not with you." And if we come up toward the door of heaven at last, though we come from all luxuriance and brilliancy of surroundings, and knock for admittance, and it is found that Christ is not with us, the police of heaven will beat us back from the bread-house, saying: "Depart, I never knew you." If Jacob's sons, coming toward Egypt, had lost everything on the way; if they had expended their last shekel; if they had come up utterly exhausted to the corn-cribs of Egypt, and it had been found that Benjamin was with them, all the store-houses would have swung open before them. And so, though by fatal casualty we may be ushered into the eternal world; though we may be weak and exhausted by protracted sickness—if, in that last moment, we can only just stagger, and faint, and fall into the gate of heaven—it seems that all the corn-cribs of heaven will open for our need and all the palaces will open for our reception; and the Lord of that place, seated at his table, and all the angels of God seated at their table, and the martyrs seated at their table, and all our glorified kindred seated at our table, the king shall pass a portion from his table to ours, and then, while we think of the fact that it was Jesus who started us on the road, and Jesus who kept us on the way, and Jesus who at last gained admittance for our soul, we shall be glad if he has seen of the travail of his soul and been satisfied, and not be at all jealous if it be found that our Divine Benjamin's mess is five times larger than all the rest. Hail! anointed of the Lord. Thou art worthy.

My friends, you see it is either Christ or famine. If there were two banquets spread, and to one of them, only, you might go, you might stand and think for a good while as to which invitation you had better accept; but here it is feasting or starvation. If it were a choice between oratorios, you might say: "I prefer the 'Creation,'" or "I prefer the 'Messiah.'" But here it is a choice between eternal harmony and everlasting discord. O, will you live or die? Will you start for the Egyptian corn-crib, or will you perish amid the empty barns of the Canaanitish famine? "Ye shall not see my face except your brother be with you."

A CHILD'S PLEA.

REPROOF delicately given by a child recalled her mother recently to a neglected duty. The mother, says the Youth's Companion in relating the incident, is a lady of wealth and much occupied with social and charitable duties. Every day some engagement connected with philanthropic enterprises in which she was an energetic worker took her away from home. One day as she was dressing hurriedly while her carriage waited at the door, her little daughter came to her and asked her to show her how to play a new game. The request seemed trivial to the mother, who answered sharply, "Nonsense, this is Board day at the Hospital and I am late now." The child's countenance fell and she said wistfully, "I wish there was a day sometimes you could call my day, Mamma." The words went home, and from that time the little girl has had one day every week which her mother spends with her, and to which the child looks forward all the week. It was well that the reproof was given and accepted, or the mother might some day have had occasion to utter the lament which so many parents have uttered: "They made me keeper of the vineyards, but mine own vineyard have I not kept." (Cant. 1: 6.)

A NEW MINERAL.

REPORTS of the discovery of a new mineral in Texas are arousing intense interest among electricians and scientific men. It is a substance resembling asphalt, and it is said to be unaffected by water, heat, acid or alkalies, and therefore the most perfect insulator yet discovered. Numerous tests have been made. Prof. Hamilton, the electrician of the Western Electric Company, certifies that under tests executed in the most exhaustive manner wire prepared with a covering of the material showed a resistance sevenfold greater than that offered by any other wire. The supply of this material is said to be practically unlimited as it is found in veins ranging in depth from two to forty feet. The world of science and mechanical industry will wait with interest further investigation, which is needed to prove the utility of the new discovery beyond peradventure. Electricians will not be slow to appreciate the value of this discovery if the material possesses all the qualities claimed for it. One of their chief difficulties has consisted in finding an insulator sufficiently pliable and durable, as the wires must be protected from the weather and other influences or they would soon cease to perform their functions. The Christian, too, sometimes ceases to perform his functions through imperfect insulation. When the trials and temptations and worries of the world are able to disturb his spirit he cannot carry the message of God to men nor give the light that Christ expects him to give. (Matt. 5: 16.) Such protection God provides for all who seek it. (Eph. 6: 13.)

A MARRIAGE ON A MOUNTAIN.

AN unexpected difficulty delayed a marriage in Pennsylvania last week. A press dispatch from Lewistown, Pa., says that a minister at Milroy was about to unite in marriage a couple who had come fifteen miles across the Seven Mountains to be married in his church, when he discovered that the ceremony could not be legally performed there. The bridegroom had procured his licence in Centre County, while Milroy is in Mifflin County. The couple were grievously disappointed, and thought the clergyman was unnecessarily scrupulous, but he went out and consulted a lawyer, who confirmed his opinion. It was already late in the day and the couple feared that if they returned to Centre County they might not find anyone to marry them, besides missing the pleasure on which they had set their hearts of being married by this particular minister. After further consultation the suggestion was made that the minister return with them, and he agreed to do so. They climbed the third of the Seven Mountains which marks the exact boundary of the two counties, and having crossed the line at the top, the ceremony was performed by the wayside. The minister assured them that the ceremony, in that strange and solitary place and amid those sublime natural surroundings, was just as binding and sacred as if it had been performed in a cathedral. That it was so there is no question, though the parties needed his assurance of the fact. The same assurance may be given to those who imagine that union with Christ, of which marriage is a type, must necessarily be a matter of church ceremonial. Much sorrow and many mistakes might be avoided if less stress were placed on admission to church-membership, confirmation and the rite of baptism, and more on the personal consecration, which should precede all that, and which should take place in private. (11. Cor. 8: 5.)

A WOLF IN THE BOWERY.

SOME alarm was caused among parents on the East side of New York last week by the news that a real live wolf was at large in the city. It was a large powerful animal, which, with two others, had been in one of the Bowery shows, in the play of Red Riding Hood. When they were first put on the stage, the wolves were young and harmless, but as they grew older and stronger, the owner noticed that they were rough with the child, who acted with them. Fearing that they might hurt her, he substituted a large doll for the child, but the public could see no piquancy in a doll being worried by the wolves and the show no longer drew good audiences. The manager therefore decided to get rid of the animals, as their appetites were ravenous and their temper uncertain. He presented them to the Central Park Menagerie, but in conveying them there, one of the wolves broke loose and escaped. Every mother who heard of it was in terror about her children and it was not until two days afterward when she heard that the wolf had been found and secured that her fear was allayed. The alarm was natural and reasonable, but it is not always exercised when there is greater cause for it. If parents only realized that their children were exposed to the assaults of a more deadly enemy, who devours body and soul, they would show more concern about their safety than is common. (1. Peter 5: 8).

AN UNNATURAL CHOICE.

A PATHETIC story is related by the Atlanta Constitution. It states that an aged citizen, who has been all his life a hardworking mechanic fell sick some time ago and has not been able to work. He became involved in debt and being pressed for security if payment was impossible, he gave a chattel mortgage on an organ. The instrument had been purchased by his wife and their daughter, who were both fond of music and the latter a skilled performer. The man was induced to make the organ the subject of the mortgage by the fact that it was the most valuable article in the house. He expected to discharge the debt before the mortgage matured, but was unable to do so. When the creditor went to seize the organ, he was stoutly resisted by the mother and daughter, who proved their ownership. He then warned them that unless they yielded he would have to arrest the man. They told him that he might do as he liked, but he should not have the organ. Thereupon, he had the man arrested and imprisoned. To a friend, who visited him in jail, the prisoner sorrowfully declared that he suffered less from his imprisonment than he did from the thought that his wife and daughter cared less for him than they did for their music, that having to give up him or the organ, they had decided to give up him. It is not surprising that the man felt hurt for it showed how little they loved him. Crises sometimes come in the lives of professed followers of Christ, which similarly test the sincerity of their devotion to him. When they must give up some cherished sin, or some business advantage, or violate his commands they show by their decision whether, they are really his disciples. (Matt. 19: 29.)

THE BLIND MAN.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 9: 1-11 and 35-38. Golden Text,
John 9: 25.

AS Jesus passed by, he saw a man which was blind from his birth." Jesus had spoken of himself as "The Light of the World;" now light and darkness were to come in contact. The disciples, ever ready to speak, even in the presence of him, the power of whose words ought to have always commanded silence, lest one of them should be lost, spoke out the thoughts which were working within them. "Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" Oh, the unkind, condemnatory spirit of the natural mind of man; how unlovely and unloving is the flesh! The first thought of man on seeing distress was, whose fault is it? the first thought of Jesus, how can it be cured? Jesus answered, "Neither hath this man sinned nor his parents, but that the works of God should be made manifest in him." The disciple looked on what he was, the Saviour on what he could make him; and he continued: "We must work the works of him that sent me while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work. When I am in the world, I am the Light of the world." "We must work;" O how lovely the fellowship just when the disciples had shown a spirit so unlike his! Jesus always carried out in deed what he uttered in word. "When he had thus spoken, he spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay." Out of the dead, dark, earthly thing his creative power brought sight and life! It is so ever. Let Jesus come with the most unlikely things, the most unlikely circumstances, the most unlikely hearts, and all is changed. The blind man had nothing to do but to yield. Made doubly blind with the clay upon his sightless eyeballs, he had nevertheless a clear direction from him whose word was life and power, "Go to the pool of Siloam, and wash." If he reasoned, he would easily see that there was no power to give sight to such as he in the mere waters of Siloam; if he recognized the authority of the word of Jesus, he would not reason, but obey. This he did, and came seeing.

Faith Does not Ask How

God will work, by what process he will do this or that; faith takes him simply at his word, and sees a mightier logic in the fact that he who made the world must understand and rightly rule his own creation, than in all the reasonings of created creatures. The Jews could talk, and nothing came of it; Jesus, the Son of God, could do mighty works, and always to help the helpless.

The restoration of sight to this well-known blind man caused a great sensation; the neighbors began to talk about it: "Is not this he that sat and begged? Some said; this is he, others said, he is like him." The object of all this discussion, carried on apparently in his presence, gave his own testimony, "I am he." "How were thine eyes opened?" was the natural interrogation which followed. "A man that is called Jesus made clay, and anointed mine eyes, and said unto me, go to the pool of Siloam, and wash: and I went, and washed, and I received sight." "Where is he?" they inquired, "I know not," was the rejoinder. It was entirely outside the bounds of their experiences; the fact was patent; a man born blind, whom they all knew well, had received power to see; but there was something wrong about it in their eyes. The chief priests had nothing to do with it, the elders had nothing to do with it, nor yet the physicians. It was against all their ideas that such things should be done outside the medical and ecclesiastical professions; where would all this end?

It was Preposterous; who gave this man Jesus of Nazareth his diploma to act as a physician? Who gave him authority to teach and gain such an influence over the people? This thing must be stopped. So said man; so says man to this day. Nothing so angers the natural heart as to be forced to bow before an unseen God, and to acknowledge his working; while the failure of man and especially of men in honor is made apparent.

While the poor man was blind, no one troubled about him; a little alms, more or less reluctantly given, and he went out of sight and out of mind: his blindness was a matter of no consequence to any other than his parents, himself, and the Lord Jesus. But the busy neighbors, now that he could see, thought it necessary to bring him before the Pharisees that they might judge of the propriety of the cure, and they at once laid their fingers on a flaw: it was the Sabbath day when Jesus made the clay and anointed the blind man's eyes; even if it was right for him to be cured at all, he was cured on the wrong day. So after putting the blind man again through a catechism, and receiving the same answers as the neighbors, they pronounced their opinion, "This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the Sabbath day." Others, who were less prejudiced, argued, "How can a man who is a sinner do such miracles?" And, as so frequently was the case, "there was a division among them." But they could not let the matter rest; they must account for it some way, just as every real conversion of a man from sin to holiness, from selfishness to unselfishness and Christlikeness, from things of time to those of eternity, is a fact which unconverted men have to explain some way; and just as every healing by the Lord in answer to prayer, where medical science has failed, is a phenomenon which must be accounted for by the intervention of God, so was it with the case of the blind man. These unbelievers, who were unwilling to give God credit for what was done, took for granted the man was an impostor, just as many now-a-days will not believe that one who is now a Christ-like and unselfish, heavenly-minded man was once as fleshly and carnal and selfish as those around him; and these Pharisees would not believe the blind man's story until they called his parents, who fully corroborated his statement that he was born blind, but left him to state the circumstances of his restoration, fearing that if they acknowledged Jesus to be Christ they would "be put out of the synagogue," and they would rather have Jesus misjudged even when he had healed their son than suffer the reproach themselves of being excommunicated!

Making no way with the parents, they sought to destroy the influence of Jesus with the poor blind man, and said: "Give God the praise, we know that this man is a sinner." "Whether he be a sinner or no, I know not," said the man,

"One thing I Know, that whereas I was blind, now I see." Nothing could rob him of this fact. From darkness he had been brought to light, no one could persuade him that he did not see, the great fact was a new life to him, and he knew the author of the change; it was not for him to judge or reason, but to give thanks. There was strong common sense in his position but there was more: there was true loyalty to Jesus. But even now the enemies of the Lord were not silenced; they questioned the man once again, and he retaliated: "I have told you already, and ye did not hear; wherefore would ye hear it again? will ye also be his disciples?" It might have seemed to him utterly impossible that they should seek to know so much about Jesus without having the intention to become his followers. His followers or his enemies they must be, for they were not indifferent. Then they reviled him, saying, as their hardest accusation, "Thou art his disciple, but we are Moses' disciples." We know that God spake unto Moses; but as for this man, we know not whence he is." It was the unreal who were dealing with the real. The man was in a new world, he had come into possession of a new sense, of which he began to see marvellous possibilities. "Why, herein is the marvel, that ye know not whence he is," that ye who have possessed sight have never used it to discover all that is to be known about Jesus, "and yet he," this marvellous man about whom you are so callous, opened "mine eyes! We know that God heareth not sinners, but if any man be a worshipper of God, and doeth his will, him he heareth. Since the world began it was never heard that any one opened the eyes of a man born blind. If this man were not from God, he could do nothing." The fact speaks for itself, God has heard him, he does do things such as no other has done.

The man had to pay dear for his honesty, "they cast him out" of the synagogue, as a heathen unfit to worship with the Jews. It is a law of the true divine life; "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus

Must Suffer Persecution."

Now, as of old, he that is born after the flesh persecutes him that is born after the Spirit; the friend of the world is always the enemy of God. Whenever a child of God is not persecuted in some way or other, he is in danger. "Woe unto you when all men speak well of you, for so did their fathers to the false prophets." Every man who is really converted has to face the question whether he will follow Jesus at a cost, or whether he will follow the ordinary run of dead alive Christians who are a drag upon the Church of Christ and no glory to God. It is just when we have accepted the vocation of denying ourselves and taking up our cross daily and following Jesus that he reveals himself more fully to us. It was when the once blind man was cast out of the synagogue that "Jesus found him." He had been seeking him. O the love and care of the good Shepherd. He asked him, "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" "Who is he, Lord, that I may believe on him." (R.V.) "Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee." This man was prepared for a revelation of Jesus. In the first place, he obeyed unquestioningly when Jesus had anointed him with the clay, and sent him to Siloam. Then he had acted in all sincerity of heart in his answers to the neighbors and the Pharisees, without any double motive, and at the cost of being excommunicated, even before he was an intelligent disciple of Christ. Nothing else and nobody else filled the place in his heart and life which Jesus sought for, and immediately when he revealed himself, the man "worshipped him."

LESSON POINTS,

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

I MUST work while it is day. Yes, Jesus was a busy man. He had no time for the foibles and follies of this world. He must be about his Father's business. He came to seek and to save the lost and when he ascended to heaven he commissioned us to carry on the good work. Are we proving faithful to our Lord and Master or do we permit the trifles of life to engross our attention? Do we find time to match colors but none for prayer? Time to read foolish novels, but none for the Bible? Time for picnics, time for balls, time for theatres, time for idle gossip, time for everything except to do the work of God? Are we money blind and money mad, devoting ourselves to money making? Purchasing conveniences and comforts for these poor mortal bodies, utterly neglecting our never-dying souls? Discarding the precious gem and jealously guarding the casket? O, let us stop right here, and ask divine pardon for past omissions, reconsecrate ourselves and diligently apply our time and our attention to the service of our blessed Immanuel.

Mr. Moody tells us that when in London, he heard a man speaking with wonderful power and earnestness. His curiosity being excited he inquired "Who is that man?" "Why that is Dr. —, he is blind." At the close of the meeting he sought an interview and then learned that he had been stricken blind when very young. His mother took him to a doctor and inquired about his sight. "You must give up all hope," said the doctor gravely. "Your boy is blind, and will be so forever." "What! Do you think my boy will never see," asked his mother. "Never again." The mother took her boy to her bosom and cried, "Oh, my boy! who will take care of you when I am gone? Whom can you look to?" Forgetting the faithfulness of that God she had taught him to love. He became a servant of the Lord and was permitted to print the Bible in twelve different languages, printed in raised letters, similar to those recently published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, so that all the blind people could read the Scriptures themselves. He thus secured a congregation of three millions of people, and it seemed to Mr. Moody that that blind man was the happiest man in all London. He was naturally blind, but he had eyes to his soul and could see a bright eternity in the future. We naturally pity those who have not their natural sight, but how much more will we pity ourselves in the day of judgment that we who had eyes to see, were so wilfully blind as to lose sight of heaven while so keenly awake to our earthly interests.

Shall we whose souls are lighted
With wisdom from on high—
Shall we to men benighted,
The Lamp of Life deny?
Salvation! Oh, Salvation!
The joyful sound proclaim,
Till earth's remotest nation,
Has heard Messiah's name.

Is not this he that sat and begged. Yes, indeed, it is the very same man, but what a wonderful transformation has been wrought by Jesus! Yesterday a beggar—to-day the child of a king. Yesterday, poor, miserable, helpless—today exulting in Jesus, his strength and his salvation. Yesterday, blind, sitting in darkness—to-day with open eyes walking in the light. Oh! what a wonderful Saviour Jesus my King! Since last you saw this man he has made the acquaintance of the Prince of Peace, and has opened his heart to receive his Saviour. And when once Jesus enters the human heart, drunkenness and lust, sin and misery, speedily give place to thrift and purity, happiness and peace. His presence in the household, like the Ark of the Covenant in the home of Obed-Edom, brings peace and plenty. Listen to this testimony:

"The other day there was a nice job of work to be done in our shop, requiring very careful management. I heard the boss call out, 'Give that job to Lew, he is the best hand in the shop.' I finished the job, and when I went home that night, I told my wife about it. 'Why Lawrie' said she, 'the boss used to call you the worst hand in the shop. You've lost your bad name, haven't you since you joined the church?'"

"That's a fact, wife," says I, "but that isn't all I've lost since then. I used to have poverty and wretchedness, and I've lost them. I used to have an old ragged coat, and a shocking bad hat, and some India rubber boots, that let the water out at the toe as fast as they took it in at the heel. I've lost them. I used to have a red face, and a trembling hand, and a pair of shaky legs, that gave me an awkward tumble every now and then. I've lost them. I used to have a bad habit of cursing and swearing, and I've lost that. I used to have an aching head sometimes, and a heavy heart and worse than all the rest—a guilty conscience; but now, thank God—I've lost them all!"

"And then I told my wife what she had lost."

"Mary," said I, "you used to have an old ragged gown, but you've lost that. And you used to have trouble and sorrow and a poor, wretched home, and plenty of heartaches, for you had a miserable drunkard for a husband and you've lost all of them. O, Mary, let us thank the Lord for all that you and I have lost since I signed the pledge and gave my poor wayward heart to God."

Hallelujah! Jesus does save!

NEVILLE'S BLINDNESS.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Sept. 13. "One Thing I Know, that, Whereas I Was Blind, Now I See." John 9:25.

DARKNESS was closing in earlier than usual one summer evening. It had not been very light anywhere that day owing to the dark and dense clouds behind which the sun was hidden. It had been a dull day, especially in those poor streets where high tenement houses reared their heads skyward and shut out the rays of the sun except at noon, when it was over head.

In the rear room on the highest floor of one of those high houses a man of some twenty-six years was at work. His high table or bench was close to the one window in the room, for his was the kind of work which needed all the light he could get. He was bending over a block of light yellow wood and looking through a powerful magnifying glass at the lines his tools were tracing on its surface. He worked rapidly as a man does who is working against time. Now and then he would look up and rub his eyes as if they ached. Presently he rose with a sigh and lighted a small oil lamp which he placed near his work. But there was something wrong with it. He trimmed the wick and polished the chimney and tried again, but he could not see. "I wonder what is the matter?" he said; "I suppose I must have stuck to the work too long." He threw himself on the bed in one corner of the room, previously extinguishing the lamp, with the thoughtfulness of a man to whom every cent was precious. After a short troubled sleep he rose and re-lighted the lamp and set to work again. But after an hour's steady application he was obliged to desist and went back to bed, where he slept soundly.

As he lay there, traces of refinement came out in his face, which were not visible when he was awake. The man looked younger by five years. If his portrait could have been taken then, his mother could have recognized it, as she scarcely would have done the waking face with its lines of care and sorrow. This was the face of Gilbert Neville, the brilliant young artist whom his sisters almost doted, whom scores of friends loved and of whose success such great things were prophesied. An hour ago, while he was bending over his work, he was George North, the poor, anxious, haggard, shabby wood-engraver, whom none of them would know. Such changes had been made in the four years which had elapsed since he left home, after a quarrel with his father, declaring that he would never return. Dissipation and trouble had made havoc of a face in a short time as a tornado changes the face of a country.

It was several hours later when the sleeper awoke and stretched his tired limbs. He groped his way to his bench and lighted his lamp. He could just see a faint glimmer of light from it and no more. A church clock was striking and he counted its strokes. Eight o'clock! Why it must be broad daylight! What was the matter? He staggered back into his chair with a deep groan as the awful truth entered his mind. He was blind!

Neville could not see the faces of the doctors in the hospital to which a fellow-lodger led him for treatment, or, among the young students in the room with the physician, he would have recognized an old friend. "I am sure I know that man," said the student to one of his companions, "yet I cannot place him." He looked at the book in which the patient's name was entered, but "George North" was a name unfamiliar to him. Late that night, however, his memory supplied the link and Neville's identity flashed upon him. By the next mail a letter went to Neville's home reporting the facts.

"We have come to thank you for sending to us," said a dignified gentleman, who with his wife called on the student a few days later. "We have been to the hospital to see our son, but they will not admit us at this hour. We shall see him to-morrow."

"Do tell us about him?" said the lady. "I cannot wait till morning. You do not know how we have grieved about him. There was a misunderstanding, you know. Gilbert was always high spirited and he thought his father was harsh. He was not that, he was only anxious to save him from ruin. Gilbert was being led away. He could not understand that his father loved him when he was trying to restrain him. Oh, it was a dreadful mistake; it has made us all so sad."

"Take him home," was the physician's advice, when the next day the father and mother consulted him in the hospital. "Perhaps rest and quiet may do something for him. At present, we can do nothing. It is quite hopeless so far as medical skill is concerned. After a time an operation might be performed, but it would do him no good now."

They took him home, unresisting, though he had vowed he would never enter those doors again. But who could resist the mother's tenderness and the father's manly sympathy! No allusion was made to the past, but Gilbert knew that he was forgiven.

"This is a new note for you to sing," said one of Gilbert's old associates to whom he had been speaking in praise of his father's kindness and of the attention all the family lavished upon him. "You used to resent the old man's arbitrary ways. I suppose you find it necessary to be meek now your blindness has made you dependent on them."

"No, it is not that," Gilbert answered. "I think I might do pretty much as I used to do, without reproof now. They are so sorry for me, they would indulge me in any way. But I seem to have gained mental eyesight when my physical eyes were blinded. I see more than I did before. It was then that I was really blind, or I should have seen that my father could not have given a better proof of his love than in acting as he did. And it was so noble of him to come to me in my trouble and take me back without a word of reproach and without any expression of contrition from me. I tell you he is a good man and I should be a brute to grieve him."

"It is a good thing you take it that way, but you must be having an awfully dull life. I hope you will get cured and come among us again and see some life. Is there any chance, do you think?"

"I don't know; I hope so. But I should never see life, in your sense of the word, if I were cured to-morrow. That is another thing my eyes have been opened to. There is nothing but trouble comes of that kind of life. I wonder I did not see it so before, but I see it now. It is the most unmitigated folly."

"Why you are quite changed; next thing we shall hear I suppose, will be your turning religious and joining the church."

"Perhaps so. I might do worse. There's more real happiness in that way of life than the other. I am sure of that. I have had time to think since I have been in the dark, and I see things in a clearer light."

"Well, old man, you surprise me, but I expect when you can use your eyes again you will see things as you used to."

"Never. I see them in their true light now. I shall never go back to the old life whatever happens." And he kept his word although he recovered his sight and was once more able to see the light of the sun.

A JEWISH MISSIONARY DEAD.

MR. N. CORAL, the Domestic Superintendent of the Enquirers' Home, and Spanish Scripture-reader in Jerusalem, is dead. Mr. Coral has been in the employ of the Society for thirty years, and during that period has rendered valuable service by the consistent character of his Christian life, and the faithfulness with which he preached Christ and him crucified to his brethren of the House of Israel. Mr. Coral belonged to one of the rabbinical families in Jerusalem, and it often required no small courage and Christian fortitude for him to preach the Gospel among those who had known him from boyhood. Happily his is not the only instance in the annals of the Society in which a spirit of love, and gentleness, and patience, with purity of life, have overcome prejudice and enabled converts to proclaim the truth of Christ even in their own country. His end was peace. The Rev. A. H. Kelk, writes:—"He simply fell asleep. His testimony was clear and decided. When I was talking to him, a few hours before his death, he said, 'Jesus is my only Saviour. I rest simply on him,' and he repeated again, 'Jesus is my only Saviour.'"

SAVED FROM A BABY TOWER.

An intelligent Chinawoman was recently pointed out by Mrs. Adams, a missionary of Kin-hwa as having had a remarkable experience in childhood. When seasons of poverty and famine occur in China, as they frequently do, infanticide is common. The infant is killed at birth, and formerly, so callous were the feelings of the parents, that they would fling the bodies on the roadside where they were devoured by dogs and birds of prey. To prevent such hideous sights as this practice caused, "baby-towers" were erected. They were merely four walls roofed over, enclosing a deep pit or well. There was a hole in one of the walls and Chinese parents would take the body of their child after killing it and thrust it through the hole, when it would fall into the pit. When the woman referred to above was a child of four years of age, her mother was in abject poverty. One day, passing the baby-tower, on a sudden impulse she seized her child and thrust her alive through the hole into the horrible pit. The child was not killed by the fall and she raised a pitiful cry which she continued at intervals for two days. On the second day a woman passing the baby-tower, heard the child wailing and besought the authorities of the village to have it taken out. They treated the matter with unconcern, telling her that the child would soon die from the effluvia of the many dead bodies in the pit, that it would probably be dead before any one could go down, and moreover, that no one would be willing to venture into such a dreadful place. The woman could not be so satisfied. She returned to the pit and listened. The poor girl was still wailing pitifully. Then the brave woman borrowed a ladder to make the descent herself. She bound some sweet scented leaves over her mouth and nostrils, and crawling through the hole dragged the ladder through after her. Then descending into the pit, she took up the child and ascended the ladder again. She adopted her and brought her up as her own child. A very good and dutiful daughter she was too, and a great help to her foster-mother.

WORDS OF THE WISE.

What Prayer Should Be.*

FIX it firmly in your minds that you have the privilege of laying before God your wishes about the more important concerns of your lives. It cannot be superfluous, in these times, to strengthen ourselves in this belief. Those who would like to banish everything belonging to religion from the minds of men, by allowing no room for the exercise of it in daily life, do not fail to represent such a prayer as an offence against the Most High. It is irreverent, they say, to express a wish arising out of the narrowness of our intellect and heart, about something which his decree has long ago settled; it is an ill-timed curiosity to say, I wish it might be so and so, when we shall presently learn how he has willed it. Do not be perplexed by such words. Christ did it, therefore we, too, may do it. It is one of the privileges that belong to our position as children of God. That would be a slavish family in which the children were not at liberty to express their wishes in the presence of their wiser father. And is anyone able all at once to suppress his desires? If we cannot do so, let us always speak them out when our heart is moved to do so; for even if we do shut them up within us, they are not hidden from him. Do not listen to those who tell you that, before you approach God, you must have your mind composed and your heart at peace; that it is unseemly to appear before him in this agitated state, while the dread of pain and disappointment, the clinging to some good thing which you are on the point of losing, still tosses your heart to and fro, and leaves no room for submission to the holy will of God. If you waited until submission had won the victory, you would feel neither the need nor the inclination for such a prayer, and the privilege of offering it would be useless to you. If the feelings that stir your heart are sinful emotions; if these emotions are kindled by the fire of passion; then the thought of God and prayer to him can have no place beside them. But that is disquietude, so altogether natural to man as God has made him, which agitates us at the touch of loss and misfortune, or when threatened by a check laid on our activities, or with separation from those we love—such disquietude should not keep us back from God; for only thus will our hearts not condemn us, and we shall have confidence toward God. (1. John 3: 21.) Christ himself, as you see here, used no other means to allay this so unusual agitation in his holy soul.

Disappointed Admirers.

WHAT is expressed by the jubilation of that multitude at the entry of Christ but the hope that he would redeem Israel? They believed that the time was come, or would presently be, when he would come forward publicly, and announce himself with authoritative credentials, as God's ambassador; everything would bend before him, and they, reminding him at the same time of the way in which they had even now professed their faith in him, would then renew their profession, and would not only obtain from him deliverance from their troubles, but would also share in all the glory of his kingdom. But now they saw Christ himself in trouble; and if they meant to be loyal to him, they must have felt called on, instead of merely receiving help and deliverance from him, to help him, as it were, in the first place, by making their voices heard in opposition to the demand of the angry crowd. You see here, my friends, how it is not unfrequently with many people. Some prospective undertaking of an individual or of a community appears to us in the highest degree desirable and profitable, perhaps even necessary, to prepare the way for, and to support what most concerns ourselves. We long for the moment when they will begin their operations, we receive the first indications of it with rejoicing and exultation, we set ourselves in readiness to apply the hoped-for help to our own houses, and then we join in the cause itself with all our might. But if, meanwhile, the enterprise itself come into danger; if those in whom we hoped meet with difficulties and opposition, and seem to be themselves in need of help; then we become doubtful, and think that in those who are themselves in need of our help there cannot surely be the power that we supposed to help us; we think we must have been mistaken, and we are quite rejoiced that we have been warned at the right time and have discovered our mistake. But is not this a very strange way of thinking, opposed to universal experience and to the first principles of all human action? Is there any power in human affairs except by the union of human faculties? Is there any kind of help that should not be mutual? Can any one receive help in any way, whether through friendship or through family connections, or by the public authority, if he has not himself without intermission upheld those very powers?

Uncongenial Marriages.

Alas, how often among Christians does marriage assume, even from this earthly point of view, a truly dreadful aspect! How often we see the two who should be one giving way to anger against each other, separated by dissension and strife, and sometimes so embittered against each other that, instead of trying to avoid quarrels, they wilfully seek occasions for them. In such cases it need not be said that two have not become one. Again, how often has the married state a troubled aspect, when, for want of any glad assurance of being one in heart, both parties keep watchful guard over themselves, seeking by the most obliging and compliant manner and behavior, and by self-denying sacrifice, to avoid all occasions for dispute, and trying by the most tender consideration to make up, if possible, for the absence of true love. And here also, even if only one of the parties is obliged to exercise this self-constraint, while the other is in the right position, it is easy to see that the two have not become one—that there is no true union, but a carefully maintained contract. Once more, how often has marriage a repulsive aspect, when married people live, it is true, in peace and harmony, but only because in course of time they have become accustomed to each other, and because, while they make as little demand as possible on each other, both find real satisfaction in other relations of life and in other companionships! That in a connection so indifferent and dead the two are not one flesh is certain, for that implies a living union; and it is equally certain that in this case there has been no heart impulse constraining to leave father and mother and cleave to husband or wife, and that therefore even then the earthly side of a Christian marriage is wanting. But why should I go on to multiply these illustrations? Let me rather say in a word that in so far as each has separate joys and sorrows (even supposing that they have much more regard to the interests of each other than to their own); in so far as the wife needs to remind herself to be submissive, and the husband remind himself to give honor to the weaker vessel; however faithfully they may obey these admonitions of conscience; and in short, wherever there are opposing wishes and aims to be adjusted, fully and generously as those mental concessions may be carried out: just so far as these conditions exist, the word of the apostle is not yet fulfilled,—the love that makes truth one has never been enthroned there.

WHO IS TO BLAME?

WHEN two rail-trains collide, or steamships strike in a fog, or a boiler explodes, we all go to work to find out who is to blame. In our avidity to find an author of recklessness we sometimes pitch on the wrong man. We shall yet have to admit, in our discussion of accidents, that sometimes no one is to blame. God may decide that three hundred souls shall go up from the deck of a foundering steamer, and neither captain nor sailor on the lookout be culpable. When the time comes for such a tumultuous vanishing from life, no accuracy of log-book and chronometer can hinder. Because a great many may perish, do not let us be indiscriminate in our assault of ship captains and railroad conductors. While vigilant in bringing to justice those who trifle with human life on land or sea, let us recognize the fact that sometimes no one is responsible. And yet when the stories of culpable carelessness or neglect are put before the world let the cases be thoroughly investigated, and the offenders brought to justice, and we shall have fewer heart-rending scenes to sicken the world.

THE WANDERER WELCOMED.

IF a man does not get to heaven it is because he will not go there. No difference the color, no difference the history, no difference the antecedents, no difference the surroundings, no difference the sin. When the white horses of Christ's victory are brought out to celebrate the eternal triumph you may ride one of them, and as God is greater than all, his joy is greater, and when a soul comes back there is in his heart the surging of an infinite ocean of gladness, and to express that gladness it takes all the rivers of pleasure, and all the thrones of pomp, and all the ages of eternity. It is a joy deeper than all depth, and higher than all height, and wider than all width, and vaster than all immensity. It overtops, it undergirds, it outweighs all the united splendor and joy of the universe. Who can tell what God's joy is?

You remember reading the story of a King, who on some great day of festivity scattered silver and gold among the people, and sent valuable presents to his courtiers; but when a soul comes back, God is so glad that to express his joy he flings out new worlds into space, and kindles up new suns, and rolls among the white-robed anthems of the redeemed a greater hallelujah, while with a voice that reverberates among the mountains of frankincense and is echoed back from the everlasting gates, he cries: "This, my son, was dead, and he is alive again." At the opening of the Exposition in New Orleans, I saw a Mexican flutist, and he played the solo, and then afterward the eight or ten bands of music, accompanied by the great organ, came in; but the sound of that one flute as compared with all the orchestra was greater than all the combined joy of the universe when compared with the resounding heart of Almighty God.

OUTSIDERS.

WE need as churches to get into sympathy with the great outside world, and let them know that none are so broken-hearted or hardly bested that they will not be welcomed. "No!" says some fastidious Christian, "I don't like to be crowded in church. Don't put any one in my pew." My brother, what will you do in heaven? When a great multitude that no man can number assembles they will put fifty in your pew. What are the select few now assembled in the Christian churches compared to mightier millions outside of them, eight hundred thousand in Brooklyn, but less than one hundred thousand in the churches. Many of the churches are like a hospital that should advertise that its patients must have nothing worse than toothache or "run-arounds," but no broken heads, no crushed ankles, no fractured thighs. Give us for treatment moderate sinners, velvet-coated sinners and sinners with a gloss on. It is as though a man had a farm of three thousand acres and put all his work on one acre. He may raise never so large ears of corn, never so big heads of wheat, he would remain poor. The church of God has bestowed its chief care on one acre, and has raised splendid men and women in that small inclosure; but the field is the world. That means North and South America, Europe, Asia and Africa and all the islands of the sea. It is as though after a great battle there were left 50,000 wounded and dying on the field, and three surgeons gave all their time to three patients under their charge. The Major-General comes in and says to the doctors: "Come out here and look at the nearly 50,000 dying for lack of surgical attendance." "No," say the three doctors, standing there fanning their patients, "we have three important cases here and we are attending to them, and when we are not positively busy with their wounds, it takes all our time to keep the flies off." In this awful battle of sin and sorrow where millions have fallen on millions, do not let us spend all our time in taking care of a few people, and when the command comes: "Go into the world," say practically, "No, I cannot go, I have here a few choice cases, and I am busy keeping off the flies!" There are multitudes to-day who have never had any Christian worker look them in the eye, and with earnestness in the accentuation, say: "Come!" or they would long ago have been in the kingdom.

BORROWING MONEY.

THERE is nothing wrong about borrowing money. There is hardly a man but has sometimes borrowed money. Vast estates have been built on a borrowed dollar. But there are two kinds of borrowed money. Money borrowed for the purpose of starting or keeping up legitimate enterprise and expense, and money borrowed to get that which you can do without. The first is right, the other is wrong. If you have money enough of your own to buy a coat, however plain, and then you borrow money for a dandy's outfit, you have taken the first revolution of the wheel down grade. Borrow for the necessities; that may be well. Borrow for the luxuries; that tips your prospects over in the wrong direction.

The Bible distinctly says the borrower is the servant of the lender. It is a bad state of things when you have to go down some other street to escape meeting some one whom you owe. If young men knew what is the despotism of being in debt, more of them would keep out of it. What did debt do for Lord Bacon, with a mind towering above the centuries? It induced him to take bribes and convict himself as a criminal before all ages. What did debt do for Walter Scott? Broken-hearted at Abbotsford. Kept him writing until his hand gave out in paralysis to keep the sheriff away from his pictures and statuary. Better for him if he had minded the maxim which he had chiselled over the fireplace at Abbotsford, "Waste not, want not." The trouble is, people do not understand the ethics of going in debt, and that if you purchase goods with no expectation of paying for them, or go into debt which you cannot meet, you steal just so much money. If I go into a grocer's store, and I buy sugars and coffees and meats, with no capacity to pay for them and no intention of paying for them, I am more dishonest than if I go into the store, and when the grocer's face is turned the other way I fill my pockets with the articles of merchandise and carry off a ham. In the one case I take the merchant's time, and I take the time of his messenger to transfer the goods to my house, while in the other case I take none of the time of the merchant, and I wait upon myself, and I transfer the goods without any trouble to him. In other words a sneak thief is not as bad as a man who contracts for debts he never expects to pay.

REIGN OF LAW.

THERE is a law which controls even those things that seem haphazard. I have been told by those who have observed that it is possible to calculate just how many letters will be sent to the dead letter office every year through misdirection; that it is possible to calculate just how many letters will be detained for lack of postage stamps through the forgetfulness of the senders, and that it is possible to tell just how many people will fall in the streets by slipping on an orange peel. In other words, there are no accidents. The most insignificant event you ever heard of is the link between two eternities—the eternity of the past and the eternity of the future.

THE UNIVERSAL PILL.

IT seems that in olden time, as well as now, there were naughty people abroad. In seventeen hundred and eighty-eight, Dominie Rubel, of Flatbush, was deposed from the ministry for various irregularities, and went to doctoring the body instead of the soul, and advertised, "It has pleased Almighty God to give me wisdom to find out the universal pill that will cure most diseases."

We are afraid of the descendants of Dominie Rubel, who are attempting with some universal pill to correct the world's disorders. Look out for the quacks in all departments, and the country grocery which has on its shelves patent medicines for the extirpation of all complaints from run-around to catalepsy. A potion that proposes at the same time to rejuvenate liver, spleen, brain, nerves, and cuticle, is a lie on the face of it. A gunner trying to shoot in ten directions at once will hit none of the targets. We believe in specialists. The anatomy of the human ear is enough to employ a man's genius for a lifetime, likewise the eye. He who professes to know everything knows nothing. When you get sick you had better call in a doctor who does not make extravagant pretensions. Beware of the universal pill.

Sometimes a good and talented man will go off on a tangent. He has found out something in the educational, mechanical, or scientific world that will renovate and reconstruct everything. It will make the earth over again. He is crazy to have everybody take it. "Down with this pill," he says, "it is a corrective for everything." But the prescriptions are apt to get mixed.

BRIEF NOTES.

The International Sunday School Executive at its recent meeting at Chautauqua adopted plans for a Sunday School building to be erected at the World's Fair.

Col. Elliot F. Shepard, of New York, has just given to the First Church of Jamestown, N. Y., his childhood's home as a parsonage. The property is valued at $20,000.

Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell P. Johnston, formerly of the Margaret Strachan Home in New York are now assisting Rev. John Dooly of Albany, N. Y., in the tent work of the City Tract and Missionary Society.

The Bible has recently been translated into Sheetswa, a language spoken by 250,000 people in South-Eastern Africa. The translator is a colored man formerly a slave owned by a brother of Jefferson Davis.

Evangelists Bliss and Clark have been holding very successful meetings at Truro, Ont., Canada. The Halifax Herald says that they are very largely attended and much good is being done. After leaving Truro the Evangelists have promised to go to Picton, New Glasgow, and other towns.

Dr. Geo. F. Pentecost has been doing excellent work at Simla, India. During the summer all the high government officials are in the city and many of them attended the meetings. On one occasion the Viceroy of India and Lady Lansdowne were among the Doctor's hearers. The city hall was freely placed at the evangelist's disposal every evening for a month.

The Board of Managers of the American Bible Society at the recent stated meeting made grants of Bibles, Testaments and Scripture Portions, to the value of about $1,555, for distribution and sale in the United States, in South America and in Africa. The issues from the Bible House in the month of July were 78,372 copies; issues since April 1st, 320,116 copies.

The centennial anniversary of the First M. E. Church of New Rochelle, N. Y., was celebrated on August 23. Methodism was introduced into the town in 1771 by Joseph Pilmoor and Robert Williams, and twenty years later the church was incorporated. It was the third in New York State. The congregation propose to further celebrate the centennial year by building a new church.

Rev. Sam W. Small has arranged to commence permanent work in Atlanta, Ga. His hope is to secure the erection of a People's Tabernacle for distinctively Gospel work similar to that conducted in London by Rev. Hugh Price Hughes. His opening sermons will be in Prohibition Hall in East Alabama St. next Sunday and he will continue to preach there until funds for the erection of the Tabernacle can be secured.

The American Sabbath Union has now thoroughly organized its work. Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts has resigned the office of Field Secretary and the three districts into which the country is now divided are respectively placed under the charge of Rev. J. H. Knowles, D. D., and Rev. Wm. J. R. Taylor, D. D., who have the East; Rev. James P. Mills of Chicago who has supervision of eighteen Central States; and Rev. Edward Thompson, D. D., of San Francisco, who has charge of the work in the West.

The Southern Presbyterian Church is sending out many missionaries this fall to labor in the foreign field. On Aug. 26, Rev. Rockwell Smith and Rev. D. G. Armstrong, sailed from New York for Brazil. On Sept. 2, a party sails for China, consisting of Rev. H. C. Dubose, Rev. J. M. Sykes, Rev. B. C. Patterson, Rev. R. A. Hayden, Rev. George Hudson and Misses Annie R. Houston and Ella G. Davidson. For the work in Japan the following are preparing to sail: Rev. and Mrs. H. T. Graham of Winchester, Va. and Rev. and Mrs. W. C. Buchanan of Richmond, Va.

Cable reports of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's condition last week were somewhat discouraging. Despite the best medical skill and the tenderest nursing he makes very slow progress toward recovery and seems, indeed, to be growing weaker. Two prayer meetings are held in the Tabernacle every day to pray for his restoration to health and the most kindly solicitude is manifested about him by all classes, from the Prince of Wales and the Archbishop of Canterbury, who have repeatedly sent to inquire after him down to the humblest people. Mrs. Spurgeon writes that her husband "is very desirous that friend everywhere should know that he is full of gratitude for their prevailing prayers and loving sympathy and that from his sick-room he presents heartfelt petitions that rich blessing may be bestowed upon all of them."

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

A Great Battle in Chili—Emin Pasha at Wadelai—Gen. Edmunds' Successor—The Building Disaster—The Late Mrs. Polk.

ANOTHER series of successful experiments in conquering the stubborn clouds and compelling rain to refresh the parched earth, has just been reported from Midland, Tex., where General Dyrenforth's government expedition is at work. Texans seem to be now convinced that these experiments are a practical success. Nine showers and one very heavy rain in three weeks are the net result thus far, in a section where there has been practically no rain for three years. The grass is springing up beautifully, the ranchmen are delighted and so are the farmers. On the night of the 25th of August the air was perfectly dry and the cattle-men predicted a week's drought. Gen. Dyrenforth sent up five dynamite balloons and exploded them in succession. Then he exploded rackerock powder and dynamite, in packages of from ten to twenty pounds. The bombardment lasted several hours, and five hours later there was a heavy thunderstorm and a perfect deluge of rain. It lasted several hours, not ceasing till sunrise next day. At 8 a. m. more dynamite was exploded and down came another pour of rain. Every time it stopped, a fresh explosion of dynamite would start a torrent afresh from the heavens. When there was apparently no more rain to be shaken out of the clouds the cannonading ceased. The next experiments will be conducted at El Paso.

Senator Edmunds' Successor.

GOVERNOR PAGE, of Vermont, has officially notified Hon. Redfield Proctor, Secretary of War, that he has decided to appoint him to fill the unexpired vacancy in the United States Senate, caused by the death of Mr. Edmunds. This news has naturally turned attention at Washington to the question of a successor to Secretary Proctor. There are many who believe that Judge Veazey, of the Interstate-Commerce Commission, and Governor Cheney of New Hampshire, are the two candidates who will be most favorably considered. Judge Veazey is the ex-Commander of the Grand Army and is exceedingly popular. Governor Cheney is a strong representative of New England interests, and should these be considered, he will very likely be taken up seriously. Gen. Byron McCutcheon of Michigan, and ex-Senator Gideon C. Moody of South Dakota, are also mentioned prominently as among the possibilities.

SECTY PROCTOR.

Emin Pasha in his Old Capital.
News has reached Europe of the arrival of Emin Pasha at his old capital of Wadelai, the seat of government in the African province he wrested from barbarism several years ago and from which he was conducted by Stanley under very perilous circumstances. For eleven years, Emin ruled his province as the appointee of General Gordon, the hero of Khartoum; but now that he has returned, he is the representative of Germany and not an independent ruler. He has entirely recovered from the effects of his unfortunate fall from a window at Bagomayo. His arrival and settlement there gives Germany a very marked advantage in the race for African conquest and will greatly facilitate the operations of General Wissmann, or any other commander who may be sent out to that part of the "Dark Continent." Germany will now have a vast extent of territory in Eastern Africa, extending from Lake Nyassa to the Zanzibar Coast and thence to the east of Victoria Nyanza and Lake Albert and north to Khartoum. Emin had with him in his journey to the Equatorial Province five hundred native porters, six hundred Soudanese troops, five German officers, and his beautiful daughter, who was born in the province.

The Death of Mrs. Polk.

ONE of the most popular women of her time, and one who most gracefully filled the trying position of mistress of the white House, was Mrs. Polk. She died at Nashville a few days ago. The daughter of a distinguished Southern family and married at nineteen, she passed the best part of her life in that activity which was the result of her husband's public career. In 1844, when her husband was elected President, Mrs. Polk made the White House very attractive by her dignity, her fine conversational powers and her graciousness as a hostess. Forty-two years of her life have been spent in widowhood and retirement in her home at Nashville, in which city her childhood and early married life were also passed. She was 87 years of age. A portrait of Mrs. Polk is given above.

MRS. POLK.

Another Battle in Chili.

AN engagement, which does not seem to have been decisive, took place between the forces of President Balmaceda and those of the Chilean insurgents near Valparaiso, lately. The Congress troops landed 10,000 men at the bay of Quinteros north of Valparaiso, and, accompanied along the coast by six men-of-war and eight armed transports, besides all the boats of their fleet, endeavored to surprise the city by a rear attack. A government force of 5,000 men was detached from Valparaiso and prevented the fleet from crossing the mouth of the Aconagua River, while 15,000 more troops were moved by rail to protect Valparaiso. A fight followed with heavy firing on both sides, by land and water. Although Balmaceda's force was nearly double that of the insurgents, the latter kept the field for seventy-two hours, expecting reinforcements. Finally the insurgents were hemmed in by two Balmacedist armies and compelled to surrender. The victors claim that this will end the war, but the insurgents deny this, and declare they will continue the struggle.

A Geological Congress.

EMINENT geologists from all parts of the world were in session in Washington last week, the occasion being the fifth International Congress of these scientists. All the great scientific institutions in both hemispheres are represented. Prof. Le Conte was chosen to preside and Secretary Noble made an address of welcome. A number of very interesting papers, touching on the geology of various countries and more especially our own land, were read before the Congress. It was shown that while the old structures and other evidences of an ancient civilization were rare in this country, it was probably richer in natural wonders than any other part of the globe and was believed to be the oldest continent of all.

The New York Building Disaster.

AFTER five days digging in the ruins of the collapsed buildings on Park Place, New York, the scene of the frightful disaster briefly described in the last issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, sixty-one bodies of victims were recovered. There are probably no more bodies in the ruins. Relays of longshoremen, firemen, and Public Works laborers worked incessantly, getting out the bodies and the heavy machinery. The morgue was crowded and the undertakers in the vicinity were unable to meet the demands upon them. Aid will be extended to the widows and families of the victims. The Mayor has ordered an investigation to fix the responsibility for the calamity. It has been discovered that there were in the cellar of the wrecked building thirteen barrels of benzine and naphtha, and the supposition now is that some of them did certainly explode. The Superintendent of Buildings admits that the building was overloaded with machinery.

China as a Menace.

A SIGNIFICANT passage occurs in a letter received in New York a few days ago from a prominent member of the American colony in Amoy, China. At a banquet given by the United States Consul, Edward Bedloe, at the Consulate there was present among other notable guests, Tsin Chun Ching, the Governor of the Province. In a speech responding to a toast he said:

"It is difficult for a European to appreciate the breadth and depth of the meaning of this toast to the Chinese mind. It includes the family, language, race, nation and the crown. It includes literature, law, morals and a history of fifty centuries. China, having followed its own principles of advancement during more than 5,000 years, is now compelled to change and move along European channels. It has begun to own steamships and railways. Its telegraph now covers every province. It has at last mills, forges, and foundries, like those of Essen, of Sheffield and of Pittsburgh. China is to-day learning that lesson in education which Europe has obliged her to learn, the art of killing, the science of armies and navies. Woe, then, to the world if the scholar, profiting by her lesson, should apply it in turn. With its freedom from debt, its inexhaustible resources, and its teeming millions, this empire might be the menace, if not the destroyer of Christendom. No matter what happens, it needs no prophetic gift to know that the twentieth century will see at the forefront of the nations of the world China in the East and America in the West. Well may we pray that for the welfare of humanity their purpose will be as peaceful and upright as it is to-day."

Explorer Peary Heard From.

LIEUTENANT PEARY, who set out several months ago to circumnavigate and explore Greenland, with a large well-equipped party, has been heard from. The steamer Kite reach her destination at Whale Island safely, but her commander had the misfortune to break his leg. However, as eight months must elapse before the party at Whale Island can hope to set out with their sledges, he will have time to recuperate. He had hoped to test the character of the inland ice travelling this fall. Only one member of the party is an experienced snow-shoe traveller. Professor Heilprin, the famous paleontologist, with a small party of men, has left Lieutenant Peary, and is now on his way home, having accomplished what he desired in the way of securing specimens of plants and fossils.

Trying a Giant Gun.

THE biggest of Uncle Sam's big guns—the new twelve-inch steel cannon, carrying a one-thousand pound projectile with one hundred and fifty pounds of powder, was tested at Sandy Hook last week. The test was mainly as to the velocity afforded by the powder, which was found to be only 1875 feet per second, as against 1975, the acquired standard. At the last discharge the gun was disabled.

The New Swiss President.

THE little Mountain Republic of Europe has had unusual prominence this year owing to its recent celebration of its sixcentenary, referred to in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in a former issue. The newly-elected President of the Federal Council and consequently the principle functionary of the Republic, is Dr. Welti of Glarus, whose portrait appears in this column. Although nominally President of the Republic, his power is by no means as extensive as that of our own Executive. Supreme Executive power rests with the Bundesrath or Federal Council, which consists of seven members, holding office for three years, while the President and Vice-President are for one year only. The President appoints no Cabinet, but simply carries out the will of the Council.

THE EXILES' RETURN.

"In those days, and in that time, saith the Lord, the children of Israel shall come, they and the children of Judah together, going and weeping: they shall go, and seek the Lord their God. They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward, saying, Come, and let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten." Jeremiah 1: 4-5.

THE previous part of this chapter declares the overthrow of Israel's cruel oppressor: "Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces." The Assyrian and Babylonian power had been the great tyrant of the ages, and the Lord had employed it for the chastening of his people, until at last Israel and Judah had been carried away captive to the banks of the Euphrates, and the land of their fathers knew them no more. This was the mournful song of the exiles, "By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion." What a turn would come! In the day when God would reckon with Babylon, and punish the haughty people for their cruelties, then should Israel and Judah come to their own again.

I will not talk much with you concerning the Chaldeans and the Jews, but I would speak concerning ourselves. We, too, by nature are in banishment, far off from our God and the abode of his glory. We are not what we ought to have been, for the Lord did not make us to be sinners, but to be his happy and obedient creatures: our present lost estate is not our true state.

We Are Banished

through coming under the power of our adversary; sin has carried us into captivity, we are in the far country, away from the great Father's house. It is a great blessing when the times come, and they have come, when there is an opportunity and an invitation to return. To-day the power of the adversary is broken, and we may flee out of the Babylon of sin. A greater than Cyrus has opened the two-leaved gates, and broken the bars of iron in sunder, and proclaimed liberty to the captives. We may now return to our God and freely enjoy the holy and happy associations which belong to the City of our God.

At such times, when the Lord is leading men to seek his face, questions arise, anxieties abound, and difficulties multiply. The lost tribes could not come back from Babylon by merely thinking of it: he way was long and dangerous, the paths were unknown and difficult, and they who came back to Zion found the journey to be no promenade of pleasure or parade of pomp. It is so with the Lord's banished when he gives them a heart and a will to return to him; they are not, therefore, restored to the Father's house at once: they may have to persevere through months of weary pilgrimage before they come to their desired abode. As I have said, returning times are anxious times; men wander thoughtlessly, but they do not return without grave thought and serious consideration. earnestly desire to be the means in the hand of God of answering questions, removing fears, and clearing the way for those who have begun to seek the Lord. They mourn, and I would fain comfort them; they ask the way, and I will gladly direct them; they long to join themselves unto the Lord, and I would help them,

I. To begin at the beginning, the Lord's restored ones during the processes of grace were first of all mourners: "In those days, and in that time, saith the Lord, the children of Israel shall come, they and the children of Judah together, going and weeping:

they shall go, and seek the Lord their God." Oh, my hearer, after all your sins I will not believe that you are truly coming to God if there is not about you a great sorrow for sin and a lamenting after the Lord. Some seekers are made to drink of this bitter cup very deeply; their sense of sin is terrible, even to anguish and agony. I know that there are others who do not taste this bitterness to the same degree; but it is in their cup, for all that, only the sweet love of Christ is revealed to them so soon and so fully that the healthful wormwood of penitence is veiled beneath the exceeding sweetness of gracious pardon. There must be a shower in the day of mercy, not always a long driving rain causing a flood, but the soft drops must fall in every case.

Observe that this mourning in the case of Israel and Judah was so strong that it mastered other feelings. Between Judah and Israel there was an old feud. They were brethren, and it ought not to have been so; but they had become bitter adversaries of each other. Yet now that they return unto the Lord, we read, "The children of Israel shall come, they and the children of Judah together." O happy union in

A Common Search For God!

When we are reconciled to God we are reconciled to men. I have seen those who had been fired with mutual hatred loving each other when they have been alike under the power of the Spirit of God, and bowed down with contrition. I am sure if you were to go forward as a sincere inquirer to ask the way to heaven, if you met your worst enemy at the door, and he said to you, "I am seeking mercy of God for my transgressions," you would grasp each other's hands and weep together. If a man, professing to be a penitent, drew back at the sight of another who also came penitently to Christ, and said, "I can have nothing to do with him," I should unhesitatingly declare him to be a hypocrite; or even if he were sincere, I should have to tell him that to a certainty the Lord could not and would not accept his repentance.

Keeping close to the text, we notice again that the exiles on their return were mourning while marching. Observe the words—"going and weeping." We might have thought, perhaps, that when they began to go to their God, so much light would break in upon them that they would cease to weep: but no, it is "going and weeping." A true heart that is coming to God takes it feels its sin, its guilt, and its undesert, and it therefore mourns. The closet is sought out and prayer is offered; but in the supplication there is a dove's note, a moaning as of one sorrowing for love.

Turning the text round, we read not only of "going and weeping," but also of weeping and going. The holy grief here intended does not lead to sitting still, for it is added "they shall go." The word "weeping" is sandwiched in between two goings—"going and weeping; they shall go and seek the Lord." To sit down and say, "I will sorrow for my sin, but never seek a Saviour," is an impenitent pretence of repentance, a barren sorrow which brings forth no cleansing of the life, and no diligent search after the Lord. When the prodigal cries, "I will arise and go to my Father," then a work of grace is certainly begun, but not till then. It is not enough to say, "I perish with hunger"; but when there follows upon it, "I will arise, and go to my Father, and say unto him, Father, I have sinned," then we have reached

The True Turning Point.

True mourning for sin leads the sinner to the Cross. When thou talkest about repentance, if thy repentance be with thy back to the cross, away with thy repentance. If thou art trusting to thy tears, and sorrows, and griefs, and not trusting to the blood of Jesus Christ, thou art trusting in a vain show.

We must not pass over that last word, "They shall go and seek the Lord their God." This, dear hearer, shall be a guide to you as to whether your present state of feeling is leading you aright. What is it you are seeking? "I am seeking," says one, "I am seeking peace." May you soon obtain it, and may it be real peace; but I am not sure of you. "I am seeking," says another, "the pardon of sin." Again, I pray that you may find it; but I am not sure of you. If another shall reply, "I am seeking the Lord; for I desire above all things to have him for a friend, though to him I have been an enemy"; then I have good hope of him. I rejoice over the heart which is crying, "I want to see my Father's face, and hear him say, 'I have blotted out thy sins'; I want to dwell with God, to serve him cross line, to obey him, to grow like him.

There Has Been A Quarrel

between him and me, and other lords have had dominion over me, but now I desire that he shall be my Lord and King, and myself his loyal humble servant, and his beloved child. I hunger and thirst after God!"

You see, brethren and sisters, we require a great many things in order to be saved, and yet one thing is needful. I would represent it in this form:—Here is a little child, picked up from the gutter, diseased and filthy, unclad, unfed; and if you ask me to make out a catalogue of what the child wants you must give me a sheet of foolscap paper to write it all down, and then I fear I shall leave out many things. I will tell you in one word what that poor infant requires—it wants its mother. If it gets its mother it has all it needs. So to tell what a poor sinner wants might be a long task; but when you say that he wants his heavenly Father you have said it all. This was what the prodigal needed, was it not? He needed his father, and when he came to his father all his necessities were supplied. Oh, souls, you are seeking aright if you are seeking your God. Nothing short of this will suffice. This may greatly aid you to judge whether you are in the right way or no.

II. Secondly, these mourners became inquirers. We read in the second verse of our text, "They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward." They knew something, that is clear, for they turned Their Faces in the Right Direction; but having been born and nurtured in Babylon the road to Jerusalem had never been trodden by them, the route was strange and new. They knew within a little the quarter in which Zion lay, and they looked that way; but they did not know all about the road: how should they? The saving point about them was that they were not ashamed to confess their ignorance. Minds that the Lord has touched are never boastful of their wisdom. There are many persons in the world who would be converted if they could but consent to be taught by God's word and Spirit; but they are such wise people, they know too much to enter the school of grace. A sense of ignorance is the doorstep of wisdom.

It is clear from their asking their way that these inquirers were teachable. They not only yielded to be instructed, but they were eager to be taught; and therefore they asked for information. It is a hopeful sign when children ask questions; if we can get them to desire knowledge, the desire will be more valuable than the knowledge itself. The way nowadays is to cram the memory; but if our youths could be brought to hunger for knowledge, and to ask questions, their minds would be much more effectually benefited. It is a great mercy for a poor seeking sinner to have a teachable spirit, so as to pray, "Lord Jesus, write thy Gospel upon my heart." Here it is, ready to be written on.—Only tell me what thou wouldst have me to do. I make no reservation—I am willing, by thy help, to do it; or if there be nothing to be done but to sit at thy feet, tell me that, and I will do this as thy grace enables me.

Anxious To Keep Right.

More than this, they will be anxious although they are right: "they shall ask the way to Zion, with their faces thitherward"—they are travelling in the right direction, and yet they ask the way. They have looked westward from Babylon towards Jerusalem: they have taken up the westward position, which in their case had a hopeful meaning in it. They are setting out for the land of Canaan as their father did when he left Chaldea; and as they have no map of the road they ask for the way which leads from banishment to the city of their God. They are right, for their faces are Zionward, and one proof of it is that they are anxious to keep right, or to be set right. You who are certain that you are right are very liable to be wrong, but those who make every inquiry of the Word of God, of the servants of God, and of their fellow-travellers are in all probability pursuing the right road. He that has never raised a question about his condition before God had better raise it at once.

Though they ask the way, we may remark further that they know whither they are going. They ask not to some imaginary blissful shore that may be or may not be, but they seek God's own dwelling-place, God's own palace, God's own sacrifice. They ask boldly too, for they are not ashamed to be found inquiring; and when they are informed, their faces are already that way, and therefore they have nothing to do but to go straight on. May God grant us myriads of such inquirers! Observe the right order: first they sought the Lord, and then they asked their way to Zion. First God, and then God's people; first the Master of the house, and then the house of the Master; first that you may become his child, secondly that you may be put among the children.

III. Now we come to the last matter: these inquirers become covenanters, for they said to one another, "Come and let us join ourselves to the Lord in that shall not be forgotten." Oh, that word "covenant"! I can never pronounce it without joy in my heart. It is to me a mine of comfort, a mint of delight, a mass of joy. I rejoice in those old Scotch books about the covenant; covenant truth was so inwrought into the Scotch heart that Scottish peasants as well as divines talked about it perpetually. You remember the good old cottager's grace over her porridge. I cannot repeat it in pure Doric, but it ran like this:—"Lord, I thank thee for the porridge, I thank thee for an appetite for the porridge, but I thank thee most of all that I have a covenant right to the porridge." Only think of that, a covenant right to the porridge. Does not the promise say, "Thy bread shall be given thee and thy waters shall be sure"? and here was the promise fulfilled.

Returning to the text: these inquirers become covenanters, for we read that they seek to be joined unto the Lord—"Come and let us join ourselves to the Lord." The mischief of our fallen state arose from our

Trying To Be Distinct
Independent of our God. The younger son said, "Give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." See, he has received his share in ready-money and off he goes to the far country. What does he do when he penitently returns? Why he joins himself to his Father. Nothing in the house is his, and he has had his portion of goods long ago; but he lives at home because he is one with his Father, and cannot be shut out from the house of his Father. "Come and let us join ourselves to the Lord." Now, dear hearts, are you willing to be one with Christ, and so to be one with the Father?

Next, notice for how long a time this covenant is to be made—"Let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant." In the English army of late they have enlisted "short time" men. A good brother came to join the church last week who is in the Reserve, and I said to him, "You are not coming to unite with us for two sixes, the first six with the colors and the other six as a reserve man,—you have come, I hope, to fight under the colors as long as life lasts." "Ay, sir," he said, "I give myself up to the Lord forever." No salvation is possible except that which saves the soul for ever. It must be

An Everlasting Salvation
or no salvation. And yet some professors try to be off and on with God: they are wonderfully good on the Sabbath; but they slip their regimentals off on Sunday night, and there is no accounting for them during the week. I do not know where these double-faced people are to be found on a Monday night, but I fear they are up to no good. These chameleons change their color according to the light they are in. Their religion is a sort of play-acting, a kind of masquerade.

Note, further, that this joining to God these covenanters intended to carry out in a most solemn way; "Let us join ourselves to the Lord in perpetual"—agreement? or promise? No. "Covenant" is the word. It is a profitable thing for the soul to covenant with God. Dr. Doddridge gives a form of personal covenant in his Rise and Progress, and I have been told that some persons have written it out and even signed it with their blood. I believe that such a formal transaction may lead a soul into bondage. This covenanting is not to be performed quite so literally, but that it should be done really I do believe. That a man should give himself to the Lord in set and solemn form at some time in his life I believe to be a great help to his after perseverance; and if he will renew his covenant every now and then it may greatly help to his keeping it.

The Source of Strength.

One word more remains to be spoken: those who came mourning and inquiring, when they became covenanters felt that they had a nature very apt to forgetfulness of good things, and so a part of what they desired in their covenanting with God was "a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten." God will never forget, yet you may pray, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." The fear is lest you should forget. What is your view of that possibility? Would it not be terrible? Think it over and say, "If I should ever forget the Lord Jesus, if I should ever forget my obligations for his great salvation, and for the good hope of eternal life which he has given me, it would be infamous! God grant I may die sooner than deny my Lord! Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe. I would be thine living, thine dying, and thine for ever and ever." Thus desiring and pleading, all will be well with you. May the God of the everlasting covenant bless you. Amen.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Bartley Smith, M. D., Neola, Kan., and others—The answers to "Merchant's" question, which attracted very wide attention, were published in No. 30 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

S. S. Teacher, Newburg, Cumberland Co., Pa. Were the Jews permitted to bury their dead on the Sabbath in our Saviour's time?

All works connected with religious ceremonies were lawful on the Sabbath.

A. M., Buffalo, N. Y. At what rate does a storm travel that has sufficient force to level trees and destroy property?

An ordinary storm moves at the rate of 36 miles an hour; a hurricane 80 miles an hour, while a cyclone has been estimated to reach a velocity of 120 miles.

B. W., San Antonio, Tex. I was much interested in your statistics concerning illiteracy. Can you inform me which languages the most widely spoken at the present day?

English is spoken by nearly 100,000,000, Spanish (as claimed) by over 50,000,000, (this includes all the South American Spanish-speaking nations), German by 60,000,000, French by 45,000,000, Chinese in its various dialects by over 300,000,000 and Hindu in its many dialects by fully 200,000,000.

W. C. Tarver, Crockett, Tex. Were there any Sabbath Schools before Christ came to this world?

The Sunday School is a comparatively modern development of Christianity, but there may have been schools before our Lord's time where little children were taught the Scriptures. Sunday Schools were introduced in the year 1784. Robert Raikes, a printer of Gloucester, England, may be said to be the founder of the modern Sunday School.

Miss Winsor Colwell, Smithfield, R. I. What are the consequences of swearing and cursing and taking God's name in vain?

The moral law (as laid down in Exodus 20: 7), says distinctly that God "will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain." See the condemnation and punishment of the swearer and the man of oaths and curses, as declared in Matt. 23: 16; Lev. 24: 16-23; Psalms 59: 12 and 119: 17, 18.

Stranger, N. Y. City. Is it right for one who is striving to lead a Christian life to attend County Fairs and other places where horses strive for a prize?

All games of chance or skill on which money is staked are immoral. Amusement is natural to man, and games and sports may be innocently indulged; but when their tendency is to gambling, they are best avoided. Horse-racing as now practised on the turf would not be supported at all were it not for the gambling connected with it.

W. P. Henrize, Lebanon, Va. A man is arraigned for poisoning his wife with arsenic and is convicted of murder in the first degree. He asked a preacher the other day: "What is the chance of a man guilty of such a charge getting to heaven?" Does the Bible teach that God, in his extreme mercy, will pardon such a case?

Yes; there is no limit to the pardoning power of the Almighty and merciful God, if the repentance be sincere. Pardon is only withheld from the unbelieving, the impenitent, the unrepentant, and those who blaspheme against the Holy Ghost. (See Romans 4: 8; Heb. 10: 17; Luke 13: 2-5.)

M. R. Wright, Wolcott, Wayne Co., N. Y. I wish to ask in regard to Sabbath visiting among relatives and friends. Many professing Christians excuse themselves for visiting members of their own families on the Sabbath, who would not think for a moment of a pleasure visit anywhere else on that day. If parents visit their married children and their families, or if brothers and sisters and their families meet on the Sabbath for pleasure, and to talk over different subjects, is it keeping the Sabbath holy? Are they excusable in the sight of God, merely because they are relatives?

Assuredly not. The act comes under the head of social amusement and is among those things that are distinctly forbidden on the Sabbath day. If the family reunion were for the purpose of worship, it would receive the Divine approval.

W. N. O'Kelly, Lewisville, Tex. (1) Did Adam and Eve literally eat apples in the Garden of Eden? (2) How are we to understand the "everlasting fire" spoken of in Matt. 25: 41? As a literal fire?

(1) Early Church writers considered the narrative of the forbidden fruit as partly fact and partly allegory. During the Reformation period, it was interpreted literally. More recent interpretations make it a combination of history and sacred symbolism, the forbidden indulgence of nature and the violation of a definite prohibition. (2) Doddridge writes that "care should be taken to explain that hell may be said to consist more of mental agony than bodily torture." Other commentators believe that the eternal fire is not a material one kindled by any person, but the combustibles are our sins of which conscience accuses us. To be forever shut out from the presence of God and excluded from the enjoyments of the blessed, with our sins consuming us like a raging fire, the while we are filled with vain regrets, is a torture equal to any bodily punishment.

We have received a large number of answers to the question submitted by G. J. T. Tucson, Ariz., and which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Aug. 5. It was as follows:

Does God justify the State in taking a murderer's life? What is the best course from a Christian standpoint, in the interest of society and morality, to adopt in dealing with murderers?

Space limitation forbids the publication of more than a few of the replies called out by this very interesting query. J. H. Ballagh, Lyons, Wayne Co., N. Y., writes:

In God's establishment of the principle of the civil government in Noah after the flood (see Gen. 9: 6), we have the law enunciated: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed."

Erasmus A. Garnsey, N. Y. City, writes:

I should like to refer your readers to the ninth chapter of Genesis in which we find a covenant entered into by God with Noah, which distinctly declares that the murderer shall die at the hands of his fellows. That it is binding to-day we have the bow in the clouds as evidence that God has not forgotten his declaration to Noah. Christ came to fulfil the law. We to be faithful must fulfil our part, even though it be to take the life of the murderer.

W. K. Beatty, Washington, D. C., also quotes Gen. 9: 6, and adds

Moreover in Numbers 35: 31 it is stated, "ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer which is guilty of death; but he shall surely be put to death." Not only the law of God but the security of human life demands the destruction of one who can deliberately take the life his fellow-creature.

On the other side of the question are a number of exceedingly interesting letters. B. F., Topeka, Kan., writes:

All the principles of Christian doctrine and the dictates of reason and humanity cry aloud against the remorseless deprivation of the life of any human being, even though he may have been guilty of taking the life of another. One wrong was never rectified by the commission of another, and surely there could be no more flagrant violation of God's holy laws than the sudden yet deliberate and methodical taking of life by a community as represented in the brutal order of executions in these days. The true Christian spirit would lead us rather to extend to such lost and wretched beings, a pitying hand, to lead them to true repentance and forgiveness. I know that there are people who are fond of quoting the old Mosaic injunction relating to the punishment of the murderer; but the law of Moses has been superseded by the gentle law of the Redeemer, who stands ready to pardon even the penitent murderer. The taking of a human life is more than an offence against the natural law: it is a violation of a spiritual law, inasmuch as a victim may thereby be forced to judgment unprepared, to the loss of his immortal soul. If such an act, done in passion, be sinful, how can it be sanctioned by a merciful God when done deliberately in the name of the law? Law was made for the regulation of the things of life, not of those that lie beyond the grave. They belong to God alone and a human law that would interfere with his prerogative deserves to be abolished.

Joseph Lewis, 276 Oregon Street, Milwaukee, Wis., writes:

I believe that those who sign the death warrant are guilty of murder in the second degree. I would have murderers cultivate land, improve harbors, manufacture everything for their own use but not for sale outside the walls of the prison. Give them good, religious teaching and the Gospel and good will come of it.

Jos. Mutch, Franklin, N. J., writes:

When Cain killed Abel the Lord said: "Whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold." The sixth commandment is "Thou shalt not kill." I think capital punishment should be abolished and life imprisonment substituted. This would give the murderer time for repentance and would prevent besides the possibility of innocent men being hung for the crimes of others.

J. Paxton, Des Moines, Ia., says:

"Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord, I will repay." Not by death but by a disciplinary process does God punish crime against his laws. Man, still partly savage, indulges the passion of revenge. Clothed in the majesty of man-made law, society stalks about, seeking lives. When we are truly civilized and when the spirit of the Master prevails as it should we will then have learned to emulate God's infinite goodness as far as can be done in this world and that the taking of a life for a life is a relic of a dark barbaric age, that must disappear as the world grows wiser and better. Murderers should be kept in confinement and brought to repent of their crimes. Their labor might be utilized for the support of the relatives or dependants of their victims, or for purposes of charity.

THE WARNING CRY.

An Elmira, N. Y. Clergyman Discusses Prof. Totten's Calculations and their Significance

HAVE made the subject of prophecy a study, more or less, for the past twenty years. I mean by this that, with other reading and manifold duties in quite a large parish, this study has been prominent.

I. I am very conservative as to periods, dates, times, and seasons. I have great respect for Professor Totten's inferences and deductions, and by no means say that he is not correct. That the "vision in the end shall speak and not lie" is plain enough, and if the end is near, if the Judge is even at the doors, it is certainly possible that Professor Totten is right. It is much easier to call him a "crank" and to stigmatise his teaching as "bosh" than it is to answer him or to refute his argument as to the end of this age being about the end of this 19th Century. Christ himself was regarded by many as a crank and as having a devil, and St. Paul was considered mad; nevertheless, the Word of God was justified and established.

II. I regard Professor Totten's writing at this particular juncture as very significant for these reasons:

A Champion of Faith.

1. That at a time when the world of letters and science is full of scepticism and infidelity, a man of acknowledged learning, scholarship, and ability is raised up to defend and maintain the Scriptures against all adversaries—against rationalists, agnostics, scientific sceptics, and bold and blasphemous atheists, as well as so-called higher critics, who are doing more than all the infidels to destroy the faith of the people in the Word of God. A layman also, and a professor in a college, a man of large scientific attainments and not a one-sided, prejudiced, bigoted, fanatical minister, ignorant of science and a tyro in philosophy. Possibly Professor Totten in this evil and adulterous generation is raised up for this very purpose.

2. It is significant that Professor Totten is in essential agreement with all the great students of prophecy in regard to the Time of the End. Scott, Newton, Luther, Fleming, Faber, Keith, Elliott, Cumming, Seiss, Grattan Guinness, and Piazzi Smyth, Astronomer Royal of Scotland, one and all point to the present epoch as the culminating period, when all the lines of prophecy converge and indicate the end, not of the physical world, but of the age.

A Notable Era.

3. It is again significant that just at this present time the most remarkable event has occurred among the Jews that has taken place since this Christian Era. Another Pharaoh has arisen and another exodus is imminent, and all signs point to Palestine as the refuge of the Jews. The condition of God's ancient people is now exciting the attention of the whole civilised world, and no document of the age is so remarkable as the petition not long since presented to the President of the United States, signed by many distinguished men, asking this Government to call the attention of all the great European Powers to the condition of the Jews, and suggesting that steps be taken to restore them to Judea.

4. It is further significant that phenomena in the natural world, signs in the sun, moon, and stars, synchronize with those in the moral. The terrific electrical storms of the sun, the conjunctions of the planets, unprecedented for two thousand years, recent discoveries in the moon, the cyclones, floods, and earthquakes, the shaking indeed of the powers in heaven and earth, all harmonize with the prophecies of Christ in Matthew 24, and of Daniel and Revelation.

5. It would be a mistake to overlook Spiritualism.

as one of the most significant signs of the last days. No delusion in the history of the race has spread so rapidly as this; more than 5,000,000 believers are claimed in the United States alone, and it has become world-wide. What is this but the "departing from the faith and giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils," spoken of by the apostle as indicating the last days? No language could better describe this delusion which has shipwrecked the faith of millions in the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. Whether supernatural or not, it has accomplished the work of the devil and most emphatically fulfilled prophecy.

Finally, to sum up, the widespread commotion in the financial, political, ecclesiastical, and social world, the almost universal unrest, the hurrying to and fro, the increase of knowledge, the general expectation that we are on the brink of some great catastrophe or change, all tally with the prophecies of the end. Politicians, statesmen, philosophers, ministers, teachers everywhere recognize this state of things and are on the qui vive for this change. All reiterate the words of a great statesman who said: "Every aspect of the present times, viewed in the light of the past warrants the belief that we are on the eve of an universal change." And all agree with an eminent bishop who says, "Are not these signs and prognostics of the speedy coming of our Lord to judgment?—the six thousand years are nearing their close; the period of Popery's dominancy expiring; the sixth vial pouring out; the earth exhibiting all the features of the last days; the nations distressed and their leaders tremulous with fear; history closing up; all the old landmarks of society invaded and simultaneously giving way more or less, before resistless innovations; the predicted cry, 'Behold he cometh,' ringing through every land; the whole world becoming like a magazine where a single spark may produce an universal explosion; our great men and devout men and nearly all the thinking men proclaiming the presence of some unknown change, and the book of God telling me that when these things begin to come to pass my Saviour and his kingdom are at hand; would I not deserve to be classed with infidels and scoffers if I did not believe, and merit the condemnation of a hypocritical and faithless watchman if I did not declare that so it is, and that the end of all things is at hand?"

Another Comment

on Lieut. Totten's calculations is that of Prof. Infree who writes: I notice that many persons speak of our Yale Professor as an alarmist; but he need not resent the title. He probably had no other object in view in giving his work to the world than that of causing alarm. As a conscientious man he could do no other, after making his discovery. Worldly Christians need to be put on their guard, and worldings need to be warned that the time of their opportunity is growing frightfully short. We expected that before the Lord's coming, the cry would be raised "Behold the Bridegroom cometh," and Lieut. Totten may be the one chosen to give that cry. I would by no means despise such a warning, nor be among those who put it aside as one of the mysteries beyond our province. It deserves, at least, respectful consideration.

I am surprised at the tone which many have taken in regard to the prediction. Some—and they are Christians, too—exhibit a reluctance to believe it may be true, as if they dreaded the Lord's coming and would rather hear that it would not be for a thousand years, than learn that it would really be in their time. To me such an attitude is incomprehensible. To see the Lord—he whom we love above all, ought to be the most supreme joy. It will be that, and surely to hear that the joy will be ours sooner than we hoped should give us pleasure rather than apprehension. Then those who dread the death agony should rejoice that some one is telling them of the probability of their being translated without dying. It means, too, the avoidance of those separations, those grievous partings from loved ones, which embitter the death-bed. All who love him and are looking for him will "be caught up together" to meet him in the air. If any waiting Christian has loved ones near and dear to him who are not yet decided for Christ, let him heed this midnight cry lest one should be taken and another left. Let him pray and plead that the unbelieving wife or son or daughter may come at once to Christ and be caught up together with himself.

As to the calculations themselves, I do not consider myself competent to express an opinion. They run on a line parallel to the calculation based on the strict prophetic periods of Daniel, but it is over ground with which I am not familiar. It is very certain that the historical line of argument brings us irresistibly to the conclusion that the predictions given by the angel to Daniel must have their fulfillment about the time indicated by Lieut. Totten. Making all the allowances necessary for differences in the dates of the starting points, and in the measurement of prophetic time, we cannot escape the conclusion that we are on the verge of the events which immediately precede the Great Tribulation. To my mind, therefore, the chief value of Lieut. Totten's studies consists in their corroboration of the historical argument, which is a fact of sufficient importance. It is in itself one of "the signs of the times." Daniel said that he heard but understood not, and he was informed that the words were sealed "until the time of the end." That light should now be falling on the open page is an indication of the presence of that "time of the end."

ARE WE BLIND?

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Sept. 13. John 9:40, 41; II. Cor. 4:4; Rev. 3:17, 18.

THE question is not fully answered by our giving proof of the possession of physical eyesight. Blindness is an affliction of many varieties and degrees. Some persons are blind as far as distance is concerned. We call them near-sighted. Others cannot distinguish colors and we say they are color-blind. Aged persons are partially blind without the assistance of their eye-glasses. Then there is a mental blindness, which is aptly illustrated in the old story of Eyes and no Eyes, familiar to every school-boy. We say to a persistently foolish man that he is blind—blind to his own interest. We say to a vain man that he is blind—blind to his own defects. We speak of a lover as blind—blind to the faults of his beloved. But the most common form of blindness is spiritual blindness and that is the natural state. The spiritual eyesight is acquired, for the natural man knoweth not the things of the Spirit, "because they are spiritually discerned." Bunyan's pilgrims saw "a man who could look no way but downward." He did not look up though there stood one above him offering him a celestial crown. Every converted man knows what spiritual eyesight means. He feels the appropriateness of the description of his former state as "a state of darkness." The transition is emphatically an enlightenment. The good man menaced with danger, yet undismayed is supported by what he sees with his spiritual eyesight, as Elisha's servant, after his eyes were opened saw that the whole "mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha." (II. Kings 6:17.)

But are we blind? Let the life testify. Are we concerned chiefly about worldly affairs? That is a sure indication of blindness. He who has spiritual sight perceives that neither wealth, nor position, nor power, is of importance to him who is looking to the things which are eternal. In perplexity, or trial, or sorrow do we seek help and strength and comfort from men? Then are we blind—blind to the wealth of resource at our command in the Divine Treasury on which we may draw freely. Are we content with mere spiritual safety—the safety of the man who through faith in Christ is assured of heaven? Then are we blind to the glorious privileges of grace and to the felicity which may be enjoyed on the higher table-lands by him who, by Christ's help, will climb the rugged path to reach them. Do we make no effort to win souls for the Master? Then we are blind to their danger and our duty. Blind also to the reward which is promised to him "who converteth the sinner from the error of his way and saves a soul from death;" to the glory which we might have with them "who turn many to righteousness," who will "shine as the stars forever and ever."

Oh yes; we may be blind and know it not. And we may see and yet see dimly and indistinctly, needing, as did the Church at Laodicia, to anoint our eyes with eye-salve that we may see more and more, until the day come when "we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is."

THE BIRTHPLACE OF A BUTTERFLY.

A CHEERING suggestion to the King's Daughters is made by their President, Mrs. Bottome, in the course of some remarks published in the Ladies' Home Journal, of Philadelphia. She says: "How can you for one moment think that a God of love has nothing better in store for you? Why did he make you with all your love for the beautiful, and then place you in circumstances where you could not have or cultivate a things you loved? He would not be a good God at all to do that, and God is good. Never shall I forget a sight I saw last May. All the winter a dry and apparently dead thing had hung on the end of the sewing-machine; no one could have dreamed of the beauty that was hidden in that cocoon, and surely the poor creature that after a life of crawling laid down to die, did not think of it; but I saw that marvelous transformation take place. Never shall I forget the first motions it made to use the wings; they seemed so heavy that they moved but a little at first, but each time in moving the strength came. The wings were very large and very beautiful, and at last I exclaimed, "Oh, he is going to fly! when to my great surprise he used his feet instead, and walked off very fast; and he seemed to enjoy his feet. Ah me! I said, the reason why we use our feet perhaps is we do not feel our wings. Now our wings are Faith and Hope, and we shall feel them. You need not think a sewing-machine is your home forever any more than it was for the butterfly that was in that cocoon that hung on that sewing-machine all last winter."

A GRAND PROJECT.

(See Illustration.)

THE illustration in this column represents the building designed for the occupation of the North East branch of the Philadelphia Young Men's Christian Association. When completed it will be one of the best arranged buildings of the kind in the country. It is to cost $50,000, and the whole of it will be devoted to Association work. The Monthly Review, which is the organ of the North East Branch says that in the immediate neighborhood of the site there are 17,000 young men, of whom eighty-five per cent. are mechanics. It is therefore intended to make the Association practically useful to them by arranging classes for technical instruction. It will also include beside the usual gymnasium, a swimming-pool in the basement, sixteen feet by twenty-three. On the first floor will be the reception room and offices, reading-room and coat-room. At the back will be the parlor which will also serve for a lecture-room. The floor above will have the ladies' and boys' auxiliary rooms, and the large hall capable of seating 750 persons. The third floor is to be divided into class-rooms. On the fourth floor will be the janitor's rooms and the Association kitchen, and above all a roof-garden which will be a great attraction in the summer. Plants will be placed there and tables for chess and similar games. Fifteen business men form the Committee in charge of the project and the arrangements are a proof of their sagacity. We most sincerely hope that our Philadelphia friends will overcome the financial difficulty and carry the plans to a triumphant issue. They are adopting the right method in reaching the young men on the practical side.

PROPOSED BUILDING OF THE Y. M. C. A. OF PHILADELPHIA.

ONE GIRL'S BADGE.

THE question is often asked, what is the use of wearing a badge such as the monogram-pin of the Christian Endeavor Society or the Maltese Cross of the King's Daughters? It is generally people who have not worn either who ask the question. Those who have, find in their own experience what the use is. Many an aching heart seeking sympathy has found the clue to the object of its search in the sight of the badge glistening on some bosom. A case in point is related as follows in the Central West:

A young lady was making calls in one of the most desolate and poverty-stricken parts of the town. She had been on several errands of mercy, and her sensitive heart had been deeply touched by the sight of the suffering with which she had come in contact.

On her way home, as she was passing a large store, her attention was attracted to a girl not much older than herself, and bearing evidences of refinement and good breeding, who hurried out of the store with her head bowed. Her face was full of despair; her mouth wore a mocking smile which was terrible to see in one so young.

The young lady saw her opportunity, and stepping quickly to the girl's side, she said, "Can I help you?"

"No, thank you," was the frigid rejoinder, and then impulsively the girl put out her hand. "You are an Endeavorer, too, I see by your pin. You can help me by praying for me. I have just lost my place at the store, and mother is very ill. I have been her mainstay for two years; now what shall we do?"

"Let me help you as an Endeavorer should help another," was the reply.

After some little conversation the two girls went off together toward the home of the sick mother.

The young lady who prayed for work found it (as is always the case), and she did not cease her attentions to the little family until the mother's health was fully recovered and the daughter had succeeded in finding another and more remunerative position. She herself told me the story, and added, "The blessed little pin, I never will go out without it again, for it was the means of showing me a duty and bringing me a dear friend; for A. would have shaken me off coldly, had she not caught sight of the pin. She told me so afterwards; but as it was, the thought of our motto, 'All ye are brethren' came to her; and she told me her troubles, and allowed me to help her, and now I wouldn't take a fortune for her friendship."

THE WIN-ONE CHAPTER.

AN attractive little pamphlet issued by Miss Belle Hardy, describes the formation of the Win-one Chapter of the King's Daughters and Sons. As its name indicates, it is composed of members who have pledged themselves to use their utmost efforts to win some one soul for Christ. Any King's Daughter or Son may become a member of the Chapter by signing the following pledge and sending it to the Secretary, Miss Belle Hardy, 158 East 42d Street New York: "In the Name of the King, our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, I agree to select one unconverted person, and for one year to do all in my power to win him or her to Christ, and to pray each day for the person so chosen, and for the success of the efforts of all who are engaged in this work." The name will be entered in a book by Col. H. H. Halsey, who is the originator of the movement. It is hoped that circles will be formed in churches, or, at least in towns, and these will likewise be registered, with lists of the members. The circles should meet once a week or once a month to hear reports, to suggest methods of work and to unite in prayer for the souls which the individual members are trying to win. Further advice and instructions are contained in the pamphlet, which may be obtained of Miss Hardy at the address above given.

A SUGGESTION is made in the interest of the Y. M. C. A., by a correspondent of the Youth Men's Era which may be useful to some of our readers. He suggests that every Association have some one, or a committee of several members, whose special duty it shall be to look after the indifferent. He has found, other observers have, that young men come to the Association but making no special friends and seeing nothing to specially interest them gradually discontinue coming. If some one made a point of speaking to such young men, finding out their tastes and introducing them to the gymnasium, the reading-room, or some of the meetings likely to suit them, their interest would be enlisted. What is every one's business is sure to be neglected, and the way to have it done is to appoint some one to do it.

THE EVENING PRAYER.

THE fire upon the hearth is low.
And there is stillness everywhere.
Like troubled spirits here and there.
The firelight shadows flitting and
And as the shadows round me creep.
A childish treble breaks the gloom.
And softly from the further room
Comes: "Now I lay me down to sleep."

And, somehow, with that little prayer
And that sweet treble in my ears.
My thought goes back to distant years
And lingers with a dear one there:
And as I hear the child's amen,
My mother's form comes back to me.
Crouched at her side I seem to be,
And mother holds my hands again.

Oh! for an hour in that dear place!
Oh! for the peace of that dear time!
Oh! for that childish trust sublime!
Oh! for a glimpse of mother's face!
Yet, as the shadows round me creep,
I do not seem to be alone—
Sweet music of that trebled tone—
And "Now I lay me down to sleep."

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells about a Camel-Ride in Egypt—An Odd Experience.

WHEN the children gathered around the table, the other evening, for their usual chat, Uncle John, ever ready to entertain them, took little Elie upon his knee.

"How would you like a camel ride?" he asked the little one.

"A camel ride?" called the children in chorus, "why, Uncle, were you ever on a camel?"

"Yes," he replied, "and a very funny experience it is, to travel on a camel's back. I can assure you. Do you know how a camel walks?"

"Yes," said Tom, promptly, "you know papa reads to us from Dr. Talmage's book, in which he speaks of his travels in the Holy Land, and he tells about a camel ride."

"Indeed," replied Uncle, "and what does he say, pray? I am interested in knowing, for I have ridden on a camel."

Tom presently found the volume in which the well-known divine describes his journey to Memphis, Egypt, and read aloud these words:

On a camel's back I am writing this. How many millions have crossed the desert on this style of beast! Proud, mysterious, so calm, ancient, anguine, majestic, cautious-shaped, smiling out at the past. The driver with his whip tips the camel on the hump; but when he rises, and fast, or you will first fall off backwards as the beast goes his forelegs in striding position, and then you will fall off in front, as his back legs take their place. But the unfortunates are used to his ways.
Although I find the riders often dismount and walk as though content themselves. Better stand out of this path of the camel; he stops for nothing and seems not to look down, and in the desert I saw a child by the stroke of a camel's front foot buried seven or eight feet along the ground.

"Evidently the good Dr. did not find much pleasure on that lofty perch," said Uncle John smiling. "But I have seen a camel that neither he or any other man unused to such a method of locomotion would have ventured to mount."

"Well," inquired Ted, "did you ride on it?"

"Not for worlds!" replied Uncle John.
"You see there are different sorts of camels.
The majority are used as beasts of burden in Egypt, Arabia, Syria, Palestine and some parts of Central Asia as far north as China. The Bactrian camel, which is found in Asia Minor, has two humps on his back, and it used to be the custom among breeders to cut off the foremost hump while the camel was young, to fit him better for the pack-saddle and load. The Arabian camel, or dromedary, has a single hump. Some are lightly built and very fleet, travelling at the rate of one hundred miles in twenty-four hours. They are as different in grade from the ordinary camel, as a thorough-bred horse is from a common hack."

"But tell us about your camel ride."

"Oh yes; strictly speaking, though, it was a dromedary or one-humped camel that I rode.
Our party had gone down the Nile, by steamer, to a town called Kenh on the eastern bank, which is the terminus of a caravan road from Kossir, on the Red Sea. Since the Suez Canal opened, Kenh has lost a good deal of its trade. Most of the traffic is carried on by the use of camels and we could see a number of those animals grazing near by. There were donkeys in plenty, but one can have a donkey ride any day, so several of us decided to try a camel ride. I selected a fine looking young dromedary and calling to the driver, the latter went to the brute's head, while I mounted and took a seat in the saddle which reminded me of a wood-sawyer's horse, covered with a blanket. The driver warned me to hold on tightly, so I grasped the front and rear of the wooden saddle with all my might,
and it was well that I did.

"Haida! Haida!" called the driver, and the dromedary rose and shot out with so swift a motion that I was nearly thrown backward.
It moved as though there was a small earthquake going on below and it had trouble about keeping upright. The gait was a lurch backward, a plunge forward and then a sort of steadying heave, that brought us both on the level again. I learned afterward that this first extraordinary series of motions was caused by the brute rising first on the forelegs then on the hind ones, precisely as Dr. Talmage has described in the passage read by Tom. The rest of the ride was a peculiar rock-ing motion that proved a great strain on the backbone and which I felt more the day after than at the time.

The dromedary is a race-horse compared with the camel, for while both are of the same species, the one is high-bred and the other the reverse. The dromedary can go longer without food, is more sure-footed and I can personally testify that he is swifter. He can eat his dinner as he goes along, without pausing, for his long neck permits him to crop any herbage within reach. Like all camels, the twohumped Bactrian included, he is rather stupid than otherwise and far from docile or interested in his master, like the horse.

"On the road we met and passed other persons on camel-back, some of them women who were inclosed in a sort of wicker-work frame not unlike a sedan chair."

"Like a howdah that they place on the elephant's back, is it?" asked Tom.

"Yes, but much smaller; a camel's back is comparatively narrow, not much wider than that of a horse. I remember one lady whose remarkable wicker-work inclosure terminated in two long arms stretching on either side for probably five or six feet and commanding almost the entire roadway. From the end of each arm there hung a long leathern strap or belt which passed under the lower curve of the camel's neck, and was trimmed picturesquely with a knotted fringe. It was secured to the neck of the camel by being passed through a ring attached to a leathern belt or collar. This strong and ungainly structure was undoubtedly intended to signify that the occupant of the chair was a personage of rank, and I observed that she was given the right of way by other riders. I need hardly say that after my nine-mile ride," added Uncle John, "I had no further wish to cultivate the camel-back exercise."

"Why don't they have camels in civilized countries?" asked one of the children.

"Because their true home is in the desert;
they cannot thrive in any other climate. While the Hebrews in the Patriarchal age led wandering lives, they had camels, but when they settled in Palestine, the ass became their beast of burden. When they came back from the Babylonish captivity they brought camels that had been purchased for the journey.
They are used for somewhat similar purposes to-day. I have seen the Arab training the young ones to bend their limbs, to lie down to receive a rider; to lie in a circle and form a rampart for defence against robbers, while the riders grouped themselves within the circle.
Some of the more valuable breeds are covered as Rocky Mountain goats, and their hardiness and ability to go unfed for days make them dear to the frugal Arab heart."

About Names.

"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and I will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written." Rev. 2:17.

This was the text that the minister had preached from in the forenoon and the children, who had heard the sermon, were discussing it at the little family gathering in the evening.

"And shall we not have our own names when we get to heaven, mama," said one little daughter. "Won't Mamie and Nellie and Lottie and little wee Harry have their own names there?"

"Yes, dear," said mother, "but they will also have a new name, as the Bible tells us.
You know the names you receive here have significations of their own, and the new name will doubtless have a new signification which will be revealed to God's children."

"I know," said one of the group. "I read that some of the names have very funny meanings. For instance, that means 'a little lamb,' and I can remember 'dim-sighted,' and David a little and Jesse a willow, and Benjamin something bright."

"Could the Bible tell us the children,

"Whether your names may mean," said the mother, "you may by your conduct make them loved and respected. In other times, a man or woman received a name according to the place they lived in, or whether they were tall or fat or childlike, weak or strong, meek or warlike, merry or sad. It is but just to suppose that whatever names we may receive hereafter, they will accord with our character and behavior here. Sometimes, therefore, it is fitting to think and act so that you may receive the new name with which God names those who love him here and do his will."

Home Prayer a Sweetener.

Do you have prayer regularly at home?
Are your family accustomed to meet together for that brief period of worship that brings them into closer spiritual communion than at any other hour of their daily lives?

If not, you miss much, for prayer in the home is a sweetener of the whole day. We know there are many who allege want of time as an excuse for not having any sort of worship in the home; but this is not a valid excuse. They have business at the store, or on the farm, or perhaps they have an appointment on which money depends, or they have to see the lawyer, or—well, fifty other excuses, all more or less trivial by contrast with the great fact that they have launched out upon the venture of another day, without asking the blessing of God upon their lives.

The truth is that family prayer, unless sedulously maintained from a deep sense of duty, is apt to degenerate into a dry formalism and to be finally dropped. Why not make it—as you can if you will—the most interesting quarter of an hour of the day? Let your sons' and daughters' voices ring out in sacred song; let the father or the mother open the heart to the great Guardian of homes; let all bow at the mercy-seat and there, in silence for a moment, petition for their friends and themselves; let this be done in the spirit of meekness and humility and supplication, and these moments will be golden. We know of many households where anything else would sooner be sacrificed than the daily offering of family prayer, for with it the tasks of the day are more easily done and there is a soul-satisfaction that comes of communion with God that nothing can remove. Family prayer is the golden invisible circle that binds the hearts of the household with a bond above all sordid cares. Remove it and this beautiful and harmonious bond of union is destroyed.

For praise or prayer, it is sure to be.

The beautiful verse, a polished gem.

Culled from the sacred treasury

And fit for a royal diadem.

I like to think that the children dear,

Will know that truth when their heads are gray.

That the hallowed praise their souls will cheer,
Many a time on the pilgrim way.

Summer Gossip.

It is a baleful thing, is this summer gossip, at least the kind we find indulged in by languid men and women at some of the so-called fashionable places. It is so easy for criticism of one's neighbors to become coarse and unkind; for little-tattle to run into riotous exaggeration, until it finally culminates in slander. Cheap literature and summer gossip are responsible for more evil results than those who indulge in them would believe. How many of you are Christian women? If there is one whose heart is filled with the love of Christ, every other heart will be grateful if, avoiding all phrases, she directs the thought to the beautiful life hidden with Christ in God.

One prolific source of summer gossip is fashion. Girls and women are frequently unable to distinguish between right and wrong fashion. "Wrong fashion," remarks a clever writer, is the world's undertaker. It drives thousands in hearse to the cemeteries. But worse than all, it is the cause of intellectual depletion. The endless study of proprieties and patterns is dwarfing to the intellect. It is worth noting that a man or woman of fashion is rarely known to study much. Their field of thought rarely leads them beyond the cut of a gown or a tie, the color of a cravat or a sub-ber. A new style of dress sends them into ecstasies or a faint. How much better life would be without such a tendency to trifles!

MR. MURRAY felt as if the doors of Paradise closed against him, when he left Robert at the boarding-school, and turned away to go to his hotel. Still, he believed he was acting for Robert's good, and he counted the hours from the Monday morning until he should allow himself to go on Saturday afternoon to see his son. Already he began to consider what he should take to him. The master had explained that novels and candy were tabooed, as well as extra pocket-money. Mr. Murray concluded that he would treat Robert and the school to grapes and peaches.

Meanwhile Robert was introduced to the school-room, and vigorously stared at. The boys estimated the fineness of his clothes and the appearance of his watch. Those who made dress and money a ground of friendship, concluded to be on intimate terms with the new boy.
